Federal Decision Ruling Segregated Atlanta Schools

Attorneys Request Desegregation Start

A prompt and reasonable start toward the desegregation of Atlanta public schools, with October 1 as the deadline for the presentation of a plan for desegregation, was asked in a proposed final decree by attorneys for ten plaintiffs seeking an end to public school segregation in Atlanta.

The decree was proposed by Attorney E. E. Moore, Jr., and the plaintiffs' attorneys at the direction of District Court Judge Frank A. Hooper.

Hooper asked that the plaintiffs' attorneys submit a proposed final decree to the Court and to defense counsel that would correspond with the judge's desegregation rulings last June.

The decree has been sent to school board attorneys and it is reportedly expected that they will object to the October 1 deadline listed in the decree. They have until Tuesday to file any objections.

The plaintiffs' attorneys asked, in their proposed decree, that a "complete plan" be submitted by October 1. It further asked that the plan "provide for a prompt and reasonable start toward desegregation of the public schools of the City of Atlanta and a systematic and effective method for achieving such desegregation with all deliberate speed."

In his June ruling, Judge Hooper asked that a desegregation plan be presented to the Court by the Atlanta Board of Education "within a reasonable time."

Hooper recessed court to allow study of his preliminary ruling. When the hearing was resumed Murphy argued the U.S. Supreme Court decision of 1954 can not be applied in this case because no Negro child has sought admission to a specific school and thus it can not be demonstrated that they are excluded because of race.

Mrs. Constance Baker Motley of New York, an attorney for the Negroes, argued the Atlanta school board has been studying possible integration since 1955 and should be ready by this time.

Murphy maintained that the plaintiffs had failed to prove any discrimination and that there was no requirement to take any action until the plaintiffs proved this point.

Attorneys for the Negroes said desegregation should be ordered and attorneys for the defendants replied that segregation is provided for by law.

Gov. Ernest Vandiver, a leader among those who have kept Georgia among the very few states without integration at all educational levels, scored what he described as "outside agitators" and "interference from outside." He referred, obviously, to the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People which is assisting the Negro plaintiffs.

Sen. Herman Talmadge (D-Ga.) in Washington observed the litigation might seriously damage race relations without benefit "to anyone whatsoever, white or colored."

On the other hand, Atlanta's Mayor William B. Hartsfield tacitly accepted the inevitability of direct integration order, expressed hope the court would allow some delay and reiterated earlier demands that the Legislature allow Atlanta to decide whether to accept some integration or to close the schools.

School Plea Up To Board

ATLANTA (AP) — Gov. Ernest Vandiver says it is up to the Atlanta Board of Education to decide whether to appeal a federal court school desegregation ruling.

The governor told his news conference Tuesday that the state was not a party to the suit and for that reason the question of an appeal was "a matter that addresses itself to the local board."

U. S. District Judge Frank A. Hooper issued an order July 1 directing the Atlanta Board of Education to submit an integration plan by Dec. 1.

The Board of Education has 30 days from the date of the order to file an appeal.

Vandiver made the statement when asked whether legislators and lawyers who met with him at the executive mansion Monday night had agreed on any advice for the Atlanta Board.

After the closed meeting, the governor announced appointment of a five-man committee of lawyers to advise him on ways of maintaining school segregation.

Responsibilities In School Desegregation Pointed Out

ATLANTA, Ga. (Special To the Weekly) — Legal action within the law, acceptance of programs of desegregation which will minimize friction, and recognition that different communities will move at different speeds were cited as responsibilities of the Negro community at the direction of the Supreme Court decision desegregation now carried out. This is the opinion of President Rufus E. Clement of Atlanta University, and elected member of the Atlanta Board of Education, speaking at a Conference on Public School Desegregation at the University of Notre Dame, May 8-9.

"Permanence of change is much more to be desired than is the speed with which the change is stamped," Dr. Clement said.

The conference, sponsored by the School of Law of Notre Dame University, brought together twelve southern leaders including Senator Cooper of Kentucky, ex-Governor McKeldin of Maryland, Superintendent Hanson of the Washington, D. C. Schools and Superintendent Omer Carmichael of Louisville, and Mayor William B. Hartsfield of Atlanta, who addressed the conference by telephone hook-up.

Dr. Clement emphasized the fact that the Negro is not seeking social associations with others, but merely individual and group freedom, nor did he see school desegregation leading to "destruction of the white race" any more than standing in line at a post office general delivery window or riding in the same passenger coach or airplane.

Recognizing the validity of the criticism that Negro children made poorer scores than white children on "standardized tests," he blamed this on the segregated school system in which Negro children had been shortchanged for decades under teachers who had themselves been victims of limited opportunities.

Dr. Clement counseled Negroes to be helpful in reaching agreement on programs which will lead to desegregation with the least attendant friction and greatest promise of community acceptance. Among measures which he would approve are grouping on basis of ability and the establishment of separate high schools for the two sexes, if this would allay fears.

The closing of the schools to avoid desegregation would work to the disadvantage of the average white family as well as to the vast majority of Negro families, since these would be those who could not afford private schools, he said.

"The situation imposes upon the Negro the obligation to work vigorously and consistently at the task of upgrading the group from within," he concluded. "Jackie Robinson would never have broken the color line in organized baseball if he had not been better than the average performers who were engaged in this great American sport."

Atlanta Board Set To Appeal School Ruling

"I am authorized to say that the Atlanta Board of Education, acting upon advice of counsel, will at the proper time, give notice of appeal in the case."

Latimer declined to elaborate but legal sources said the board has until Aug. 9 to file an appeal to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Judge Frank Hooper ruled recently that Atlanta could not continue segregated schools and ordered the board to produce by Dec. 1 a plan designed to bring about compliance with the order.

The judge said the plan should "provide for a prompt and reasonable start toward desegregation of the public schools."

A legal source said the board will appeal the July 9 order that sets the Dec. 1 deadline, which in effect will appeal the whole ruling.

Savannah May Get Integration Suit

SAVANNAH — (UPI) — Negro parents Wednesday threatened to seek federal court action to force integration of Chatham County public schools next September.

A spokesman for 20 Negro parents who petitioned the county board of education to draft plans for school integration, warned that if the board does not take action an "Atlanta - type" suit would be filed here.

School Board attorney Leopold Alexander acknowledged Wednesday that the board had received the petition, but refused comment.

The Rev. Curtis J. Jackson, one of the 20 signers, said he would appear before the board Tuesday to personally ask the group's intentions in the matter.

The NAACP on two previous occasions has asked the board what progress they have been making toward complying with the 1954 Supreme Court integration order. But the board has neither replied or taken action on the requests.

Rep. Quimby Melton

tors interviewed Wednesday by the Associated Press indicated they feel local option or pupil placement legislation may be futile or unnecessary.

Rep. Mac Pickard said he did not foresee that schools in other areas would automatically close if Atlanta's were padlocked under the state law forbidding funds for integrated schools. His assumption is correct in that there is no automatic closure, but there undoubtedly would be suits brought to halt state funds to other schools if Atlanta had no schools.

HAS PLACEMENT 'LAW'

Pickard also said the state already has a pupil placement law in that local school boards have the power to assign pupils.

Muscogee's Rep. Howell Hollis said any move toward local option, pupil placement or similar proposals would be ineffectual in that all of them imply at least token integration which is illegal under the Georgia Constitution.

Vinson, president of the Georgia League of Women Voters, gave the governor official notice of the delegations' intentions.

Big Debate Begins On Saving Schools

The Atlanta Constitution

Atlanta, Ga.

Joining the great public debate which is bound to grow in crescendo during the months ahead, Rep. Quimby Melton Jr. of Spalding County has indicated his support of any reasonable measure which would prevent abolishing Georgia's public schools.

Thurs. 12-17-59

Recognizing that Judge Hooper's statement earlier this week "has made it quite plain that the people of Georgia will be the ones to decide whether or not they will close their schools," Rep. Melton accepts the challenge to responsibility on the part of the General Assembly.

"If the people of Atlanta would rather desegregate than shut down, why should the people of Griffin and Zebulon and Hampton and all the rest be forced to close their schools, too?" he asks.

Observing that Judge Hooper "is acting very wisely and very patiently," Rep. Melton adds, "The people of Georgia, through their Legislature, must act the same or chaos may result."

Meanwhile, the Athens Ministerial Assn. adds its voice to those appealing for keeping the public schools open with a resolution adopted without opposition.

These are encouraging signs that somehow a way may be found to take advantage of Judge Hooper's patience and wisdom in leaving the door open for action to save public education. And while admonishing that court orders must be obeyed, he has given wide leeway for local control through pupil placement.

The General Assembly has been given a way out without the route of closed schools. The latter would amount to turning a million youngsters into the streets and loss of jobs to about 6,000 bus drivers, 48,000 teachers and 17,000 school employes. If that's the sacrifice to be demanded, the "chaos" envisioned by Rep. Melton is an optimistic view indeed.

Should the schools be closed because of the position in which Georgia politicians now find themselves, the reaction by the people would not be long in coming. The state cannot do without public schools and the people will not tolerate no education for their children.

But as of now, the situation still is ... summed up by Judge Hooper in his remarks that the people of Georgia, through ... their representatives, must make a decision between keeping the schools open or ... catastrophe for education.

ATLANTA BOARD MUST SUBMIT SCHOOL DESEGREGATION PLAN BY DECEMBER 1, JUDGE SAYS

Judge Hooper Directs Board To Comply With June Order

By JOHN BRITTON

A federal district court judge Thursday ordered the Atlanta Board of Education to present a complete plan for the desegregation of city schools to the Court by December 1.

U. S. District Judge Frank A. Hooper directed the defendants, the board of education to present a plan which is designed to effect compliance" with his permanent June desegregation order.

The plan is to be a final decree proposal filed with the judge by attorneys for the 10 plaintiffs in the public school desegregation suit. It was ordered that the complete plan be submitted to the court by October 1.

Dr. Holmes said "I do not see where that part of the order is necessary since a Constitutional guarantee of equal protection of the law guarantees the right of Negroes to schools and federal law invalidates any state law to the contrary."

Dr. Holmes emphasized that he had not read the order but was basing his comments on "the order as read to me over the telephone by a wire service correspondent."

Regarding the December 1 deadline for the presentation of a "complete" plan for desegregating Atlanta public schools, the NAACP field secretary said "I prefer not to make a statement at this time since I have not had the opportunity to study the order. I would actually like to think about it first."

Attorneys for the 10 plaintiffs had originally asked for an October 1 deadline for the presentation of a plan that would "provide for a prompt and reasonable start toward desegregation of the public schools of the City of Atlanta and a systematic and effective method for achieving such desegregation . . . with all deliberate speed." The very same words were used by Judge Hooper in his order.

Apparently adding further emphasis to his June desegregation order, Judge Hooper said in his most recent order that "the defendants . . . are enjoined from enforcing, and pursuing the policy, practice, custom and usage of requiring or permitting racial segregation in the operation of the public schools of the City of Atlanta, and from engaging in any and all action which limits or affects admission to, attendance in or education of infant plaintiffs or any other Negro children similarly situated, in schools under defendant's jurisdiction, on the basis of race or color."

After the board of education files their "complete" plan for desegregation of Atlanta schools, Judge Hooper said a further hearing will be held "at which time the defendants may offer such evidence as they may desire in support of said plan and the plaintiffs may offer such evidence and arguments with respect to the plan as they may be advised to present."

Judge Hooper said the order for a desegregation plan "is not the final judgement in the case and the Court retains jurisdiction of this cause for the purpose of entering such further orders or granting such further relief as may be necessary to bring about compliance with this decree and during such time as may be necessary to put into effect the defendant's plan."

Board Expected To Honor Ruling

By JOHN BRITTON

Reports Friday indicated that the Atlanta Board of Education will comply with the federal court ruling ordering the board to present a complete plan for the desegregation of city schools by December 1.

Board of Education President A. C. Latimer was quoted by news sources as saying he expected that the board would work out and submit a plan for school desegregation to the Court by the deadline date.

Such an act by the school board would apperently be in compliance with an order handed down Thursday by U. S. District Judge Frank A. Hooper.

Hooper ordered that the Atlanta Board of Education submit a "complete" plan for the desegregation of city schools to the Court by the first of December.

Attorneys for the 10 plaintiffs who initiated the school suit in January, 1958 had asked in their proposed final decree that October 1 be the deadline for the submission of a complete desegregation plan.

Meanwhile, Atlanta Attorney E. E. Moore, Jr., Friday minimized the legal significance of a portion of the judge's order that stated, "such plan may be submitted contingent upon the enactment of statutes permitting such plan to be put into operation."

Attorney Moore explained that no matter what the legislature decides to do regarding the implementation of the court order, the court is still legally bound to insure compliance with the desegregation ruling.

Moore said that a portion of the order possibly only means that the court is allowing the legislature an opportunity to enact such laws that would put the desegregation order into effect smoothly.

But if the state lawmaking body decides to rebel at the order, Moore said, the court still has a legal obligation to see that compliance with the order is effected.

But on another battle front, Governor Vandiver Thursday called 17 segregation attorneys to a Monday emergency meeting to discuss the December 1 desegregation plan deadline placed on the Atlanta school board.

The lawyers are scheduled to confer with Vandiver 7:30 p. m. Monday at the Governor's Mansion. Key item on the agenda apparently will be the question of what new legislation, if — any — can delay the triggering of Georgia's school -closing laws.

Governor Vandiver, as has most of the attorneys he called to the Monday session, has stated repeatedly that the 1960 legislature will enact no legislation that would encourage any desegregation in Georgia.

The governor has stated that Georgia will adhere to the basic idea of the present laws which order him to close any school which is ordered desegregated.

ATLANTA GIVEN MIX DEADLINE

Pupil Plan by Dec. 1, Order of U.S. Court

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP)—A U. S. district judge Thursday ordered Atlanta school officials to produce a desegregation plan by Dec. 1. But he said the plan may be submitted contingent on action of the Georgia Legislature.

This left in doubt whether Atlanta schools actually would be integrated or be closed under state laws.

The order by Judge Frank Hooper said the plan should provide a prompt and reasonable start toward integration of Atlanta public schools and a method for achieving desegregation with all deliberate speed.

Although informed sources pre

...ould be submitted by the board, there was doubt that the Legislature would provide what Hooper called "statutes permitting such a plan to be put into operation."

Present state law provides for the closing of any schools ordered to integrate. Gov. Ernest Vandiver has said he may propose new segregation laws when the Legislature meets in January, but will not favor any changes which would lead to integration.

Hooper's orders enjoined the city and the Atlanta Board of Education from enforcing or pursuing racial segregation in school operations. It gave the board a "reasonable period of time" to make the transition to a school system not operated on a racial basis.

The court retained jurisdiction, saying Thursday's action is not a final judgment, for the purpose of entering further orders. Hooper said a further hearing will be held after a desegregation plan is filed with the court.

The ruling came less than five weeks after Hooper ordered desegregation of Atlanta schools and indicated he would not call for such action in the September term. His action was on a suit filed by 10 Negro parents.

Lawyers for the education board had objected to a request by Negro lawyers that the judge require presentation of an integration plan by Oct. 1.

The board's vice chairman said he believed the latest action would put the burden on the state "if and when we do submit a plan." Harold Jackson said although he had not talked with the board's lawyers he felt the Dec. 1 date was set so there could "be something going by the time the Legislature meets in January."

A spokesman for the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People said he was skeptical of the section concerning the Legislature. The Rev. Amos C. Holmes, Georgia field secretary of the Negro group, said: "I don't see where that has anything to do with the established rights of Negroes to equal protection of the laws. We expect no substantial change in the state's position."

Vandiver's only comment was that he has called a Monday night meeting of lawyers who have been advising him on the segregation problem. Vandiver has expressed opposition to so-called local option plans advocated by Mayor William Hartsfield and others as answers to Atlanta's situation.

Hartsfield had no comment Thursday, nor did City School Supt. Miss Ira Jarrell.

Of the approximate 115,000 children in the Atlanta public school system 41 per cent are Negroes.

Atlanta Ordered To Produce Plan

But Legislative Rider May Close Schools, Not Integrate

ATLANTA, July 9.—(AP)—A Federal district judge Thursday ordered Atlanta school officials to produce a desegregation plan by Dec. 1. But he said the plan may be submitted contingent on action of the Georgia Legislature.

That left in doubt whether Atlanta schools actually would be integrated or be closed under state laws.

The order by Judge Frank Hooper said the plan should provide a prompt and reasonable start toward integration of Atlanta public schools and a method for achieving desegregation with all deliberate speed.

Plan Will Be Submitted

Although informed sources predicted some plan would be submitted by the board, there was doubt that the Legislature would provide what Judge Hooper called "Statutes permitting such plan to be put into operation."

Present state law provides for the closing of any schools ordered to integrate. Gov. Ernest Vandiver has said he may propose new segregation laws when the Legislature meets in January, but will not favor any changes which would lead to integration.

Judge Hooper's order enjoined the city and the Atlanta Board of Education from enforcing or pursuing racial segregation in school operations. It gave the board a "reasonable period of time" to comply fully with the order and make the transition to a school system not operated on a racial basis.

Court Retains Jurisdiction

The court retained jurisdiction, saying Thursday's action is not a final judgment, for the purpose of entering further orders. Judge Hooper said a further hearing will be held after a desegregation plan is filed with the court.

The ruling came less than five weeks after Judge Hooper ordered desegregation of Atlanta schools and indicated he would not call for such action in the September term. His action was on a suit filed by 10 Negro parents.

Lawyers for the education board had objected to a request by Negro lawyers that the judge require presentation of an integration plan by Oct. 1.

Segregation By Sex Is Charlottesville Idea

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va., July 9.—(AP)—The Charlottesville school board received a recommendation Thursday night calling for segregation by the sexes in some grades and classes sections next term.

Eleven Negroes have been assigned to two white schools for the term opening in September. The board has also received applications from 29 other Negroes asking transfers to white schools.

Fendall R. Ellis, superintendent of schools, made the sex segregation proposal. He said the separation of boys and girls is a general educational experiment.

The number of sections and grades to be separated by sex will be determined by school principals. The principals under the plan would submit an appraisal of its effectiveness by July 1, 1960.

Jackson said he felt the Dec. 1 date was set so there could be "something going by the time the Legislature meets in January."

Governor William B. Hartsfield ... has called for modification of the law to permit people in the affected communities to decide whether they prefer integrated or closed schools.

Since a large portion of state taxes are collected in the Atlanta metropolitan area, a court suit undoubtedly would be brought to block expenditure of these taxes outside the city in event Atlanta schools are closed. This would affect schools outside the capital city.

FOLLOWING Hooper's original order last month, Vandiver said he may propose new segregation legislation at the 1960 session of the General Assembly as a result of the order. He did not indicate what his recommendations might include.

Vandiver said at that time Georgians were hopeful that federal courts would not force the closing of a single Georgia school. He said then he would uphold the state law that requires the closing of any school ordered to integrate.

Approximately 115,000 children are in the Atlanta public school system. About 59 per cent are white and 41 per cent Negro.

'In Georgia' Otherwise there's 'hope for mixing

BY CHESTER M. HAMPTON
AFRO Staff Correspondent

ATLANTA, Ga. — "You see, we are in the grip of state-wide laws which control us. These laws authorize the cut-off of school funds to any city or county which desegregates its schools."

Atlanta's Mayor William Hartsfield was explaining to the AFRO his feeling about the prospect of school integration in "the New York of the South."

The mayor was speaking only a few days after Federal District Judge Frank Hooper ordered the Atlanta school board to submit to him by Dec. 1 its plans for desegregation.

The writer remembered that when the Supreme Court made its initial ruling in 1954, Mayor Hartsfield immediately declared that "Atlanta could desegregate tomorrow without any trouble."

ASKED IF he still felt that way, the mayor explained that the matter was out of his hands. The state school - closing law was one factor, he said.

Another factor: "Actually, the whole question is in the lap of the board of education — an independent, elected body Dr. Rufus Clement, president of Atlanta University, is a member."

Could the mayor advise or make recommendation to the board?

"I have taken the position all along that each city and county should be given local option to decide whether or not it should desegregate."

"ATLANTA IS a city of crossroads. I feel that racial bias is less here than in any other part of the state.

"Generally speaking, we hope that the January session of the State Legislature will return control of the schools to us. Atlanta, under the county unit system, has very little influence in state government so it is likely that the Legislature will (continue to) hold us in the grip of rigid, state-wide control."

If the Legislature relaxes that grip, is there then prospect of desegregation in Atlanta?

"There is hope," Mayor Hartsfield replied, "There is definite hope."

THE WORDING of Judge Hooper's Atlanta decision definitely seemed to indicate that his sympathies were with the defendants. He said:

"This court fully recognizes the difficult position in which defendants herein are placed. If they integrate the schools, all state money under existing laws will be cut off and it may be that such funds are necessary for the operation."

He also said, however: "This court is under no duty . . . to order integration, but it is compelled to enjoin racial discrimination.

"It is not the function of the court to suggest to defendants how such discrimination can be best eliminated . . ."

AFTER SAYING this — that it was not his function to tell them how to desegregate—he said:

". . . Any plan submitted would contemplate a gradual process which would contemplate a careful screening of each applicant to determine his or her fitness to enter the school to which application is made."

In a statement that may be unprecedented in federal decisions, Judge Hooper also said:

"This court feels that it should give defendants a reasonable opportunity to submit to the court a plan whereby racial discrimination will be discontinued. However, such a plan may be submitted subject to approval thereof by the Georgia Legislature, and the court would allow sufficient time for the Georgia - Legislature to act upon the same."

No other federal judge has made his Constitution - based decisions so dependent on the endorsement of a segregationist Legislature.

OAK RIDGE, the atomic city in Tennessee, had its small system desegregated in 1955. Then under the control of the federal government, the school system was the first in the state to admit students without regard to race.

Now, with an enrollment of 7,000, the school system will be relinquished by the federal government and turned over to the State of Tennessee.

Desegregation will continue in the system's admission policies, however.

IN NEIGHBORING West Virginia, the Cabell County school system — second largest in the state — has extended its integration on the faculty level.

Colored teachers will be assigned this fall to schools formerly having all-white faculties and white teachers are being assigned to formerly all colored schools.

The faculty integration started last year with a limited-scale 'pilot project.' The success of this move led to the expansion of the practice.

Cabell County was one in which the NAACP initiated legal proceedings to desegregate. The school board integrated before the case came to trial.

West Virginia's Kanawha County has had both its student bodies and faculties fully desegregated for three years.

IN DELAWARE, which resisted desegregation even more vigorously than some of her more southern sisters, Federal District Judge Caleb R. Layton 3rd rejected an attempt of the state to 'muddy the waters.'

The state attempted to insert an attendance - area provision in its 12 - year desegregation program which had been approved by the judge.

The judge had rejected a previous attempt to make such a provision a part of the plan. He said:

"It is time now to get down to the serious business of integration.

THE THREE-YEAR-OLD desegregation struggle in Arlington, Va. will be in the news again this week when Judge Alvert V. Bryan rules on the question of admitting 22 colored students to schools previously attended only by white students and also on the whole question of Arlington's desegregation plan.

None passed. In last week's hearings before Judge E. ... a Howard University psychiatrist pointed out that some of the students who were turned down had intelligence tests far above average.

Mayor Fights For Local Decision On Integration

Atlanta ... its state ... resistance

ATLANTA, Ga. (NNPA) — Mayor William B. Hartsfield of Atlanta has called upon the Georgia Legislature to allow the City of Atlanta the option of deciding for itself whether to desegregate its public schools in accordance with the order of the Federal District Court here.

Both a pupil placement law and local option were urged by Mayor Hartsfield as a means by which Atlanta can give token compliance to the federal court order.

Under existing laws enacted to avoid desegregation of Georgia's public school system, Atlanta is faced with the choice of abandoning its public schools or violating the court order.

Violation of the order would subject Atlanta school authorities to jail sentences for contempt of court.

MAYOR HARTSFIELD urged enactment of a pupil placement law and local option at the 1960 session of the Georgia General Assembly. Otherwise, he said, the "tragic alternatives" will be massive integration or an eventual shutdown of schools all over Georgia.

Only in Atlanta, however, did the Hartsfield proposal appear to have any political support. Politicians outside of Atlanta are dead set against any desegregation of Georgia public schools.

A pupil placement law passed in the 1958 legislative session by Representative Peggy Smith of Fulton County (Atlanta) got nowhere.

GENERAL JUDGE Frank [illegible] Saturday [illegible]

GOOD NEWS—Mrs. Ruth Smith, one of the 10 colored parents who brought suit to end racial segregation in Atlanta public schools, hugs Mrs. Constance Motley, chief attorney for the plaintiffs, after a two-judge Federal court ordered the Atlanta Board of Education to formulate a plan for integrating city schools. Looking on happily at right is A. T. Walden, pioneer Georgia civil rights lawyer.

segregation in Atlanta schools must go in his oral ruling. Judge Hooper said the formal decision would include these findings:

1. That "discrimination has existed and does exist" in Atlanta public schools.

2. That an injunction will be issued "prohibiting the Atlanta Board of Education" from operating the schools on a nondiscriminated basis.

3. That the Atlanta School Board will within "a reasonable period" submit a plan for operating the schools on a nondiscriminatory basis.

The ruling indicated that Atlanta public schools will have at least a year to work out a desegregation plan.

Negroes Get Charter for School Here

Four Atlanta Negroes have obtained a charter to operate private schools, but their attorney says the matter has "nothing to do with integration."

Fulton Superior Court Judge E. E. Andrews signed an order granting a charter to Florence Jackson Academy, Inc. It gives the corporation the right to "establish, conduct, operate and maintain private educational institutions."

Incorporators of the school are Harrison Jones of 293 Elm St. NW, Apt. 3; Mabel V. Sullivan of 156 Chestnut St., NW; J. R. Goolsby of 410 Hightower Rd., NW, and Mayme T. Lee of 625 Hewton St., NE.

R. Pruden Herndon, attorney for the incorporators, said they had "no idea whatever" of having as their motive operating the school in the event public schools are closed in the wake of integration orders of federal courts.

She explained that the four are already operating "a little church school" in a building which needs repairs.

JUDGE FRANK HOOPER
... issued decree

Atlanta school board fights Negro demand

ATLANTA, July 8 — A request by Negro attorneys that Federal Judge Frank A. Hooper require the Atlanta Board of Education to present a complete plan for integration by Oct. 1 is being contested by the board.

A board attorney, B. D. Murphy, submitted the city's objection to the plan yesterday.

Hooper last month directed the Negro attorneys to draft a proposed integration decree in accordance with his findings. He told them to serve it on counsel for the board, who would have 10 days to file objections.

THE SUGGESTED decree was submitted to the court and sent to school board attorneys June 24. Tuesday was the last day for submitting objections to it.

The written objections were kept secret because Hooper has not issued an order on them.

School board attorneys, however, said they "objected to the entire proposal" by the Negro attorneys.

"The proposal is not in line with Judge Hooper's original order," said City Attorney Jack Savage. "It is not in accordance with the preliminary findings of facts and laws in the case."

SCHOOL BOARD attorneys said in their objections that the Negro proposal "commands integration while Judge Hooper's original order did not."

Hooper ruled that his court was "under no duty ... to order integration," but was "competent to enjoin racial discrimination."

NAACP Plans Integration Test for Savannah

SAVANNAH (UPI)—At least one Negro child plans to apply for admission to a white school here next fall, and a spokesman for the NAACP said his organization is committed to take the case to court if the child is turned down.

Wesley Law, president of the state and Savannah NAACP, said, "I will be quite disappointed if several Negro students do not try to enter white schools."

He produced a letter from a Negro girl who said she wants to attend Groves High School next fall. The letter explained that Groves offers commercial courses and that Beach High, the Negro school she is scheduled to attend, does not.

Georgian Wants Public Schools At Any Cost

Ila Montgomery

Montgomery Adv. Wed. D-16-59 p 1-B

ATLANTA (AP)—An advocate of public schools at any cost Tuesday proposed a statewide referendum in Georgia "to take the governor and other state officials off the segregation hook."

W. H. Benson of Athens, an official of HOPE Inc., said he feels "such a referendum would show that Georgia wants the schools kept open, even on a limited integration basis."

He said this would permit Gov. Ernest Vandiver to alter his stand for segregation. The Governor has stated repeatedly that voters elected him on a segregation platform and that he intends to stick by his pledge.

HOPE stands for "Help Our Public Education." It was chartered last year as a nonprofit organization.

Benson was in a delegation which sought unsuccessfully to get an audience with Vandiver.

The delegation, led by Mrs. Edward Vinson of Atlanta, drafted a short statement outlining why it wanted the conference:

1. To plead for uninterrupted public education in Georgia.

2. To suggest that a commission of representatives of citizens at large be appointed to serve in an advisory capacity in the public school crisis.

Mrs. Vinson, president of the Georgia League of Women Voters, said the objectives would be outlined in a letter to the governor. She said this was the third time that Vandiver had cancelled appointments with the League of Women Voters.

The governor was not available for comment.

Won't Yield Inch, Says Floor Chief

By TED LIPPMAN
Constitution Staff Writer

MARIETTA—No bills allowing token integration or pupil-placement will be passed at the upcoming legislative session, the state House floor leader said here Tuesday night.

Rep. Frank Twitty said no such bills would be passed "as long as the governor we've got is in the chair, as long as I'm floor leader and as long as we have the same representatives we have now."

Twitty, of Mitchell County, spoke at a segregationist rally sponsored by three Cobb County men. Seventy-nine people were on hand when the rally opened in the 1,026-seat auditorium at Marietta High School. About a dozen more people came in after the program started.

ROY HARRIS SPEAKS

Segregationist leader Roy Harris of Augusta introduced the representative and also delivered a concluding speech about as long as the main speaker's.

U.S. District Judge Frank Hooper, in a statement Monday, said he intended to give the Legislature a chance to act at this session to come up with school plans to meet the court's previous order. The district court has already ordered Atlanta to stop segregation in its schools. He said any decision as to keeping schools open or closing them would evolve on the people of the state.

SOUTH "WILL WIN"

Twitty attacked the U. S. Supreme Court by name, Rep. M. M. (Muggsy) Smith and U. S. Judge Frank Hooper without naming them. He said the court based its desegregation decision on a "psychological book written by a well-known Communist."

He called Rep. Smith a "hypocrite" because "he sent his placement power on school boards that they do not already possess.

A similar sentiment was echoed by Rep. W. Hugh McWhorter of DeKalb.

But McWhorter added that "we don't actually need any more legislation."

P. 1 & 20.

He said that if the legislature would repeal existing laws and constitutional provisions relating to segregation, school closings could be averted.

But if the legislature does not repeal them, he added, the courts will knock them out anyway.

"I thought that Judge Hooper leaned over backwards to give the people of Georgia a chance to do something," McWhorter said.

State Sen. Charlie Brown of Atlanta said Tuesday that he expects the Fulton and DeKalb delegations to meet some time after Christmas on the school problem.

But he noted that the Atlanta Board of Education had asked the Fulton delegation not to take the lead in any changes in the school laws.

In any case, Brown said, he supported the board "100 per cent."

Rep. Wilson Brooks of Fulton said the board "has the initial responsibility of running our schools. I shall work with them in their plan."

Brooks said he was "ready to meet with them and support their efforts to continue public education" if the board changed its mind and wanted active support of the local delegation.

Legislators Termed 'Only Hope'

A DeKalb County representative said Tuesday he is working on a plan for preserving public education which he hopes can win support of lawmakers from all parts of the state.

The representative, Rep. James A. Mackay, declined to give details.

But he said his plan was a logical application of the principle of local control.

There was speculation that Mackay's idea involves amending existing segregation laws, possibly requiring approval of local voters before the governor could close public schools.

Vandiver disputes charge of keep-schools-open group that he has broken previous engagements. Story on Page Seven.

Mackay made a point of distinguishing between "local option" and "local control."

"Local control," he said, embraced the possibility that one school system could be closed while another remained open—a condition Federal Judge Frank Hooper said in his ruling Monday was impossible.

"Our only hope is to come up with a plan that is sensible enough to appeal to legislators all over the state," he declared.

Mackay said he had talked to many legislators and found considerable concern over the possible bad effects of school-closing on children and industry.

He said he doubted whether the legislature could confer any pupil daughters to school in England." He said the desegregation suit in Georgia was brought in Atlanta and not Savannah "because they know Frank Scarlett (U.S. judge in that district) would do everything possible to preserve our way of life."

Twitty also told the audience that the South will win its battle (for segregation) because people in the North are beginning to agree with their position. He said he noticed about a year ago that Northerners were no longer asking him why "the South didn't bow down." Now, he said, "the collective mind of the North has changed."

Twitty said that at a recent convention of legislative leaders from all over the country held in Albany, N.Y., one Northern official told him he didn't want his children in school with Negroes.

Twitty said, "Let's don't give up. Why give up? Why accept it? They told us we'd have to accept it five years ago and we haven't yet.

'WE'VE WON' SO FAR

We've won the battle for five years. Why give up now?"

The meeting was sponsored by Cobb Countians C. E. Rainey, Arthur Holcombe and Ed Sommers, Rainey said. Rainey said it was to get the segregation side across to the people.

At the close of the meeting a man passed out a petition which he said calls on Gov. Vandiver to outlaw the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

WHY GIVE UP?

"But he said he had to get votes," Twitty said.

The floor leader accused "those people opposing us" of being insincere. "We are sincere," he said. "There is not one drop of sincerity in the collective lot of them."

U.S. Jurist Stresses Wish To Let the People Speak

Following is the text of Judge Frank A. Hooper's remarks at the Federal District Court hearing Monday on the Atlanta school desegregation plan:

"There's a great deal that could be said on that subject, Mrs. Motley. The Court had in mind in passing its original order that the Legislature would meet in January and that any plan could not be put into effect until September, 1960. So the Court had in mind that if the Legislature had its session in January, 1960, it would give the Atlanta School Authorities the right at its option to put this plan in. Then the plan could be effective.

"This Court has not approved any Georgia laws which might have been passed. They have not been directly attacked in the Court on a great many phases of this matter. This Court has never looked forward to what might be ruled in the future in the event that the Legislature does nothing in next January; and therefore this plan could not have legally gone forward under the laws of Georgia.

EXPLAINS PASSAGE

"Very frankly, and I want to make this so clear that nobody can misunderstand it. The purpose of this Court in passing the order that it did was to give the people of Georgia through their Legislature the right if they saw fit to let the different communities speak for themselves as to what they wanted.

"Now I'm not saying—if you want to look a good ways ahead, let's do it for just a moment. If the Legislature did not allow the Atlanta Public System to go through with this plan and if this court said that the Atlanta Public System must integrate as the Supreme Court and all the Appellate Courts would order this court to say eventually, and if this court, being compelled to do so by higher authorities should say to the Atlanta School Board that you must integrate regardless of what the Georgia law says, and if the Atlanta School Board then integrated as ordered by the court, it is contended that under the laws of Georgia as they now stand the Atlanta School System would close up. Contention is made that if the Atlanta School System was forced to close, under the rulings of the Supreme Court of Virginia, that the closing of one school system would mean the closing of all schools in Georgia. Now the point I want to make clear as to what I've had in my mind—and it's no secret—was this one thing: That I felt it was the duty of this court to give the people of Georgia an opportunity to decide what they are going to do under all the facts and circumstances. This court will not attempt to say to the people of Georgia or say to the Georgia Legislature or to say to any school board what they should do. The time is going to come, and how soon I do not know, and this court will itself be forced to say that old practices cannot continue, and the only thing that this court has tried to do is two things.

'TO COMPLY'

"First, to comply with the requirements of the Supreme Court in the Brown case, which ordered deliberate speed, but to put just as much emphasis on the deliberation as it does on the speed. And I would be unfair to you and all the interests that you represent if I said to you that when I am compelled to order elimination of segregation that there is any intent on my part to do so, so speedily that there will be violence. I would say, however, that anyone who is so opposed to elimination of segregation that they would use violence to prevent it, that I couldn't give them one ounce of encouragement, because the court will not shape its decisions or policies in this matter to satisfy any person of that sort. I do not believe that we have that element in this community. We haven't had till now, and I'm confident we will not have in the future.

'PEOPLE MUST DECIDE'
Judge Frank Hooper

DELIBERATION STRESSED

"Now if what you and the interests you represent are demanding is that this court should order immediate integration of the races, knowing full well that that will mean the closing of our schools, the losing of our school teachers, the throwing of pupils out of school, in which event the colored people will suffer more than the whites, then I would have to say to you that I could not go along with you in any rapid integration of that sort. And unless you and the interests that you represent are willing to have elimination of segregation with such deliberation as to prevent all of those unfortunate consequences, I cannot go along with you.

"It's my purpose to carry out the command of the Supreme Court and of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals to eliminate segregation. But as far as I personally have any part in that, it is my purpose to do so under a plan that will be a gradual plan and not a sudden, explosive plan; and also to give if I can the people of Georgia an opportunity to say whether or not they would have a gradual integration maybe patterned along the lines of the Charlotte Plan or whether their answer would be in the negative and they would say on the other hand we would rather close every school in Georgia than to have one Negro to enter a school with the whites.

'ON THE PEOPLE'

"Now the decision of closing the schools, that is on the people of Georgia. It's not on this court. But the plan under which I assume the Department of Education in Atlanta proceeds to enforce here, I must assume is made in good faith and will be carried out in good faith. Any plan that is approved by the court and then is violated and is not carried out on a non-discriminatory basis, of course then the court would have to take such action as may be appropriate.

"Now I have gone at great length to explain to you what I meant by the General Assembly of Georgia having the right to let this plan go through. If the Legislature of Georgia says that Atlanta cannot put through any plan, the results I would not undertake to make any prophecy, and I'm not trying to threaten anybody or anything of that sort. Everyone would have to study the law and study the previous rulings of the Supreme Court and the Appellate Courts and make their own conclusion as to what may happen in the future. I'm not trying to prophesy. I say all that to make clear to you why the Court made the plan of the Atlanta board subject to the action of the Legislature, because the Court realized that the Atlanta board could not inaugurate any plan unless the Legislature consented for the sole reason that the laws of Georgia say that if they do so, they would be closed. They would get no aid. I hope I have made myself clear on that."

Georgia told to integrate or close schools

ATLANTA, Dec. 14—(AP)—Federal Judge Frank A. Hooper laid it on the line for Georgia—accept gradual integration of schools or be prepared to close them.

"The decision (on whether to maintain public schools) is up to the people of Georgia, not this court," Hooper said.

The judge heard objections by Negroes on a school desegregation plan offered by the Atlanta Board of Education.

Hooper indicated he would not be stampeded into ordering wholesale integration after a New York Negro counsel of the NAACP complained that the Atlanta plan does not provide for a prompt and reasonable start of racial desegregation.

"I CAN NOT GO ALONG with you if you demand that the court order immediate integration of the races knowing full well it would mean closing of schools, loss of teachers and throwing students out of schools," Hooper said.

"We must proceed with deliberation. My purpose is to eliminate segregation under a gradual plan, not under a sudden, explosive plan. I also want to give the people of Georgia a chance to say whether they shall have gradual integration or closure of all schools."

MRS. CONSTANCE MOTLEY, the NAACP attorney from New York, contended that Negroes have "never asked immediate violent desegregation."

Mrs. Motley, representing 10 Negro parents who sued to end school segregation, said that the 12-year plan submitted by the Atlanta board "is too protracted."

At the start of today's hearing attorneys for the Negro plaintiffs filed a brief objecting to the education board's grade-a-year desegregation plan. Hooper had directed the Negroes to show cause why the plan should not be approved.

The brief contended:

1. That some of the admission factors included in the placement rules are constitutionally irrelevant, vague and indefinite.

2. That the grade-a-year approach is a delaying device and not a prompt and reasonable start toward desegregation.

3. That the requirement for legislative approval is extraneous because the state's segregation laws are no good and the Atlanta School Board already has authority to operate the school system and assign pupils.

HOOPER, IN DIRECTING the school board to submit a plan, indicated a willingness to go along with gradual desegregation.

His order of June 16 stated that the custom of maintaining separate schools has existed in the state for many years and cannot rapidly and suddenly be ended.

School board attorneys received copies of the Negroes' brief today but did not plan to file a written answer. The order of the court put the burden on the Negroes to show cause why the plan should not be approved.

The plan is patterned after the Pupil Placement Law in Alabama, which has been approved by the U. S. Supreme Court.

IT SETS up an elaborate admission application system which any pupil—Negro or white—would have to go through to get into any given school.

In general the plan authorizes school superintendents to assign pupils, subject to board review, on the basis of scholastic and psychological factors and the possible effect on public peace and economic impact.

Operation of the plan was made contingent on enactment of permissive legislation by the 1960 General Assembly. This contingency was approved by Hooper when he ordered the board in July to submit a plan by Dec. 1.

Under present Georgia law, state funds would be cut off to any school district that integrates and the governor could close the school.

The Atlanta plan proposes that desegregation begin in the 12th grade in the Fall of 1960 and move down a grade a year.

In the July ruling Hooper ordered the board to submit a plan to provide for a prompt and reasonable start toward desegregation of the schools.

Court Says Decision Is People's

By JACK KAPLAN

U.S. District Judge Frank A. Hooper gave Georgians a stern choice Monday: accept gradual integration of public schools—or prepare to have all of them closed.

"The decision of closing the schools is on the people of Georgia, and not on this court," Hooper said.

The statement came during a hearing of objections by Negro plaintiffs to the desegregation plan offered by the Atlanta Board of Education. Judge Hooper took the objections under advisement and promised a decision as soon as possible.

The judge indicated that if the Georgia Legislature, which convenes Jan. 11, did not adopt a school desegregation plan he would have to order integration. Under Georgia law, such an order would mean closing the public schools.

TO SPEAK FOR SELVES

Hooper explained his purpose in giving the Legislature time to act on the plan was to allow the people, and communities of Georgia, to "speak for themselves as to what they want."

Mrs. Constance Baker Motley, an attorney for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, objected to the plan, saying it should have directly assigned Negro students to white schools.

She also argued that the plan, which follows the Alabama pupil placement plan, would take too long to carry out. The Atlanta plan calls for integration beginning in the 12th year in 1960 and proceeding one grade a year.

DISMISSES IMMEDIACY

Judge Hooper answered:

"If you want immediate integration . .. without due deliberation . . . I cannot go along with you."

The judge said he did not intend to require integration to take place "so speedily there will be violence." He warned that he would not have violence and would not give troublemakers "one ounce of encouragement." He said the could would not shape its decisions or policies in this matter to satisfy "any persons of that sort."

"I do not believe we have that element in this community," he said. "We haven't had until now, and I'm confident we will not have in the future."

He said the Supreme Court decision of 1954 required "deliberate speed," and he intended to put as much emphasis on "deliberate" as "speed."

In other objections, Mrs. Motley declared some of the criteria established by the plan dealing with psychological moral and environmental factors to be "nebulous" and unconstitutional.

Judge Hooper said the plaintiff's objections "are proceeding on a hypothesis that the plan will be illegal or will be violated. . . . I must assume the plan will be legally administered."

Mrs. Motley said the plaintiffs ". . . hope the people of Georgia will elect to keep the schools open and commence to integrate in peace and harmony and profit from the examples of Virginia and Arkansas."

Judge Hooper said the time is going to come when "old practices cannot continue."

Mrs. Motley, leading a battery of Negro attorneys, presented six main objections to the plan devised by the school board.

1. It is incomplete because it applies only to students and not to teachers and various national programs.

2. It voids the duty of the defendants to integrate, and merely shifts back onto the Negro pupil the responsibility of taking action to enter a white school.

3. The plan contains built-in delays making a prompt and reasonable start impossible.

4. The Atlanta School Board has not accepted the burden of showing that a start has been made.

5. Breach of the peace cannot be used as a criterion for admission.

6. The plan has been made contingent on approval of the Georgia Legislature.

14d(1) 1959 GEORGIA LATIMER'S TEXT ON INTEGRATION

Latimer's Text on Integration

The Atlanta Constitution
Atlanta, Ga.

A. C. (Pete) Latimer, president of the Atlanta Board of Education, made the following statement following the board's adoption of a desegregation plan for city schools:

Jan. 12-1-59.

The Board of Education assumed office Jan. 1, 1958, and immediately became a defendant of a suit filed in the federal courts. This suit has been defended by the city attorney assisted by the most experienced outside counsel available.

From the first the board has unanimously agreed to a course of action which would provide the strongest possible legal defense while at the same time doing everything possible to maintain a calm atmosphere where our staff could work and the children of Atlanta could continue their education.

PROPER ATMOSPHERE

In order to maintain the proper educational atmosphere each member of the board has willingly refrained from making individual or collective statements which might on the one hand jeopardize the efforts of our counsel or on the other hand might tend to alarm and excite to precipitate action citizens with deeprooted but contrasting convictions on this great issue.

In July of this year, the judge of the United States District Court of the Northern District of Georgia issued an order directed to the members of this board as follows:

"That the defendants and each of them, their agents, employes, successors in office, and all persons in active concert and participation with them be, and they hereby are enjoined from enforcing and pursuing the policy, practice, custom, and usage of requiring or permitting racial segregation in the operation of the public schools of the City of Atlanta, and from engaging in any and all action which limits or affects admission to, attendance in, or education of, infant plaintiffs, or any other Negro children similarly situated, in schools under defendants jurisdiction on the basis of race or color," and which order further provided: "That defendants are herewith directed to present to this court, on or before the first day of December, 1959, a complete plan, adopted by them, which is designed to bring about compliance with this order, and which shall provide for a prompt and reasonable start toward desegregation of the public schools of the City of Atlanta and a systematic and effective method for achieving such desegregation with all deliberate speed. Such plan may be submitted contingent upon the enactment of statutes permitting such plan to be put into operation."

BOARD'S APPEAL

The board's attorneys have appealed from the foregoing order, which appeal has not been heard. In addition to the appeal, the board's attorneys asked for a supersedeas staying such order. The supersedeas has been denied.

In compliance with the order of the federal court, we have today in good faith adopted a plan and are instructing our attorneys to file it with the federal court and, as suggested by the order of the federal court, the attorneys will transmit the plan to the General Assembly of Georgia.

We do not suggest to the General Assembly of Georgia the approach it should take to the problems confronting education in the State of Georgia, as we realize that this sovereign body is aware of the situation faced by this board as defendants in the federal court. We assume that the General Assembly is aware that this board finds itself in a situation in which it is virtually without solution on the local level, due to the great conflicts of law between the state and federal governments.

MUST BE RESOLVED

We do suggest, however, that this great conflict can and must be resolved, and we pledge our efforts and energies in cooperation with the General Assembly to any degree to help resolve the matter in an orderly, peaceful fashion.

Recognizing the great responsibilities inherent in the office to which we have been elected we wish to assure our more than five thousand employes and the people of Atlanta that we will continue to devote our time and energies toward the uninterrupted operation of the Atlanta school system.

City Obeys Court, Okays Placement Plan for Schools

Vows Fight To Prevent Shutdown

The Atlanta Board of Education Monday he will move to Atlanta ment plan in compliance with U.S. Judge Frank Hooper's order to come up with "a systematic and effective method for achieving" desegregation.

Adopted unanimously, the plan was filed in U.S. District Court here and School Board Chairman A. C. (Pete) Latimer said afterwards:

"We will continue to devote our time and energies toward the uninterrupted operation of the Atlanta school system."

Judge Hooper is expected to hold a hearing on the board's plan to determine whether it meets the conditions laid down in his order issued earlier this year.

APPEAL SEEMS SURE

No matter what the outcome of the hearing, the decision is expected to be appealed.

Hooper was out of the city Monday, holding court at Rome. The plan was filed with the clerk of the federal court.

The plan, modeled largely after an Alabama pupil placement plan, which has been held constitutional on its face by federal courts, sets up a long list of criteria which students must meet in getting transferred from one school to another.

The board acted at a session attended mostly by members of the schools' administrative staff. There were few others at the meeting.

City Attorney Jack Savage and B. D. (Buck) Murphy, special attorney for the board in the integration battle, attended.

LEAGUE PURSUES

Among others were Miss Mary Richardson, president of the Atlanta Women's Voters Guild, and Mrs. William S. Shelfer, Mrs. Walter Paschall and Mrs. Phil Hammer, all representing the Atlanta League of Women Voters.

Text of the plan was published in the Nox. 6 issue of The Constitution.

Latimer, issuing his statement, said that the board "agreed to a course which would provide the strongest possible legal defense, while at the same time maintaining "a calm atmosphere."

Latimer said attorneys will transmit the plan also to the General Assembly of Georgia. At the present time, any Georgia school integrated would be automatically closed. Judge Hooper recognized the conflict between the state law and the federal courts and proposed that the plan to end segregation should be offered to the Legislature for action.

"We do not suggest to the General Assembly of Georgia the approach it should take to the problems confronting education in the State of Georgia, as we realize that this sovereign body is aware of the situation faced by this board as defendants in the federal court," Latimer's statement said in part.

"We assume that the General Assembly is aware that this board finds itself in a situation in which it is virtually without a solution on the local level, due to the great conflicts of law between the state and federal governments.

"We do suggest, however, that this great conflict can and must be resolved, and we pledge our efforts and energies in cooperation with the General Assembly to any degree to help resolve the matter in an orderly, peaceful fashion.

"Recognizing the great responsibilities inherent in the office to which we have been elected we wish to assure our more than 5,000 employes and the people of Atlanta that we will continue to devote our time and energies toward the uninterrupted operation of the Atlanta school system."

Gov. Vandiver said he was not familiar with the plan but:

"When it is submitted to the General Assembly of Georgia, I am sure it will be dealt with properly."

Latimer announced that the entire board had concurred in the statement before it was made public.

Dr. Rufus Clement, only Negro member of the board, also issued a statement explaining his vote for the plan.

"I am opposed to several provisions of the plan," Dr. Clements said in part. "I believe these provisions (which he did not identify) to be either ill-advised, impossible of accurate appraisal or subject to arbitrary decision. . . .

"As the matter now stands the desegregation of an Atlanta public school would probably cause all of the public schools of our city to be closed. Certainly, no intelligent citizen desires this. At the same time all of us . . . realize change is taking place and is inevitable. A decision to close and to abandon our public schools would have such disastrous results as to make even a momentary embracement of such action almost unthinkable.

". . . In the profound hope that we may peacefully be able so to resolve the present conflicts between our state and our overriding national laws as to permit the finest type of educational opportunities to be offered to the thousands of deserving boys and girls of our city . . . I am voting to approve it."

Reports were that Dr. Clements said when the plan was discussed at a secret board session last week he would not vote for the pupil placement. His stand Monday was regarded as a reversal of his former stand.

The Atlanta board thus attempted to place squarely in the laps of federal courts and Georgia legislators the conflict between the laws. If Judge Hooper accepts the plan submitted, the board will be off the spot temporarily—at least until the Legislature has a chance to act at its 1960 session.

There is some conjecture that the actual crisis of integration may be delayed until the 1961-62 school term but others contend it will come when schools open for the 1960-61 year next September.

Integration Plan Bared By Atlantans

The Montgomery Advertiser
Montgomery
Dec. 12-1-54

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP)—The Atlanta Board of Education gave its answer Monday to a federal court order for desegregation of the city's public schools — a pupil placement plan calling for gradual integration starting next year.

The board also pledged to fight to keep Atlanta's schools open despite current state laws allowing the governor to close any schools which integrate.

The board's plan is patterned after the pupil placement law in Alabama. It sets up an elaborate admission application system which any pupil—Negro or white—would have to go through to get into any given school.

The plan, in general, authorizes the school superintendent to assign pupils, subject to board review, on the basis of scholastic and psychological factors and the possible effect on public peace and economic impact.

Operation of the plan was made contingent on enactment of permissive legislation by the 1960 General Assembly. This contingency was approved by U.S. District Court Judge Frank Hooper when he ordered the board to submit a desegregation plan.

The board's proposal said the gradual integration would begin with the 12th grade.

School Board Acts For Public Schools

The Atlanta Constitution

The first duty of any school board is to the children who are to be educated.

That being true, the Atlanta Board of Education has earned the gratitude of every citizen for its forthright statement it will do all it can to maintain public education.

The board was under court order to submit a plan. It did so yesterday afternoon. The clerk's office received it. The court will study it at a later time. If accepted by the court as being within constitutional provisions it will then be submitted to the General Assembly. The court has said it wishes the 1960 Legislature to study it. This would indicate some part of court decision ordering the plan into effect before the 1960 fall term.

It is to be hoped, though admittedly no leadership has come forward to support such a hope, that the Legislature and the public will also study the plan and the pupil-placement laws held to be constitutional by the Supreme Court. They give to the states more power than they have ever had before. They prevent any overrunning of a school. They allow, if a board wishes, the assignment of the better qualified pupils to one school.

The placement law, administered without discrimination, makes possible a real breakthrough in educational efficiency. It permits, for example, establishment of classes for the fast learners, for the slow learners, and for those who are in one way or another retarded, with special attention for all. If we but have the good sense to rely on a law already held constitutional, it is possible to have schools without any one being overrun by Negro students, a fear which seems to be the chief bugaboo.

The Atlanta plan, a gradual one affecting one grade per year, would require 12 years to complete.

Here again leadership which has the best interests of the children of Georgia at heart can see that there is no rush and that there will be no great change in the present status of attendance.

The law is modeled after those in North Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, Texas, Arkansas and other states where public education is being continued without any chaos or trouble.

It is not necessarily true that the schools of Georgia must be closed before they can be reopened. Leadership which wants to continue public education should, we believe, have all possible assistance. Let all Georgians study the plan. And let everyone realize that the placement law is an answer to the fears existing.

Pupil Placement Plan Or Close the Schools?

The Atlanta Constitution

There is time for all to study the pupil placement plan which the Atlanta school board, under court order, has filed for study.

There is a hint that at least some legislators are willing to give it the necessary study.

We are up against reality. The state laws which the Legislature passed are similar to those already knocked down in other states, Virginia and Arkansas among them, as unconstitutional.

It is important to know what the Supreme Court has said. In plain language it has declared that no plans of evasion or any laws designed to thwart the 1954 decision will be allowed to stand.

It is a tragedy that the fanatics and the more extreme voices continue to deceive the people of the state in charging that an attempt is being made to integrate Atlanta schools. This is wholly false. The contrary is true. Attorney for the Atlanta board has been and is B. D. (Buck) Murphy, a die-hard opponent of the court decision. He has guided the board, which has resisted through every known legal means.

Mr. Murphy knows that the decision is one of a placement law, which controls entry of qualified students, or no public schools at all. State laws give no protection. They will stand only until tested in the federal courts. Mr. Murphy, whose distaste for the Supreme Court is strong, still is not willing to deceive the people of Atlanta or the state with false statements.

The NAACP has announced it will challenge the pupil placement plan sent to the court by the school board. This is routine. The court itself will look at the plan and will determine whether it is constitutional.

The Legislature, we hope, will keep first in mind the children. There is no reason why those school boards, confronted with a decision, should not be allowed to do what they can to carry out court orders. This would save other areas of the state from similar suits for a long time to come. Some of them could "buy" years of time simply by enabling cities under court order to comply with a placement law.

This would be good politics. It is morally right. It also is the only course open if education is to be saved.

Atlanta Pro-Am. loses bid Baltimore, Md. for stay

ATLANTA — The Board of Education last week tried to [illegible] out of an order to file with the U.S. District Court a plan for desegregation of its schools, but Judge Frank A. Hooper denied a plea for a stay.

In accordance with the order of July 9, the plan for desegregation was to have been filed by Tuesday.

Attorneys for the board asked postponement, pending the outcome of a review of the case by the Fifth District Court of Appeals in New Orleans.

"THE COURT is of the opinion," said Judge Hooper, "that the public interest would be best served by the submission to such Legislature of a plan at its approaching session in Jan., 1960, than to be deferred to a future session of the Legislature."

Had Judge Hooper granted the delay, it is doubtful if the Legislature would have had a chance to consider the city's plan for desegregation for the fall term next year.

Although it hasn't been adopted, the plan would begin with desegregation of the 12th grade and a grade each year thereafter.

MEANWHILE, in New Orleans the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled last week that the Florida pupil assignment law has been misused. Overruling a District Court judgment, it was stated:

"We cannot agree with the District Court that the pupil assignment law or even an interposing resolution opens the way for a pupil to apply to a school of his choice . . . the requirements of a plan of desegregation of the schools . . . constituted a reasonable start toward compliance."

ON THE SCHOOL front in New York, for the first time in the history of Westchester County a uniform hiring policy has been adopted by the Council of Chief School Officers.

"In our role as employing officers or as chief recommending officers," it was noted, "we seek the applications of all qualified personnel without respect to their age, color, religion or nationality of origin."

WHILE DOWN south in Birmingham, Ala., the Board of Education dismissed a petition of 135 parents seeking a school integration plan as not being "an appropriate request for any action."

Supt. Theo Wright, in replies to the parents, stated that "application blanks are available on proper request," but noted that the school board handles each individual pupil assignment by authority of the Alabama Placement Law.

AND IN Little Rock, 10 Horace Mann High School pupils lost another bid to be transferred to integrated Central and Hall High Schools.

The 10 pupils were among 18 denied transfers this fall when the board approved the transfers of eight others.

The board simply denied the requests for transfers at a closed meeting to handle "routine" business.

compliance with the injunction and by the filing of the plan.

Hooper, however said that a stay would "defer the filing by defendants of a plan of operation" to the court, thereby delaying a desegregation plan to the Ga. Legislature. He said the best interest of the public would be a plan to be submitted to the 1960 legislature.

Placement Plan To Be Submitted In Court Tuesday

Atlanta Daily World 11/

Atlanta, Ga.

U. S. District Court Judge Frank A. Hooper will apparently receive the Atlanta Board of Education's plan for desegregation of schools here Tuesday, it was felt Saturday.

Sept. 11 '59

No other choice was left the board Friday when Judge Hooper denied a supersedeas— stay of his order. This had apparently been a last ditch effort by city attorneys to delay the submission of the city's pupil placement plan.

Attorneys had asked for additional time "for the reasons that the questions involved are questions of public importance and the rights and interests of a great many people will be affected by

GEORGIA

SENATOR HERMAN TALMADGE

Text of Talmadge Speech For School Amendment

(Text of remarks of Senator Herman E. Talmadge of Georgia before the United States Senate in proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States vesting exclusive administrative control of public schools in the states and their political subdivisions.)

Mr. President, no one can view dispassionately the recent course of events which has resulted in the closing of public schools in various localities of the South without experiencing a deep sense of sorrow.

Neither can one objectively contemplate a future in which those events are allowed to continue to their ultimate conclusion without experiencing a shocking sense of alarm.

The closing of any school anywhere is a lamentable occurrence.

The closing of a public school system is a terrible tragedy.

The destruction of public education in an entire region of our nation would be an unparalleled catastrophe.

Yet, Mr. President, a realistic appraisal of the facts of the matter affords no conclusion but that that will be the inevitable result of binding the citizens of the South in the chains of circumstance now being forged around them.

The Real Losers

And the real losers of such an eventuality unfortunately will be those who will have the least to say about it—the school children of the South and their parents.

The importance of education hardly can be overstated.

With the exception of seeking the salvation of his immortal soul, man has no greater responsibility than seeing that his young are educated to the fullest extent of their abilities and are equipped spiritually and intellectually to achieve their highest destiny.

The American concept of universal education, more than any other factor, is responsible for the greatness which this nation has achieved. And it very likely may prove to be the determining factor in the outcome of our present life-or-death struggle with international communism.

This critical juncture in our national life is no time to permit divisive issues to rob the nation of the minds and talents of a great segment of its youth by closing the doors of the public schools in their faces.

It is time, Mr. President, that someone spoke out in behalf of the voiceless masses who will suffer the consequences of such rash action.

From their standpoint there is little difference between those who would destroy public schools with bombs and those who would close them with court orders.

Children's Right

The end result of both actions is the same—to deny the children affected their right to a public education.

Let us put the question in its proper perspective.

The constitutional and sociological ramifications of the decision of the Supreme Court that separate, but equal, education is violative of the Fourteenth Amendment have stirred a continuing controversy which has divided the best minds of the country.

There are those who consider the decision to be the "law of the land" and who are determined to force its implementation regardless of the results.

There are others like myself who consider the decision to be outside the scope of the Constitution and who are dedicated to seeking its reversal by every lawful means.

Since there is no likelihood that those two viewpoints ever will be reconciled, it is essential to the future welfare of the nation that all citizens face up to the two incontrovertible facts of the situation. They are these:

1. Regardless of whether one accepts it or not, the Supreme Court's school decision is an accomplished fact which will remain so until it either is reversed by the court itself or is nullified or modified by Congress or the people; and

2. Regardless of whether one likes it or not, the overwhelming majority of the people of the South will neither accept nor submit to the forced implementation of that decision and there is no prospect of any change in that position within the foreseeable future.

Urges Early Action

Therefore, Mr. President, unless it is the wish of this Senate and this Congress that the nation be torn asunder and the schools of the South destroyed, action must be taken soon to resolve the issue on a realistic, constitutional basis in the light of the facts just stated.

To those who insist that compliance be compelled by federal force, I would point out the disastrous consequences of such an attempt in Little Rock, Ark.

Federal bayonets are not the answer.

To those who would have the federal government finance and operate the schools of the South, I would point out the abhorrent results we have witnessed in our lifetimes from the attempts by Nazi Germany and Communist Russia to control education at the national level.

Federal control of education is not the answer.

To those who advocate inaction and who would sit by idly and smugly while children go without an education, I would point out the unspeakable hypocrisy of using children as pawns of political expediency.

Rearing a generation in ignorance is not the answer.

What, then, Mr. President, is the answer?

That is a question to which I have given two years of serious thought and careful study and about which I have sought the ideas and advice of lawyers and laymen throughout my state and region.

Costly Mistake

In all candor I must admit, Mr. President, that I do not believe any one man, any one legislative body or any one court could devise a comprehensive answer which would cover all situations and meet all contingencies inherent in the present controversy.

That is why I am convinced that the historians of the future will record as one of the gravest and most costly mistakes of our nation the decision of the Supreme Court to make judicial questions out of matters of human relations which the sum total of the experience of mankind dictates should be left to the orderly process of evolution.

But now that the court has arrogated unto itself the authority to release the unknown contents of this Pandora's box, I submit, Mr. President, that it is now incumbent upon Congress to act to provide for the resolution of the resulting problems and tensions in a way compatible with American constitutional concepts.

That way, Mr. President, lies in the recognition of the fundamental fact that public schools in the United States are local institutions which have been established and are operated and financed by local people on the local level.

Paving the Way

That way lies in freeing the governors, Legislatures and school boards of the individual states to deal with each situation in the light of its own peculiar circumstances and in accordance with prevailing public opinion.

That way lies in removing external pressures seeking to force compliance with unacceptable directives and edicts and rather permitting local school patrons to determine for themselves the manner in which the school attended by their children shall be administered.

That way can be paved, Mr. President, by the submission by this Congress for ratification by the states of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which would read as follows:

"Administrative control of any public school, public educational institution, or public educational system operated by any state or by any political or other subdivision thereof, shall be vested exclusively in such state and subdivision and nothing contained in this Constitution shall be construed to deny to the residents thereof the right to determine for themselves the manner in which any such school, institution or system is administered by such state and subdivision."

Under such a constitutional provision, Mr. President, the citizens of each state and subdivision would be left free to determine for themselves — in accordance with local conditions and procedures and prevailing attitudes—how and when their schools would comply with the Supreme Court's school decision.

Basis for Unity

Such a provision would prevent destruction of the public schools of the South and would end for all time any threat from any quarter of federal control of education.

Such a provision would assure uninterrupted instruction for all children regardless of their color or place of residence.

Such a provision would permit either retention of the status quo or orderly change as dictated by the requirements of public opinion and make certain that whatever change might take place would be by the constructive process of evolution rather than the destructive process of revolution.

Such a provision would create a basis for unity throughout the nation at a time when it is vitally important that we present a united front before our enemies.

Mr. President, it goes without saying that the course I advocate will not be acceptable to those who wish to further their own partisan ambitions by punishing the South or to those who prefer for selfish reasons to keep the issue unresolved.

But I submit, Mr. President, that it offers a constitutional solution to a national dilemma which is compatible with everything that is American and affords the one way in which those of us who disagree on the constitutional and sociological questions at issue can meet on firm common ground to serve the best interests of the present and future generations of American youth.

Basis of Freedom

I sincerely believe that there is not a member of this Congress—regardless of the degree of his personal belief on this question—who could not vote for such an amendment with a clear conscience and in complete consistency with his principles.

As for myself, Mr. President, I am and always have been a stanch adherent of the principle of local self-government and local self-determination. I regard it as the cornerstone of our freedom and there is not an issue in our national life today to which I would not be willing to apply it without reservation.

I cannot bring myself to believe that any member of this Senate who sincerely desires to see this disruptive issue peacefully and permanently resolved and who genuinely is concerned about the welfare of all the children of this nation would oppose the submission of such an amendment.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, I cannot comprehend any thinking individual ever opposing the submission of any proposition to a vote of the people or their elected representatives.

The very basis of our form of government is, in the words of the Declaration of Independence, that it derives its "just powers from the consent of the governed."

And that is the crux of the present effort to force a new social order upon the South by judicial dicta—it is being done without the consent of the people directly affected.

The sentiment of the people of my State of Georgia is best summarized by two editorial excerpts.

The first, from the column of David Lawrence in the July 6, 1956, issue of U.S. News and World Report, states:

"The question before the country today is whether communities are free to adjust their school systems to meet their own local conditions and local sentiment. Those states which desire to integrate their schools ought to have the sovereign right to do so, and those which desire to operate mixed schools in some counties and separate their schools in other counties, either by color or by sex or by intelligence tests, should have the same sovereign right."

Georgia Editorial

The second, from an editorial by Editor James H. Gray in the November 27, 1958, issue of the Albany, Georgia, Herald, reads:

"Surely, if common sense is going to be injected into this question—and there has been too little of that because of the political capital that is being made of the votes of minority groups—this vital principle of consent of the governed must be maintained. Obviously, it can only be safeguarded by careful attention being paid to local conditions and local sentiment. . . . Freedom cannot flourish in a society where federal force and political whims are the predominant cementing elements."

It is interesting to note, Mr. President, that the second session of the 85th Congress in two separate enactments affirmed the local nature of public schools and provided for their control on the local level.

In the National Defense Education Act, Congress declared:

"The Congress reaffirms the principle and declares that the states and local communities have and must retain control over and primary responsibility for public education. . . ."

And in the Alaska Statehood Act, Congress provided in Section 6(j) that:

"The schools and colleges provided for in this act shall forever remain under the exclusive control of the state, or its governmental subdivisions. . . ."

South's Feeling

The states of the South, Mr. President, with no disrespect to the sister State of Alaska, feel they are equally entitled to "exclusive control" of their schools and colleges. And the amendment I am offering today, if submitted and ratified, would assure for all time that all states would enjoy that right.

The Supreme Court in its initial decision acknowledged the "variety of local problems" presented by its ruling and instructed the district courts to take "local conditions" into account in formulating their decrees under it. However, when the Little Rock District Court sought to do just that last year, the high court reversed itself and held that integration would have to proceed despite local conditions and the public interest.

The Supreme Court thus has sought to establish itself—without benefit of constitutional or legislative authorization—as a super board of education superior to the Constitution, to Congress and to the consent of the people. In the course of less than five years it has so disrupted laws governing education that every school in the nation now is subject to the whims of whatever five men happen to constitute a majority of the Court.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that it is the intent of this Congress or the wish of the people of this nation that the local schools which were paid for and are financed on the local level should be at the mercy of a court which has no knowledge of educational needs or the public interest in fulfilling them.

Stability of Schools

Of all our public institutions, none are more needful or deserving of stability and continuity than are our schools. It is inconceivable that the younger generation can be educated for responsible citizenship in the future under continually changing rules of instruction.

It is basic in organized society that the rights and wishes of the individual must be subordinated to the dictates of public opinion and the requirements of public interest. And it would be well for members of all three branches of government, executive and judicial as well as legislative—to reflect upon the fact that the source of all law is the people and that laws and court decisions are enforceable only to the degree that they conform to the "consent of the governed."

It is with the desire to invoke our heritage of the "consent of the governed" that I herewith submit for appropriate reference a constitutional amendment which would vest exclusive administrative control of public schools in the states and their political subdivisions.

As I earlier observed, Mr. President, there are those who prefer the issue and there are those who genuinely want to resolve it.

I hope that two-thirds of the members of this Senate—and of this 86th Congress—count themselves in the latter category and will be willing to stand up and be so counted.

This amendment is compatible with everything that is American.

It is the American way.

It is the constitutional way.

It is the way of reason and common sense.

I pray, Mr. President, that for the future of education in the United States this 86th Congress will give the people of America through it the opportunity to reclaim their constitutional right to run their schools on the local level according to the wishes of local people.

ASKS LOCAL CONTROL
Sen. Talmadge

Talmadge 'Solution' To Desegregation Problem

WASHINGTON. — (ANP) — Realizing that the Supreme Court's school desegregation decision is an accomplished fact which will remain so until it either is reversed by the Court itself or is nullified or modified by Congress or the people, Senator Herman Talmadge (D., Ga.) last week offered a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution which would reserve to the States exclusive control over public schools.

In introducing his resolution, the Georgie Senator declared that the closing of any school anywhere is a lamentable occurrence." He argued that the South is being bound in the chains of circumstance." And that the real losers are the school children of that area and their parents.

Talmadge conceded that education is responsible for the greatness which this nation has achieved. And it may prove the determining factor in the outcome of our present life-or-death struggle with international communism.

Must Not Hinder Progress

He admitted that at this critical juncture in our national life there is no time to permit divisive issues to rob the Nation of the minds and talents of a great segment of its youth by closing the doors of the public schools in their faces.

The Georgia solon contended that there is little difference between those who would destroy public schools with bombs and those who would close them with court orders. The end result of both actions is the same — to deny children of their right to public education.

"Great" Can't Agree

He pointed out that the best minds of the country are divided over the "constitutional and sociological ramifications of the decision of the Supreme Court that separate, but equal, education is violative of the 14th amendment.

Some consider this decision to be the law of the land, and others, including himself, consider the decision to be outside the scope of the Constitution and are dedicated to seek its reversal by every lawful means.

It was for this reason Talmadge offered his joint resolution which sets forth the proposal that "administrative control of any public school, public educational institution, or public educational system operated by any State or by any political or other subdivision thereof, shall, be vested exclusively in such State and subdivision and nothing contained in this Constitution shall be construed to deny to the residents thereof the right to determine for themselves the manner in which any such school, institution, or system is administered by such State and subdivision."

Alaska Law Questioned

The Talmadge proposal is said to have been inspired by a provision in the Alaskan Statehood law which specifically states that "The schools and colleges provided for in this Act shall forever remain under the exclusive control of the State. . . ."

When President Eisenhower was asked at his press conference last Wednesday to comment on the Talmadge proposal, he admitted that he didn't know that Alaska's law was any different from that of other states.

CHILDREN OF MILITARY PERSONNEL RIDE ARMY SCHOOL BUS

Education of 12,000 Army Children in State Is Government's Responsibility

12,000 'Army Children' Face School Mix Problem

Three Fourths of Group Attend Public Institutions in State

By MARION GAINES

If Georgia's public schools are ultimately closed by federal court orders to integrate, nearly 12,000 dependent Army children in the state will be affected.

What does the Third Army plan to do about these children, three-fourths of whom are attending public schools in Georgia?

Third Army Headquarters at Ft. McPherson, which has 1,032 children of military and civilian personnel attending Atlanta area schools, has no official answer to this thorny question.

But the unofficial word is that Third Army, by virtue of the old chain-of-command principle, will do "exactly what the Defense Department tells 'em to do."

AND IF DEFENSE Department officials have any definite ideas as to how they'll meet public school closings in the South, they're not yet letting the word trickle down from Washington.

The 12,000 Army children in Georgia are the government's responsibility because their parents are either Regular Army personnel or government-employed civilians at Third Army installations throughout the state.

Shutdown of public schools probably would have little immediate effect on 2,830 Army children, since they attend classes on the Fort Benning reservation in four grammar schools which are operated by the Federal Government and which are already integrated.

But what about the others?

AT LEAST PART of the answer can probably be found in proposed amendments to existing laws that were submitted to the current Congress in the Eisenhower administration's latest civil rights package.

One of the "broad objectives" of the proposed legislation was underscored early in February by Arthur S. Flemming, Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare for the Eisenhower administration.

It would, he said, "place the Federal Government in the position of providing education for the children of military personnel, whether or not they live on federal property, when public education is denied them through school closings."

UNDER PRESENT LAW, the Federal Government can provide U.S.-operated schools only for those dependent children who actually reside on military reservations. Those living off-post who go to public schools are presently taken care of through federal subsidies to the school systems.

These subsidies to "federally impacted areas," which saw Georgia's share reach almost $4,000,000 last year, would naturally stop going to any state that didn't have a public school system to operate.

"The proposed legislation may be regarded," according to Mr. Flemming, "as insurance for the some 70,000 children of active duty military personnel in Alabama, Georgia, Florida, Louisiana, South Carolina and Mississippi."

Here's what Mr. Flemming says this proposed "insurance" is primarily designed to accomplish:

IT WOULD authorize the U.S. Commissioner of Education to "acquire possession of any school building constructed with the aid of federal funds . . . when the local education agency which owns the building is no longer using it for free public education."

The commissioner could do this if he "needs the building to provide education to children of military personnel or to other children who reside on federal property. . . ."

The commissioner couldn't take over these buildings free, however. He would have to pay to the local school district "a rental fee proportionate to its share in constructing the building . . ."

In Mr. Flemming's eyes, the proposed legislation is "realistically designed to permit the federal government to meet its obligations . . . in a constructive manner and without punitive intent or action. . . ."

NO MATTER what Congress does with the proposed amendments, it's virtually certain that shutting down Georgia's public schools would shut off most of the federal aid the state is accustomed to getting.

Mrs. Bernice McCullar, chief information clerk for the State Department of Education, said that in 1957-58 "federally impacted schools" in 75 of the state's 198 school systems received U.S. funds totaling $3,769,666.76.

Any school can apply for "federally impacted" funds, Mrs. McCullar said, "if it can show that at least 3 per cent of its average daily attendance consists of children whose parents work or live on federal installations."

MRS. McCULLAR listed "commuters" as the reason for as many as 75 Georgia school systems qualifying for federal aid.

For example, she said, a "commuter" might live as far south of Columbus as Stewart or Lumpkin counties—and his children go to school there—while traveling daily to his job at Fort Benning.

The unique federal schools setup at Fort Benning has been in operation since 1921, post officials said, although the first permanent school building was not constructed until 1931. No other installation in Georgia has federally operated schools. The four schools employ 98 teachers whose "salary range is between that of Muscogee (Columbus) and Fulton County systems," officials said.

THE SCHOOLS encompass kindergarten through the eighth grade, officials pointed out, and the curriculum "is comparable by law to that of the civilian community" (Columbus in this instance).

Although the Fort Benning schools are integrated by law and in fact, it should be pointed out that integration in any federally operated school is of a "controlled" nature.

Such integration is "controlled" simply by the fact that the Army dictates the proportion of white and Negro troops stationed at a particular installation, as well as the number of white and colored civilian employes.

Fort Benning officials said they did not have a numerical breakdown of the white-Negro ratio in the four post schools but added that white students are well "in the majority."

THIRD ARMY Headquarters gave this breakdown of "Army children" in the state:

Fort McPherson—1,032 children of military and civilian personnel in Atlanta area schools.

(In addition, 275 children whose military fathers are stationed elsewhere also attend Atlanta area schools, raising the total to 1,307.)

Fort Benning—6,887 attend Columbus area schools, in addition to the 2,830 in the four grammar schools on post. Of that number, an estimated 5,000 are children of military personnel.

Fort Gordon—3,243 in Augusta area schools (513 miiltary, 2,730 civilian).

Fort Stewart—513 in Hinesville area schools.

Court in Atlanta Bars School Bias

By AL KUETTNER,

United Press International.

ATLANTA, June 5.—A federal district court today issued a preliminary order forbidding racial segregation in Atlanta public schools.

The order came at the outset of a non-jury before two federal judges of a request by 10 Negro parents for a declaration that Atlanta's segregated public schools are unconstitutional.

Although a speedy trial had been predicted in the efforts by Negroes to desegregate the Atlanta public school system, the swiftness of the action caught the crowded courtroom by surprise.

Judge Frank Hooper, presiding in the unusual two-judge non-jury trial, said both sides would be given "ample opportunity" to offer arguments against the decision.

"To make any other ruling would only add to the confusion" which he said is now rampant in the public thinking about the desegregation issued. Judge Hooper said.

Mayor Hartsfield Issues Appeal; Decree In Offing

By JOHN BRITTON

ATLANTA, Ga. (SNS) — Atlanta Mayor William B. Hartsfield has called on the Georgia Legislature to allow the capital city to decide its own fate on the future of Atlanta schools. He pointedly made reference to the Friday federal court decision outlawing segregation in Atlanta Public Schools.

Mr. Hartsfield advocated a pupil placement law, as well as local option, in his proposals which called for such legislation to be enacted at the 1960 session of the General Assembly.

A Georgia law enacted by the Georgia General Assembly calls for the closing of schools immediately upon court orders to desegregate.

Hartsfield indicated that he desired decisions regarding the fate of Atlanta schools left in the hands of Atlanta citizens and asked state lawmakers to act out of respect for the wishes of city officials.

The Atlanta mayor's statement came one day after U. S. District Court Judge Frank A. Hooper issued a preliminary order deeming it illegal for the Atlanta School System to continue operation of Atlanta schools on a racially segregated basis.

FINAL DECREE

Judge Hooper made it clear at the conclusion of the Friday hearing that the contents of his final decree will contain: 1. A finding that discrimination has existed and does exist in the Atlanta Public School System. 2. An injunction will be ordered against the further practice of discrimination by the board. 3. An order commanding the board to present a plan for operation of schools without discrimination at a reasonable time.

Court officials were contacted Saturday regarding the date the final written decree, signed by the presiding judge, will be available, however, no definite date was suggested by either contacted official.

In ordering the desegregation of Atlanta schools, Judge Hooper said: "It is a matter of common knowledge that for many years separate schools have been maintained throughout the City of Atlanta for both the white and the colored children, pursuant to the law as declared by the U. S. Supreme Court prior to the decision in the Brown case in 1954."

Judge Hooper further said: "This Court cannot at this time make any other ruling except a ruling to the effect that the operation of racially segregated public schools in Atlanta violates the Fourteenth Amendment to the U. S. Constitution. To rule otherwise would only add to the confusion which already exists in the minds of so many of our good citizens, and to build up in the breast of our citizens hopes of escape which would soon be torn into shreds by rulings of our appelate courts on review."

Defense attorneys directed their efforts at the hearing largely toward attempts to prove that the admitted pattern of segregation in Atlanta was by choice, and had not been "ordered" officially by the defendant school board.

Hooper, however, issued the court's preliminary ruling based upon the fact that public schools here are segregated. His ruling was what the 10 plantiffs asked for in their January, 1958 petition to the court to end segregated schools.

DAVIS TESTIFIES

During the course of the arguments allowed by Judge Hooper after he had already stated the opinion of the court, Georgia Rep. James C. Davis was called as a defense witness and attempted to report on conditions in Washington, D. C., public schools following the District's desegregation action in 1956.

Davis testified, over plantiffs' objections, that the standards of discipline and student achievement had dropped since the desegregation of Washington schools, however, Judge Hooper cut the Georgia congressman short saying there was, as yet, no comparison between the Washington situation and that faced by Atlanta and that Davis' report was "premature"

Following the courts desegregation finding, city attorneys indicated they would appeal the federal tribunal's decision to a higher court. They said it would be "safe to assume" the defense will appeal Judge Hooper's decision.

OFFICIAL "NO COMMENT"

Superintendent of Schools, Miss Ira Jarrell, said she had "no comment" when approached regarding the court's decision, however, Paul Stephens, deputy superintendent of schools said the desegregation decision could have been reasonably expected based on previous judgements in Arkansas and Virginia.

When asked at what time an implementation of the court's decision would be attempted, Attorney A. T. Walden, one of a battery of plantiffs' attorneys sitting in as an advisor, said the decision would be left up to the citizens of Atlanta. Walden further said the decision opens the doors to all Atlanta Negroes and not just merely the plantiffs. He added that it is possible that some Negro citizens may attempt to register at the "closest schools to their homes" this fall

Talmadge Sees Closing Of Schools

Constitution State News Service

ATHENS—Georgia's developing school integration crisis is a matter that addresses itself to the governor and the legislature, Sen. Talmadge told the Athens Exchange Club Monday.

He said that unless the state law is changed it will be the duty of the governor to close down schools forced to integrate. "I think it will take that course," he said.

Reiterating his own support of the state's county unit system, Georgia's junior senator said he has thought for some time that unless some slight modification of the system is made that the liberal Supreme Court might strike down the entire system.

The senator's remarks to the Athens' audience came by telephone from the nation's capitol. He answered questions put to him by members of the civic organization.

Talmadge said he is optimistic that the federal budget will be balanced in fiscal 1960. He based his optimism on improved economic conditions across the nation and on the fact that Congress thus far has voted less money for federal expeditures than President Eisenhower requested in his budget message.

Talmadge said, however, it is unlikely that Congress will increase postal rates and gasoline taxes as Eisenhower has requested.

Children must come first'

WASHINGTON

"If the schools are closed when we move into the 1962 campaign for governor and there is no assurance that they'll be opened again, then I'll be a candidate on this one simple proposal: The education of our children must come first, no matter what!"

Ellis Arnall, former governor of Georgia, further told reporters from the Peach State:

"You just can't turn loose a million school children out in the fields and onto the street corners, 6,000 bus drivers, 48,000 teachers and 17,000 school employees — one third of the people of Georgia."

Now a practicing attorney, the former governor was in Washington to represent clients at two hearings before house subcommittees concerned with anti-monopoly legislation.

ARNALL INDICATED that he wasn't particularly interested in running for governor again but if Georgia shuts down its public schools to thwart integration, Arnall declares he'll be a candidate in 1962 and "I'll be elected, you wait and see!"

He said that the public school system must be maintained at all cost.

"I want our public schools operated with as much segregation as we can have under the law," he added, obviously referring to the recent court ruling that segregated public schools in Atlanta are unconstitutional.

"WE ARE for public education at all costs," he said, declaring: "And we are going to have it."

He said that integration in the classroom can be held to a minimum by a three-point program — pupil placement, local option and grants-in-aid.

"We can control integration with pupil placement, local option and grants-in-aid. If someone is so opposed to going to mixed schools, then that state would provide some financial assistance to attend private schools."

Will Meet To Weigh An Appeal

By TED LIPPMAN

The Atlanta school board will submit a desegregation plan "at the proper time," board President A. C. Latimer said Wednesday.

Latimer also said the board will meet sometime next week to consider an appeal on the court order that was issued Tuesday.

The Tuesday order, by U.S. District Judge Frank Hooper, called on the city's school authorities to submit a desegregation plan in "a reasonable time."

NO DEFIANCE SEEN

Latimer said Wednesday that the board does not now have any formal plan for desegregation. "We've known, of course, for some time that the case would be heard. We've been looking ahead and thinking about it, but we don't have anything you could call a plan—not even an outline."

The board president said he did not believe the school board will defy a federal order to desegregate its schools.

"When it is determined that the ruling is final, I anticipate that the board will call together all concerned and begin work on making plans as ordered by the court," he said.

VANDIVER WARNS

While Latimer was making this statement, Gov. Vandiver issued a pointed warning at his press conference. "I would remind all that the laws of Georgia require (the closing of schools) should integration be ordered pursuant to federal Supreme Court decisions," the governor said.

Vandiver said he had confidence in the school board's attorney, B. D. (Buck) Murphy, and said state officials were watching the situation "very carefully."

"As governor it is my responsibility to uphold the Constitution and the laws of Georgia. That I will do," he said, concluding his statement.

Tuesday night Mayor Hartsfield had expressed the hope that state laws would be changed to allow Atlanta to keep its schools open. In addition to Vandiver, another state leader commented in a vein Wednesday that indicated the mayor's hopes had scant chance of fulfillment.

State House Floor Leader Frank Twitty of Camilla said flatly: "I don't believe the Legislature will change the laws to allow any county to integrate its schools."

Murphy and Latimer both said the decision regarding an appeal could not be made until school board members and attorneys could get together and study the decree in the case.

The decree is to be written by the plaintiffs in the case, based on Judge Hooper's order.

"The board president, who is an Atlanta attorney, reminded parents and others concerned about the ruling that no action of any kind is expected prior to the opening of schools in September. "The board hopes that the public will not be unduly alarmed by or drastic changes in the operation of the Atlanta schools," he

School Suit Set To Begin Friday

Daily World Atlanta, Ga. Sun. 5-31-59 p. 1

By JOHN BRITTON

The third major trial this year involving attempts to desegregate Atlanta's public facilities is scheduled to open in U. S. District Court Friday with arguments centered around the Atlanta public schools.

The trial Friday will be a hearing on the contentions of 10 Negro parents who declare that an injunction should be levied by the federal tribunal preventing the Atlanta Board of Education from practicing segregation in the city public schools.

The hearing on the public school suit will be the third major attack this year brought by Negro citizens against state and local agencies that worked under policies of segregation of the races.

Last January District Judge Boyd Sloan ruled that the Georgia State College of Business Administration here could no longer bar Negroes from attendance at that school solely on the basis of race and color.

Judge Sloan also enjoined the business college and the board of regents from continuing admissions requirements that were, by their nature and "the nature of existing Southern social pattern," impossible for prospective Negro applicants to meet.

The very next week after the desegregation decision involving Georgia State, two ministers who initiated a "class" suit seeking an injunction against Georgia Public Service Commission and the Atlanta Transit System heard Federal Judge Frank Hooper break down racial marrier on Atlanta buses.

The judge failed to issue an injunction against the two public agencies, however, he did bar the arrests and persecution of Negro freedom riders by law enforcement agents in attempts to enforce bus segregation. He deemed the enforcement of segregation laws on buses unconstitutional.

Now the public school suit, filed in January, 1958, is scheduled for a hearing Friday with Judges Sloan and Hooper sitting jointly on the district court bench to hear the case. Apparently the judges will render a joint decision on the matter.

There were rumors last week that two of the original 10 parents who initiated the suit in behalf of their children had decided to withdraw from the action, however, a further investigation revealed that all 10 of the plaintiffs are still parties to the action and that they "now have no desire to withdraw from the suit."

Atlanta Attorney E. E. Moore is counsel for the 10 plaintiffs in the school suit, while Mrs. Constance Baker Motley, of the NAACP legal defense staff will assist in the plaintiff's fight for desegregated Atlanta schools. Thurgood Marshall, chief counsel for the N. A. A. C. P., is also listed as a counsel for the plaintiffs, however, it has not been determined if he will take an active part in the arguments Friday. Mrs. Motley has been in Atlanta for some time and it is expected that she will take an active part as she did in the successful desegregation of Georgia State.

Attorney for the Atlanta Board of Education have tried at least twice to have the suit thrown out of court based on their contentions that the action had no basis since there had actually been no refusad by the white school of the application of a Negro child.

The court ruled, however, that "in action of this type" there was no need for an application to be made to any specific school by any specific child.

B. D. (Buck) Murphy, special counsel for the Atlanta Board of Education and City Attorney Jack Savage are listed as the defense attorney who will lead the fight for the continuation of the present school set-up.

Barring a last minute delay, the hearing on the long-pending public school desegregation suit will get underway at approximately 9:30 a. m. Friday in U. S. District Court at the Old Post Office Building.

Alabama Avoided Georgia's School Blunder

(X) editorial

Advertiser Montgomery, Ala. April 19, 1959

THE Atlanta Board of Education has been ordered to abandon compulsory segregation and to submit to the U.S. District Court a plan for integration "consistent with the welfare of all our people, with the maintenance of law and order and with the preservation if possible of our common school system."

U.S. District Judge Frank A. Hooper acknowledged that the abolition of public schools might be a consequence of any integration order. However, "for this court to declare as law that which is not law would be not only a futile gesture, but a great disservice to our people."

Running through Judge Hooper's order is the feeling of a judge compelled by his duty to impose "the law of the land" but restrained by an awareness of the monumental problems. He has given the city and the state ample opportunity to make some accommodation, going so far as to take notice of the state laws prohibiting race-mixing in Atlanta schools and agreeing to give the legislature sufficient time to change these.

Thus, since the legislature does not meet until January, 1960, Atlanta seems assured of one more year of status quo operation and perhaps longer.

SINCE this is the closest to Montgomery that a federal court has told a city to get moving, a review of court rulings from the 1954 Supreme Court decision to date seems in order.

Probably the best recapitulation is one in the May issue of the Virginia Law Review. It was written by Daniel J. Meador, University of Virginia law professor, and a graduate of Auburn and the University of Alabama Law School.

The federal courts have generally upheld the view, Meador begins, that the Supreme Court's segregation ruling was a negative command. That is, "The Constitution . . . does not require integration. It merely forbids discrimination." No constitutional violation is involved if the races accept continued segregation. If, however, Negro parents challenge the existing order, that is another matter. But even then, he says,

> . . . both the Fourth and Fifth [U.S. Judicial] Circuits, the courts likely to handle the bulk of school racial litigation, seem to be in agreement that no general realignment of pupils in a formerly segregated school system is legally necessitated . . . and furthermore that the permitting of racially separate schools is consistent with the Constitution, so long as no official compulsion is present [italics ours].

THIS is the key to the survival of Alabama's 1955 school Placement Law in the Birmingham test. The law was declared valid "on its face" by the U.S. Supreme Court. It is also the key to the reason Atlanta has been hit with a blanket order to make integration plans even though Negro petitioners there did not attempt to enroll in any specific school. Georgia's defenses are all prohibitive, whereas Alabama's pivots on the Placement Law, which is—at least on its face—permissive of token integration. Georgia has no placement law.

Neither a board nor a state can "with impunity maintain a fixed position against any desegregation," Meador says. He continues:

> If it does, either formally or in practice, it will generally be subject, if proper suit is brought, to an injunction in effect requiring abandonment of its segregation policy.

At the time of the ruling on Alabama's law, this state's legislation did not constitute "a fixed position."

All inflexible barriers to integration had been wisely removed by our legislature. Birmingham thus avoided the kind of blanket injunction Atlanta is now faced with.

It behooves state and local authorities [Meador says, after reviewing recent rulings] to clear their statute books of everything requiring segregated schools or penalizing desegregated schools and to avoid a "fixed position" — an enforced policy of absolute segregation of the races.

THIS should be a word of warning to the Alabama legislature. The Georgia legislature ignored such obvious perils with the Atlanta injunction the result. Meador advises:

. . . Where there is a valid assignment law with adequate and operative administrative remedies, with no legal or practical bar to desegregated placement, no general injunction will be put on the [school] board . . . If the board can avoid such a decree it is in a position to deal with individual applicants without being in the shadow of contempt proceedings.

But, obviously, once a specific case of rejection on the basis of race is alleged and proven to the court's satisfaction, this sets the stage for an order forcing admission of a specific child to a specific school. What Alabama will elect to do in this event remains to be seen. Probably schools will be shut down. But the advantages of avoiding a general injunction to integrate are obvious.

Meador concludes his comprehensive study of the situation as of May, 1959:

At this point a pupil assignment statute has the virtue of being the only arrangement which Southern legislators and the U.S. Supreme Court have agreed on as valid. This bit of common ground should be further explored. Perhaps under such a plan, for a while anyway, the schools can find shelter from the storm. And possibly this means life and law may in time adjust so that in the South universal, publicly supported education will survive and peace will return.

Vandiver Names Anti-Integration Team of Lawyers

5 To Give Advice on Legislation

By GENE BRITTON

Gov. Vandiver Monday night named a team of five lawyers to advise him on possible new legislation for reinforcing Georgia's anti-integration armor.

Vandiver picked his committee after a council of 22 aides and legal experts went over with him federal integration decisions in Little Rock and Norfolk.

EXPERTS SUMMONED

He summoned the experts by personal invitation last week after U.S. District Judge Frank A. Hooper ordered the Atlanta School Board to submit, by Dec. 1, a plan for breaking down racial barriers in the city's public schools.

The experts reviewed the federal rulings in other states in an effort to find new defenses for Georgia.

A small, orderly, hymn-singing crowd of segregationists "demonstrated" on The Prado outside the executive mansion during part of the two-and-a-quarter-hour huddle. The governor said later, however, that he and his conferees, closeted in a closed-in, second-floor sunporch, could hear nothing of the demonstration.

LEGISLATION EYED

After the meeting, Vandiver told newsmen the lawyers went carefully over the federal edicts and then suggested he appoint a "special group" to "assay carefully Georgia's present position and to make recommendations to me for possible legislation, if it develops that any is needed, to be presented at the 1960 or at other sessions of the General Assembly."

He named Atty. Gen. Eugene Cook; Griffin Bell, his chief of staff; B. D. (Buck) Murphy; Albany attorney Holcombe Perry and Peter Zack Geer, his executive secretary.

He said no final decision was reached Monday night on any possible laws that might be enacted "at the next session of the General Assembly or at any future regular or special session of that body."

At his news conference Monday morning, Vandiver indicated he was not, at that time, considering a special session.

"A special session is not anticipated at this time," he said.

The governor met reporters with a prepared statement at the end of the conference. He would not permit questions and said he didn't want to make any further comment. But he did say rumors that he might seek out-of-state legal assistance — possibly from Little Rock — were "ridiculous."

The conferees scattered quickly after the meeting, leaving the governor to face newsmen alone.

Earlier in the day, however, one of the invited lawyers said he wasn't sure what could be accomplished by the gathering, if anything. Calling the meeting was a good move on Vandiver's part, however, he said, because it showed his "desire and willingness to do something."

He suggested that formulation of advice to the Atlanta School Board on whether to appeal the local federal ruling might be a major target of the conferees.

Vandiver didn't mention anything about that, though.

As he arrived at the meeting, Macon segregation lawyer Charles Bloch said he doubted the group would attempt to offer any advice to the Atlanta board.

But B. D. (Buck) Murphy, one of the board's defense attorneys, said he was ready to listen if some advice were to be handed out. He indicated he had not come to a decision himself on the question of appeal.

Vandiver's House floor leader and one of his top aides, Rep. Frank Twitty of Camilla, said if the lawyers and the governor should agree on new legislative proposals he'll do his best to get them passed by the General Assembly.

There was considerable effort at screening persons admitted to the Mansion. State troopers checked off names of invited lawyers and a group of state capitol reporters who had been cleared for admittance to the Mansion as they arrived.

The following is a complete text of Vandiver's statement following the meeting:

"At my request a group of distinguished Georgians have met with me at the Governor's mansion tonight (Monday) for the purpose of studying recent federal court rulings, decisions and orders regarding segreated education and for the purpose of reviewing Georgia's constitution and laws pertaining to that subject in light of these decisions.

"We have reviewed the ruling in the Little Rock case, in the Norfolk case and in other recent federal decisions. No final decision was reached at this meeting as to any potential laws which might be recommended for enactment at the next session of the General Assembly or at any future regular or special session of that body.

"The group present at the mansion suggested the appointment of a special group of attorneys to assay carefully Georgia's present position and to make recommendations to me for possible legislation, if it develops that any is needed, to be presented at the 1960 or at other sessions of the General Assembly.

"To make this study I have appointed to this special group the following: Hon. Eugene Cook, Hon. Griffin Bell, Hon. B. D. Murphy, Hon. Holcombe Perry and Hon. Peter Zach Geer."

No Date Set For Suitable Solution

By JACK KAPLAN

U.S. District Judge Frank Hooper Tuesday ordered a desegregation plan for Atlanta public schools but granted time for any necessary legislative action.

The final order, a confirmation of his temporary ruling June 5, allowed the Atlanta School Board a "reasonable time" in which to submit a plan to end school segregation, but no definite deadline was set.

Text of school order on Page 16.

"This court fully realizes the difficult position in which the defendants are herein placed," the order pointed out. "If they integrate the schools, all state money under existing laws will be cut off and it may be that such funds are necessary for the operation.

"The continued operation, however, with discrimination as in the past will not be tolerated."

The Supreme Court had called for "deliberate speed" in ending segregation. Judge Hooper's order interpreted that speed to be one that would be "consistent with the welfare of all our people with the maintenance of law and order, and with the preservation if possible of our common school system."

The order said a solution must be found to fit the "particular conditions which exist in this case."

"This court feels that it should give defendants a reasonable opportunity to submit to the Court a plan whereby racial discrimination will be discontinued," it said.

"However, such a plan may be submitted subject to approval thereof by the Georgia Legislature, and the Court would allow sufficient time for the Georgia Legislature to act upon the same."

The Georgia legislature is scheduled to convene in January.

The legislative clause was not a part of the June 5 order and came as a surprise in the final ruling.

The type of "gradual process" plan mentioned in the decree was not a surprise. It was forecast by the judge's courtroom remarks about a pupil placement plan. The order said "the court now assumes that any plan submitted would contemplate a gradual process, which would contemplate a careful screening of each applicant to determine his or her fitness to enter the school to which application is made."

"Even the most ardent segregationists," Judge Hooper's decree stated, "have now acknowledged that the Brown decision (the original Supreme Court ruling ordering an end to segregation in public schools) is the law of the land."

The final ruling said "The sole issue of fact, therefore, was whether or not racial discrimination existed in the custom and practice of the operation of the Atlanta public schools. The Court finds that the undisputed evidence in the case demands that this question be answered in the affirmative."

The order said further "This court is under no duty, nor does it have the power to order integration, but it is compelled to enjoin racial discrimination."

When the Atlanta School Board submits a de-segregation plan to the court, their responsibility in the case is finished. The order said, "If the defendants (the board) submit a reasonable plan, and it should be approved by the court, defendants would have done all that they are able to do under the circumstances."

However, Hooper also added that if no plan is submitted, it would be "construed by the court to be a refusal to do so."

The original suit was brought against the Atlanta school board by 10 Negro parents on behalf of their children. It sought an injunction against the board to stop discrimination in Atlanta public schools on a racial basis. The injunction was granted.

The school board's attorneys have ten days to notify Judge Hooper of any objections to the ruling.

Let Common Sense Prevail on Schools

Judge Frank Hooper, of the Federal District Court, has handed down his formal decision in the Atlanta school case. It is one of enormous common sense and moderation, taking into account all the difficulties, yet one which is forthright and unequivocal.

Atlanta's schools will operate for at least another year without interference. But there must be action. The whole emphasis is on "reasonableness" by the city and state. The main points are these:

1. Segregated school systems are unconstitutional. The court, however, again emphasized something to which most people close their ears and eyes. It is that a school placement law permits screening as to scholarship, morals and health. It prevents the flooding of any school. Therefore, the Atlanta school system was asked to prepare a plan, with all this in mind, to present to the court. Failure to do so will be construed as refusal.

2. Perhaps the most important phase of the decision was the second. The judge suggested to the Atlanta board that it submit its plan to the Legislature. The Georgia Legislature, which meets in January, is, in effect, asked by the court to clear its books of the statutes which prevent the Atlanta school system, or any other which may later come under similar order, from operating.

3. The court took note of the difficulties and hence provided the time and suggested the method. Here we have a splendid example of the decision of 1954. It never was the intent of the law to "ram" anything down the throats of people. The court gave discretionary powers to the district judges. Judge Frank Hooper has just given a magnificent illustration of this fact.

But he made it equally clear that if there is not a reasonable reply by the city and the state, the court reluctantly will be required to proceed against them.

Here we have a challenge.

Is there within the political leadership of Georgia, in the Legislature, in the other elective offices, enough leadership of reasonable and patriotic strength to respond to this understanding and cooperative approach by the federal court?

The State of Georgia has on its great seal the motto, "Wisdom, Justice, Moderation."

That should be on the minds and hearts of all those in public and private life.

The Legislature in January of 1960 will make a decision which will either doom a generation of children to educational handicaps and the business and industry of this state to unnecessary damage and loss, or allow the public schools to function and the state to progress.

The least that can be done is to permit local boards to have local authority. Do we really believe in local government or not?

Is it now possible for men of good will and love of the state to shut their ears to extremist folly and meet common sense and moderation on common ground?

Federal Action Leaves Fate Of Atlanta's Schools In Air

BY AL KUETTNER

ATLANTA (UPI) — A few years ago the city of Atlanta inherited by reason of a city limits expansion a two-room, unheated, untoileted Negro schoolhouse.

The school was soon abandoned, its pupils being transported by bus to a county Negro school several miles away — and a considerable distance further than the nearest white school.

On such a foundation Negroes built their case that led to a federal court order Friday enjoining the Atlanta School Board from "further discrimination" in the operation of city public schools. The board was directed to produce within a "reasonable time" a plan for compliance with the court's order.

The order, which will be spelled out in a final decree to be handed down soon, set off a two-way legal battle. The defendants, the Atlanta School Board, will file an early appeal which is expected to reach the U.S. Supreme Court. Strong Atlanta political and civic forces are planning a last ditch fight in the Legislature next January in an effect to win relaxation of state laws which now require the closing of an integrated school anywherein the state.

Atlanta Mayor William B. Hartsfield urged the 1960 Legislature to adopt laws that will permit the Capital city to "decide the fate" of its own schools and pupils.

Hartsfield was renewing a plea that failed to pass when brought before the 1959 Legislative session—a plan of local option on desegregation.

"If the desegregation decree should be made final, I sincerely believe the federal courts will give Atlanta sufficient time to adjust to this situation."

Judge Frank Hooper, in handing down his order to the school took note of the difficulties arising out of such a transition in the Deep South.

Hooper closely questioned several witnesses in an effort to learn if any steps at all were being taken to comply with the 1954 Supreme Court school decision. He concluded, however, that it was obvious Atlanta schools were strictly segregated —despite denials by defendants that this is by official regulations—and said the 10 Negro plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction.

FOLLOWS PATTERN

Hooper also observed that wholesale integration such as Rep. James C. Davis (D-Ga.) testified had come about in Washington, D. C., would likely hurt the Atlanta school system. He said this was not the intent of the current case.

Hooper, probably with the help of fellow Judge Boyd Sloan who sat with him as consultant - observer, would decide on any school plan submitted by the city.

This follows a pattern set in several other states. The Nashville, Tenn., grade-at-a-time integration system was set up by the school board and approved by the federal court. At one time, a Little Rock integration plan was court-approved.

PEOPLE'S MANDATE

In recent months numerous groups in Atlanta have issued statements urging continuation of public schools regardless of integration. But state government officials have given no sign they are ready to relent on Georgia's ironclad race laws.

The state contends there was a mandate from the people on this score in 1954 when Herman Talmadge was governor. A constitutional amendment authoring the use of state money for private schools was ratified at Talmadge's urging.

Since the Atlanta case hit the court dockets, at least six private school organizations have been chartered. They are expected to flourish regardless of immediate court orders.

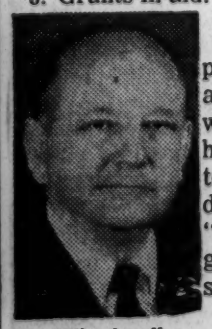
Arnall Asks Placement, School Aid

Constitution Atlanta, Ga. 7-6-26-59

By ALBERT RILEY
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON, — Ellis Arnall said Thursday that public schools can be maintained in Georgia and integration held to a minimum by a three-point program:

1. Pupil placement;
2. Local option;
3. Grants-in-aid.



Ellis Arnall

"We are for public education at all costs and we are going to have it," Arnall told newsmen, declaring that "controlled integration" is possible.

"I want our public schools operated with as much segregation as we can have under the law," the former governor declared.

POTENTIAL CANDIDATES

Arnall repeated a declaration he made in Atlanta several weeks ago that he will run for governor again in 1962 if the state's public schools are closed down because of integration orders.

"If the schools are closed when we move into the 1962 campaign for governor and there is no assurance that they'll be opened again, then I'll be a candidate on this one simple proposal: The education of our children must come first, no matter what.

"Not only that," Arnall said, "I'll be elected, you wait and see!

FEARS DISPERSAL

"You can't just turn loose a million school children out in the fields and onto the street corners, 6,000 bus drivers, 48,000 teachers and 17,000 school employes—one-third of the people of Georgia," Arnall added.

Here to represent law clients at two hearings before house subcommittees concerned with anti-monopoly legislation, Arnall aired his school views in answer to queries from Georgia reporters.

"We can control integration," he said, "with pupil placement, local option and grants in-aid. If someone is so opposed to going to mixed schools, then that state would provide some financial assistance to attend private schools."

SPELLING OWN PROGRAMS?

Arnall said he would not predict what the Georgia Legislature will do next year in the school crisis being brought on by a federal court decree that racially segregated schools in Atlanta are illegal.

He also said he would not attempt to tell the Legislature what it should do. But Arnall appeared to be spelling out his own program if he runs for governor in 1962.

"We are going to keep the schools operating," he said. "I hope they will do it without me," he added, indicating that he does not particularly want to be governor again.

JUDGES WHO HEARD SUIT ON INTEGRATION
Jurists Sloan (Left) And Hooper Walk To Courtroom

Federal Decision Hits Segregated Atlanta Schools

Montgomery, Ala. Advertiser Sat. 6-6-59

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP)—Atlanta school officials Friday were enjoined from discriminating against Negro pupils by a federal court which earlier declared the city's segregated schools illegal.

The injunction was granted by U.S. Dist. Judge Frank A. Hooper who said he would give the Atlanta Board of Education a reasonable time in which to submit a plan for integration. He said that any final order would not mean integration next September.

In a statement at the end of the hearing, Hooper said that his final order would cover three points:

1. That racial discrimination has and does exist in Atlanta schools.
2. The plaintiffs would be granted an injunction against this discrimination.
3. That the Atlanta school officials would be allowed a reasonable time to submit a plan for integration.

NO ALTERNATIVE

Hooper heard the case with U.S. Dist. Judge Boyd Sloan who acted in an advisory capacity. At the outset Hooper told the participants that his court has no alternative "except a ruling to the effect that the operation of racially segregated public schools in Atlanta violates the 14th Amendment of the U.S. Constitution."

This was an apparent attempt to forestall any prolonged arguments over the case. However, attorneys for the plaintiffs and for the city insisted on being heard.

Hooper said he was making the statement "in order to clarify the issues," and that such a tentative ruling would not mean immediate integration or closing of Atlanta's schools.

LOSE FUNDS

Under state law any schools ordered integrated would automatically lose state funds and could be closed by the governor to preserve peace and order.

B. D. Murphy leading counsel for the board of education, said after the decision, "It's my guess the ruling will be appealed."

Attorneys for the 10 parents of 27 Negro children seeking to end school segregation in the city issued a statement, saying: "The court has indicated the specific terms of the decree which will be issued in this case. The terms of the decree, which it indicated, are in accord with our views as to the type of decree to be entered in this case."

'SINCE 1955'

Mrs. Constance Baker Motley of New York, an attorney for the Negroes, argued the Atlanta school board has been studying possible integration since 1955 and should be ready by this time.

Murphy maintained that the plaintiffs had failed to prove any discrimination and that there was no requirement to take any action until the plaintiffs proved this point.

Attorneys for the Negroes said immediate integration should be ordered and attorneys for the defendants denied that segregation is being practiced by law.

Gov. Ernest Vandiver, a leader among those who have kept Georgia among the very few states without integration at all educational levels, rapped what he described as "out-of-state agitators" and "interference from outside." He referred, obviously, to the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People which is assisting the Negro plaintiffs.

Sen. Herman Talmadge (D-Ga) in Washington observed the litigation might seriously damage race relations without benefit "to anyone whatsoever, white or colored."

On the other hand, Atlanta's Mayor William B. Hartsfield tacitly accepted the inevitability of direct integration order, expressed hope the court would allow some delay and reiterated earlier demands that the Legislature allow Atlanta to decide whether to accept some integration or to close its schools.

Hooper recessed court to allow study of his preliminary ruling. When the hearing was resumed, Murphy argued the U.S. Supreme Court decision of 1954 can not be applied in this case because no Negro child has sought admission to a specific school and thus it can not be demonstrated that they are excluded because of race.

Talmadge Introduces School Bill

Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — Sen. Talmadge Tuesday introduced in Congress a bill that would remove the jurisdiction of federal courts over the administration of public schools.

This was the latest in a series of moves by Talmadge aimed at presenting to the nation the South's views on state sovereignty and control of public education.

The most publicized of these moves has been Talmadge's proposed constitutional amendment to give state and local governments exclusive administrative control of their schools.

In a speech in the Senate, Talmadge had very little to say about racial integration or segregation of public schools.

But, as he has done often before, Talmadge criticized the Supreme Court's 1954 school desegregation decision as a judical decree which ignored 105 years of judicial precedent and substituted psychological and sociological "modern authority" for the Constitution.

If through some extremely unlikely development the Talmadge bill were to be passed, it would make the federal courts henceforth keep their hands off the public schools.

The junior senator from Georgia confined his argument to strictly legal grounds and cited criticism of the Supreme Court by the Conference of State Chief Justices.

CITES CRITICISM

The state chief justices last year charged that the U.S. Supreme Court has adopted the "role of policy maker without proper judicial restraint," and has "assumed . . . primarily legislative powers."

Talmadge told the Senate that so long as the 1954 school decision is allowed to stand the nation "will never be free from the threat of judicial dictatorship."

In writing that decision, the senator said, the high court "ignored 105 years of judicial precedent, the clear meaning of the Tenth Amendment and the obvious intent of the Fourteenth Amendment.

"It overruled at least five of its own decisions, at least 18 federal district and circuit court decisions and at least 59 state and territorial decisions," Talmadge added.

"It was unable to point to a single law or legal precedent to support its decision. It could not because there were none—they were all on the other side.

His amendment would add this new section to the U.S. code:

"No justice, judge or court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to hear, determine, or review, or to issue any writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command with respect to any case, controversy, or matter relating to the administration by any state or any political or other subsidivision of any state, of any public school, public educational institution or public educational system operated by such state or subdivision."

Upper Darby Firetrap School May Stay Shut

The Keystone Elementary School in Upper Darby, closed as a "firetrap" last month, probably will never reopen because the cost of repairs is prohibitive, Vanleer A. Bond, chairman of the Upper Darby school board's building committee, said yesterday.

Conceding there was a slight possibility that something could be done, Bond said a private architectural firm had been retained to survey the building at West Chester pike and Keystone ave. The first estimate of $200,000 on repairs was rejected as prohibitive.

The Bywood School, where Keystone's 160 students from the first grade up were transferred, and the Highland Park School, which absorbed the Keystone School's 45 kindergarten children, are adequate to handle the extra pupils permanently, Bond said.

All have been made to "feel at home" in their new surroundings and their transportation problems were taken care of by the school board, Bond said. The teachers from Keystone have been absorbed in other Upper Darby schools.

The Keystone School, opened in 1909, had 12 classrooms. Bond said it was large enough to accommodate 600 pupils while only 205 were attending it and the neighborhood was thinning out, anyway.

The matter will be taken up at a public meeting of the board Tuesday night at Upper Darby High School.

Byron E. VanDyke, cochairman of the newly formed "Citizens Group to Keep a Safe Keystone School," said his group would attend the meeting and oppose abandonment of the school.

Citizens Committee Hits Inadequate Monroe School

MONROE, Ga. — At its regular meeting last Tuesday the Walton County Board of Education heard a first hand report on the acute inadequacies of the present administration and school plant of Carver Elementary and High School.

Granted a hearing before the Board, the Negro Citizens Committee, through its spokesman, Dan Young, requested improvements in facilities, curriculum and pointed to the need for additional space in the combination elementary-high school.

Mr. Young raised several points of concern and the Board agreed to study the notes of the meeting and provide the committee with further information at a later date. In addition to Chairman Young members of the Citizens Committee included: Mrs. Grace Perry Young, Hope Thomas, . . . Stella Simmons and . . . Lena Henson.

After receiving a letter from the committee requesting the hearing the board invited the principal, trustees and a group of patrons to also attend the meeting.

The patrons present included: Castell Avery, John Thomas, Jack Hutchison, Johnny Broughton, J. L. Norman, Moses Btuler, James Jackson, Arthur Jackson and Perry Morrow.

Rev. Joseph Kerr also attended the meeting as an observer.

Mr. Young directed some of the committee's criticism at the principal and faculty at Carver. Rev. Kerr suggested that the committee work within the frame work of the P-TA or school organizations to seek a remedy.

County School Superintendent Clyde Pearce said, "the School Board is interested in the welfare of all children in its jurisdiction and will do everything possible to improve the curriculum, facilities etc., but that the Board is limited in what it can do." Patrons, themselves, he added, "must be willing to help meet their needs and cooperate with school officials in improving their schools."

Vote Group Denies Stand On School Integration

SAVANNAH, Ga. (AP) — Denial that the Georgia League of Women Voters, which ended its convention here Wednesday night, had taken any action on integration in the public schools was made Thursday by Mrs. Edward Vinson of Atlanta, state president.

Mrs. Vinson declared the league does not intend to debate the merits or demerits of segregation but believes the citizens of Georgia can find a way to "preserve the public schools in Georgia which will be legal and at the same time preferable to closing the schools . . ."

The public school section of a two-year program adopted by the league at an executive meeting of delegates Wednesday was announced by Mrs. Vinson as follows:

"Education. Promotion of citizen responsibility for measures to preserve and improve public schools in Georgia."

Mrs. Vinson said the program was adopted unanimously.

Discussing the program to guide the league during the next two years, Mrs. Vinson, who was re-elected president Wednesday night, said it contained four principal items.

Relative to the section on education, she said, the league has taken no position on segregation or integration and does not intend to debate the merits or demerits of segregation. "We believe the citizens of Georgia are as capable as the citizens of North Carolina, Virginia, South Carolina and Tennessee, and can find a way to preserve the public schools which will be legal and at the same time preferable to closing the schools and thus denying to the vast majority of children in Georgia a chance for education. We think an educated, intelligent citizenry is at the heart of the southern way of life.

"The league has no formula. We do not know how this can be done but we are really confident that when the people of Georgia know the facts and understand the real meaning of the ruling of the supreme court we can work out a solution.

"We will work to bring out the facts and promote discussions, as we believe all people should discuss all sides of this issue. We think that if the people of Georgia really want no public schools they should fully evaluate the consequences of closing the schools and should be completely informed about various ways in which the schools can be maintained."

The league, in the matter of legislation, urged more equitable representation, more effective organization and procedure; and in elections it advocated an equitable system and commended Sens. Russell and Talmadge for their advocacy of an adjustment of the county unit system.

Bishop Waters Comments

Atlanta Mayor Predicts Ga. Would Close Schools

SOUTH BEND, Ind. (AP)—If a showdown comes, Georgia state officials will close public schools rather than integrate the races, Mayor William B. Hartsfield of Atlanta predicted Saturday.

Speaking over a special telephone circuit to a desegregation symposium at the University of Notre Dame Law School, Hartsfield said Georgia's "best minds have been largely silent, while the demagogues have been active for many years."

The southern mayor described himself as a moderate and said the U. S. Supreme Court's 1954 desegregation decision "must be recognized as an accomplished fact and the law of the land."

"The most important thing is not how fast we're moving in school desegregation, but in what direction," he said.

Placement Boards.

Mayor Hartsfield suggested creation of placement boards to examine capabilities of Negro children during a gradual procedure of school integration, because "any unwise, ill-considered mixing up of children, disregarding their capabilities, would cause harm."

Two southern clergymen at the symposium emphasized church responsibilities in desegregation. Bishop Vincent S. Waters, Raleigh, N. C., described interracial banquets and sports events arranged since he banned segregation in the churches of his diocese in 1953.

"Occasions must be created which improve racial relationships, each a further step in the right direction," Bishop Waters said. "Segregation is a morally wrong and sinful practice which may not be approved by any Catholic."

The Rev. J. J. Murray, former Moderator of the Virginia Presbyterian Synod, warned, "a segregated church cannot speak with any sincerity or power about integration in education. The first duty of the churches is to refuse to assist in any effort to evade or delay the process of integration in our public schools.

"In this, as in all human relationships, it is not a battle which we are trying to win, but a fellowship which we are trying to achieve. Any success here that leaves bitterness is far less than the best," said Mr. Murray, who is now visiting professor at Louisville Presbyterian Theological Seminary.

Atlanta Integration Suit To Open Friday

ATLANTA (AP) — The eyes of Georgia and much of the South will be on Atlanta Friday when the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People opens a major offensive to destroy the city's school segregation laws.

The battleground will be a federal district courtroom. It is the first major encounter in the racial integration fight in Georgia since the U.S. Supreme Court decision of May 17, 1954.

Judges Frank A. Hooper and Boyd Sloan will hear the suit brought by 10 Negro parents.

The state constitution and laws say public schools in Georgia must be segregated. If the courts order race mixing, the state can close the public schools.

Both Hooper and Sloan have issued rulings recently favorable to integrationists.

Judge Hooper ordered integration of Atlanta trolleys. In so doing he pointed out that the Supreme Court's mandate in the Montgomery, Ala., bus case had fixed a precedent which governed him.

Judge Sloan recently ruled that Georgia State College could not bar admittance because of color. He commented that it would be "futile" to rule against the Supreme Court school integration decision.

The scheduling of the case on a Friday has provoked some conjecture that the judges might issue a quick ruling, such as Hooper returned in the trolley suit. The school case will be heard without a jury.

The state of Georgia has not intervened directly on the side of the Atlanta Board of Education. The school board, however, has hired B. D. (Buck) Murphy, whom the state also usually retains in integration cases.

ship is emerging in Georgia.

The unyielding segregationists, faced now with vocal opposition, have accepted the challenge.

"The rest of the State, which can outvote Atlanta, will never permit integration here," said Roy V. Harris, long-time political power in Georgia, publisher of the weekly segregationist Augusta Courier and president of the States Rights Council of Georgia.

"Closing public schools would contribute 20 years to the advancement of education in this State," said R. Carter Pittman of Dalton, former president of the Council. 'Put the child in a chickenhouse, if it's comfortable and with a good teacher he'll get an education."

Gov. Ernest Vandiver and the Legislature are unalterably committed to a school closing program. But political leaders are worried.

Georgians have shown in the ...hat they don't like politicians tinkering with their schools. In 1941, the late Gene Talmadge packed the State Board of Regents and was whipped by Ellis Arnall who charged Talmadge had made college diplomas scraps of paper.

The 3-judge Federal Court decision in the Virginia school closing case last Jan. 19 worries the Georgia leaders.

The judges ruled that Virginia could not close some schools and operate others; it had to operate them all or close them all.

It is conceded that Gov. Vandiver and most of the Legislature might keep Atlanta's schools closed to maintain complete segregation.

But if the state were forced to close all the schools and ou... 00 children, that pos... different problem.

At... desegregation suit led ... January, 1958, by 10 Negroes on behalf of their 28 children, likely will not come to an unappealable order until next year. But if the schools are closed, it is no secret that top white legal talent is ready to go into court to force their reopening in Atlanta or closure throughout Georgia.

Meanwhile, observers believe a bending in Georgia's rigid posture has been paved by its two Senators.

When he was Governor, Herman Talmadge once said that integrated railroad trains would be stopped at Georgia's line and segregated. Talmadge sponsored the private school amendment to Georgia's Constitution in 1953—even before the Supreme Court decision.

iSnce then, he has been adamant in resistance to school desegregation and held the Supreme Court's decision was not the law of the land.

But in a Senate speech on Jan. 27, Talmadge said the closing of a public school system "is a terrible tragedy."

"Regardless of whether one accepts it or not, the Supreme Court's school decision is an accomplished fact which will remain so until it either is reversed by the Court itself or is nullified by Congress or the people," he said.

And in a speech to a joint session of the Georgia legislature on Feb. 11, Talmadge discussed the segregation proposals he has introduced in Congress.

"I would be less than candid if I told you there was any chance of adoption of these bills at the present time," he said. "There is not."

Russell, who also has been unyielding on the issue, had had news too for the Georgia lawmakers. Georgia and the South were helpless in Congress, he said.

"We have not only lost support of many of those from other sections on whom we once relied," he said, "but the Representatives and Senators from the 11 States of the old Confederacy no longer present a solid front."

Out of the racial controversy will come another legal attack by Atlanta on Georgia's county unit system of determining Democratic primary winners.

The unit vote system, based on rigid and outmoded apportionment in the State Legislature, gives tremendous political power to rural areas. To win an election, state-wide candidates must capture these rural unit votes, even if evidenced in rural Georgia changing the county unit system from the unit vote blind, their means ignoring the cities. On the school desegregation stands no chance of election. But the pressure from grow... more temperate attitude on ... chance on having it destroyed ... the school question would be ... candidate who is ... mounting in another court test.

Even With Some Desegregation

Sentiment Seen Growing in Georgia To Preserve Public School System

By Robert E. Baker
Staff Reporter

ATLANTA, Ga.—A growing number of Georgians are speaking out for the preservation of public schools even though this means some desegregation.

This is a significant development in a state where, until recently, tolk about accepting any school desegregation was not tolerated and those who thought about it sat in quiet.

Accelerating this change was collapse of "massive resistance" in Virginia, traditional symbol of leadership in the South.

Sobering to many Georgians, too, were speeches by Sen. Herman E. Talmadge (D-Ga.) and Sen. Richard B. Russell (D-Ga.). Stripped of their defiant verbiage, these speeches were solemn appraisals that Georgia and the South were losing their battle.

Out of the Georgia controversy may come some desegregation in public schools and end of the 40-year-old county unit system of voting and lopsided apportionment which has strangled the urban and more temperate voices.

Center of the controversy is Atlanta, founded as a brash business town with a a plantation heritage and now the industrial, business, trading and educational hub of the South east.

Here is a city with 550,000 population, a reputation as the most liberal city in the deep south, with a metropolitan area fast approaching a million persons from all sections of the Nation.

As Arlington and Norfolk in Virginia and Miami in Florida, bustling Atlanta is suspect by the politically power rural areas. The city's fight for more representation has been long.

As in the case of Virginia's "massive resistance," the state has imposed an inflexible no intergration anywhere policy of school closing to thwart desegregation.

Fulton County (Altanta) legislators were rebuffed when they attempted to get a pupil assignment program through the recent session of the state legislature.

Mayor William B. Hartsfield of Atlanta has pleaded that his people be allowed to vote on whether to slose schools, rather than desegregate. He desegregated the public golf courses here upon court orders in defiance of then Gov. Marvin Griffin who suggested the greens and fairways, instead, be plowed up and planted in alfalfa.

More and more groups have taken their stand for public schools: 319 Atlanta area ministers, faculty members at Emory and Oglethorpe Universities, the Georgia Council of Churches, some scientists at the Communicable Disease Center and a significant development—419 private physicians.

White mothers started a pro-public school movement now called Hope, Inc.—"Help Our Public Education."

On March 4, some 1800 Atlantans turned out for a Hope rally which, a few months earlier, would have drawn practically no one. On hand was the Mayor. So was Sylvan Meyer, editor of the Gainesville Daily Times, who said:

"The climate is changing imperceptibly, but changing . . . Those weary battlers who know in their hearts they chose the wrong road in the early fifties sound tired . . . A new leader-

SEGREGATION SCHOOLS ILLEGAL

Judge Indicates Final Decree To Order Plan For Implementation

By JOHN BRITTON

ATLANTA, Ga. (SNS) —

An opinion of the U. S. District Court here Friday made illegal for the Atlanta School System to continue operating At[lanta] schools on a racially segregated basis.

The tentative order, handed down by U. S. District Judge Frank Hooper, with the advise-ment of Judge Boyd Sloan, was the prelude to a final decree that will spell out the judge's order more pointedly.

The preliminary order of the court outlawing segregation in Atlanta public schools was stated by Judge Hooper shortly after the beginning of the trial session now-ing before approximately sev-en hours of arguments from both sides following his tentative rul-ing.

In ordering the desegregation of the schools, Judge Hooper set no time limit regarding when the desegregation process was to be-gin. Judge Hooper said, "The tentative ruling here made does not mean that this court in this case will order immediate integra-tion of the Atlanta Public School to the end that Atlanta's Public Schools must be integrated or else closed by September, 1959."

MRS. MOTLEY

After a short recess, Mrs. Con-stance Baker Motley, NAACP counsel for the 10 plaintiffs who initiated the court action, along with Atlanta Attorney E. E. Moore, Jr., began arguments at-tempting to convince the court that an immediate plan of desegregation of schools should be or-dered by the court.

The plaintiffs' counsels offered evidence and the testimony of several witnesses supporting their contentions that there had been ample studies previously conduct-ed by the Board of Education to permit the group to have formul-ated some definite plans for de-segregation of the public schools.

On the defensive special board counsel B. D. (Buck) Murphy and Assistant City Attorney Newell Edenfield argued against the en-tire ruling, saying that "there had been no proof presented in evi-dence at the trial, or during pre-trial depositions from witnesses, that any discrimination was prac-ticed by the Atlanta Board of Ed-ucation."

Judge Hooper interrupted Ed-enfield's arguments to inject his opinion that "it surprises me that the defendants could contend that segregation is not practiced in Atlanta public schools."

Edenfield continued to argue over the judge's "surprise," that no discrimination was practiced by the Atlanta Board of Educa-tion.

POSITION TOLD

Judge Hooper reiterated his position and added that it was a matter of common knowledge that the Atlanta school system had provided separate schools for Ne-groes and whites for 90 years, un-der the now outlawed separate but equal doctrine.

[illegible] pointed down as to whether he was contending that the Board of Education act-ually did not practice discrim-ination, Attorney Murphy scratch-ed his head and answered, "I [illegible] didn't say that Judge; I said there has been no 'proof' of any dis-crimination on the part of the board."

When asked by Judge Hooper if he was willing to back up his contentions that no discrimina-tion was practiced by the board by promising the Court that no discrimination would be practic-ed in the future, Murphy said he had no authority to make such a statement. Harper said if that promise had been made, he would have dismissed the case from the calendar as a settled issue.

FINAL DECREE

In the final written decree to be presented by Judge Hooper at the earliest possible date, he in-dicated that the decree would con-tain findings of the court to the effect that:

1. Discrimination has existed and does exist in the Atlanta Pub-
2. An injunction will be ordered lic School System; against the further practice of discrimination by the board;
3. He shall order that the board shall, in reasonable time, ready a plan for operation of schools without discrimination, to implement a legal precedent re-garding deliberate speed and "good - faith compliance."

In a joint statement after the trial, plaintiffs' attorneys said "This court had indicated the specific terms of a decree in this hearing, which will be issued in this case. The terms of the de-cree, which it indicated, are in accord with our views as to the type of decree to be entered in a desegregation case of this type."

Placing of Pupils A Duty, Cherry Says

DeKalb Superintendent Urges Education Without Interruption

DeKalb County School Superintendent Jim Cherry said Tuesday it is the duty of constitutional school of-ficials to maintain public education, placing pupils ac-cording to race in separate but equal schools.

Speaking to the Atlanta Kiwanis Club, Cherry said enforcing a placement plan according to race is not a matter of violating rulings by the court. It is the "valid right" of officials to provide the opportunity to learn without inter-to learn, he said.

Urging the continuation of con-stitutional safeguards to public education, Cherry pointed out that economists and political leaders "have accepted public education as the way to train people not only to produce wealth but to con-trol and use it in an orderly fashion."

Cherry pointed to illiteracy which once flourished in Georgia and the South due to the lack of public schooling. He also pro-posed:

1. The reaffirmation of the state's constitutional guarantees to adequate education for all.

2. Uniting of energies and abili-ties to maintain, expand and im-prove schooling.

3. Holding officials accountable for providing education to all children at public expense.

4. Revision of the Minimum Foundation Program of Educa-tion to provide adequate finances for school systems on a partner-ship basis with the state.

5. Assertion of the inherent and constitutional right of the state to educate its young people for the self-preservation of itself and the nation.

Relief For Schools Hinted In Atlanta

ATLANTA (AP) — New legis-lative steps to keep Atlanta schools open in the face of a feder-al court integration decree were indicated Monday by Gov. Ernest Vandiver.

The governor, who has declined to comment directly on the case while it is before the court, told a news conference he is watching the matter carefully.

"I might have some recom-mendations to make to the 1960 session of the General Assem-bly," he said.

He declined to elaborate, saying what form his recommendations might take will "be disclosed then" — presumably when sub-mitted as bills.

A U.S. District Court ruling Fri-day declared segregation illegal in Atlanta public schools, but in-dicated some time will be al-lowed to make plans for compli-ance.

A pupil placement law similar to an Alabama act has been pro-posed for Georgia. But Vandiver brushed aside a question as to whether he thought it might have merit.

Atlanta Mayor William B. Harts field also has urged local option allowing Atlanta to choose be-tween integrated or no public schools. But Vandiver previously has flatly rejected that proposal.

Clement Cites Responsibility Of Group During Desegregation

Tolerance, action within the law, acceptance of programs of desegregation which will minimize friction, and recognition that different communities will move at different speeds were urged as responsibilities of the Negro community as the directives of the Supreme Court on school desegregation are carried out. This is the opinion of President Rufus E. Clement of Atlanta Univeristy, an elected member of the Atlanta Board of Education, speaking at a Conference on Public School Desegregation at the University of Notre Dame, recently.

"Permanence of change is much more to be desired than is the speed with which the change is attempted," Dr. Clement said.

The conference, sponsored by the School of Law of Notre Dame University, brought together twelve southern leaders including Senator Cooper of Kentucky, ex-Governor McKeldin of Maryland, Superintendent Hanson of the Washington, D. C., Schools and Superintendent Omer Carmichael of Louisville, and Mayor William B. Hartsfield of Atlanta, who addressed the conference by telephone hook-up.

GROUP SEEKS FREEDOM

Dr. Clement emphasized the fact that the Negro is not seeking social associations with others, but merely individual and group freedom, nor did he see school desegregation leading to "destruction of the white race" any more than standing in line at a post office general delivery window or riding in the same passenger coach or airplane.

Recognizing the validity of the criticism that Negro children made poorer scores than white children on "standardized tests," he blamed this on the separate school system in which Negro children had been shortchanged for decades under teachers who had themselves been victims of limited opportunities.

Dr. Clement counseled Negres to be helpful in reaching agreement on programs which will lead to desegregation with the least attendant friction and greatest promise of community acceptance. Among measures which he would approve are grouping on basis of ability and the establishment of separate high schools for the two sexes, if this would allay fears.

The closing of the schools to avoid desegregation would work to the disadvantage of the average white family as well as the vast majority of Negro families, since these would be those who could not afford private schools, he said.

"The situation imposes upon the Negro the obligation to work vigorously and continuously at the task of upgrading the group from within," he concluded. "Jackie Robinson would never have broken the color line in organized baseball if he had not been better than the average performers who were engaged in this great American sport."

School suit lawyers ask Oct. deadline

ATLANTA — Attorneys representing parents in Atlanta's school desegregation suit have asked Judge Frank A. Hooper of U.S. District Court to set an Oct. 1 deadline for presentation of the Atlanta School Board's desegregation plan.

In his June Ruling, Judge Hooper ordered the board to submit such a plan, but failed to set a specific date.

He had also directed the attorneys for the parents to serve a proposed decree on the counsel for the board which would be in line with his ruling.

The decree has already been sent to the school board lawyers, who have until about Tuesday to file objections.

THE PROPOSED version of the final decree asks that a "complete plan" be submitted by Oct. 1., and that it "provide for a prompt and reasonable start toward desegregation of the public schools of the City of Atlanta and a systematic and effective method for achieving such desegregation with all deliberate speed."

Judge Hooper indicated in his original ruling that no order would be issued requiring desegregation this fall.

A Way To End The Argument on Schools

(From The Louisville, Ky. Times of May 16, 1959

It was a curious argument that Senator Herman E. Talmadge of Georgia offered this week in support of a proposed constitutional amendment to give the states exclusive control over their public schools, as a means of preserving segregated classrooms in the South.

Eleven states and Hawaii, which is soon to become a state, have such a guarantee now, he told a Senate subcommittee. This case about, he contended, through congressional approval of their constitutions. The Southern states, he argued, should enjoy the same privilege as a matter of constitutional equity.

It so happens that every one of the states he mentioned as having exclusive control of their schools operates integrated classrooms. That fact alone leaves his argument rather pointless.

AN ABRIDGEMENT OF RIGHTS

The sort of control Mr. Talmadge is advocating would amount to an abridgement of the equal-protection guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment on which the Supreme Court based its 1954 decision outlawing segregation in public schools. We can't imagine how Congress' approval of a state's constitution could possibly abridge any part of the United States Constitution.

Certainly if any of the 11 states on the Senator's list tried to establish segregated schools, they would hear from the court quickly enough. They may enjoy exclusive control in other matters of school policy, but their immunity from what the higher court has said is the law of the land is positively inconceivable.

This doesn't mean, of course, that the goal Mr. Talmadge is seeking couldn't be achieved through constitutional amendment. Theoretically it could be, but only theoretically. For all practical purposes, such an amendment hasn't a ghost of a chance of becoming law. Surely the Georgian and those associated with him in the sponsorship must know that.

TWO HIGH HURDLES

It would have to be approved by a two-thirds vote of both houses of Congress and then ratified by three fourths of the 49 states. It couldn't even meet the congressional test. And even if it could clear that hurdle, its rejection by the states would be overwhelming. Five to eight Southern states, at most, might vote for ratification.

Actually, it might be a good thing if Congress submitted the proposal to the states. That would be one way of settling the question once and for all. Once the nation has spoken, no longer could Southern politicians hope to delude their own people into believing that the rest of the country, or any sizable part of it, shares any desire to turn back the clock on social progress.

Atlanta's School Problems Reaching Hour Of Decision

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — Slowly the hour of decision creeps up on Atlanta.

Will it begin to send its white and Negro children to the same schools, or will it shut down its school system to prevent integration?

The answer at the moment appears to be that the schools will close if a U.S. District Court orders integration, as they have in several communities in Arkansas and Virginia. Nearly 100,000 children of both races would be affected here.

But the Atlanta situation reflects a difference. For the first time, there is organized and widespread sentiment which says, in effect, "closing the schools is too high a price to pay."

GROUPS PLEAD

Groups of clergymen, educators, scientists, physicians and parents have urged that public schools be saved even if it means some classroom integration.

And, again for the first time, some public officeholders are demanding that Atlantans be allowed to decide the fate of their own schools.

Mayor William B. Hartsfield called for a vote by the people. He said: "If the people of Atlanta want to destroy their educational system, they should have the right to make that decision themselves."

To implement the mayor's stand, a bill for local option is planned for introduction in the Legislature when it convenes next week.

EFFECTIVITY DOUBTED

It is doubtful that these moves can be effective. State laws establishing the procedures can be changed only by the Legislature. And Georgia's Legislature is dominated by rural areas where devotion to white supremacy is generally more unyielding than in the larger cities.

Gov. Marvin Griffin, who was elected four years ago on a pledge that there would be no integration, says the proposed measure "has about as much chance of passing as ice cream has of surviving the fiery furnace."

Griffin yields the executive chair Jan. 13 to quiet-talking Ernest Vandiver, now lieutenant governor, who shares Griffin's views on segregation.

Even in the unlikely event that the Legislature grants local option to Atlanta, it is far from certain that the rank and file of voters would follow the leaders seeking to save public schools.

NORTHERN SECTION

For one thing, sentiment against school closings thus far has come mostly from the Northern sections of the city where economic levels are higher and Negroes fewer.

But Mrs. Hamilton Lokey, wife of a former legislator and one of the incorporators of HOPE Inc. — Help Our Public Education — is among those who won't concede defeat.

"We wouldn't have started if we hadn't thought we had a chance," she says. She reports support for the voluntary, nonprofit group, chartered only last month, has come from all areas of the city. Ultimately HOPE plans a campaign for statewide support.

Most people speaking out for preservation of the public schools see classroom integration as undesireable and hope that such mixing will be kept within modest bounds until the idea is more generally accepted. But they insist that disruption of public education is too high a price to pay for diehard resistance to change in Southern social patterns.

UNDER ATTACK

Segregation in Atlanta classrooms already is under direct attack in two key suits in U.S. District Court, one involving a college and the other grade schools. Georgia State College of Business Administration in Atlanta was ordered opened to Negroes by U. S. Dist. Judge Boyd Sloan in a ruling on applications from three Negro women. He struck down key wording in entrance forms which the University System has managed to block admission of Negroes.

The ruling, handed down Saturday could affect other units of the University System. An immediate effect, as soon as the Negroes are permitted, would be loss of state funds by those units ordered integrated.

Much more significant is a suit filed a year ago by 10 Negro parents in behalf of 23 children seeking admission to grade schools.

Judges Sloan and Frank Hooper have promised trial soon enough for "a decision prior to the September 1959 opening of the Atlanta schools, and in time for an appeal by either side prior to such opening."

115-SCHOOL SHUTDOWN

An order to integrate in this case would bring a shut down order for all 115 schools in the Atlanta system, with its 95,000 pupils. Closed Arkansas and Virginia schools had about 15,000 pupils.

Up to now no school in Georgia has been ordered integrated since the Supreme Court in May 1954 ruled that integration should proceed "with all deliberate speed" under orders from district courts.

Georgia's political leaders are committed solidly to a last-ditch fight against any school integration. They have a stockpile of special laws which ultimately may include one final drastic proposal—outright sale of public schools to private interests. Such a measure reportedly has been prepared for introduction at the legislative session.

But there is growing doubt that such a plan would be legal, just as there is doubt as to how long other segregation measures would hold up under challenge in federal courts.

LEASING VOTED ON

Georgia voters in 1954 voted 210,488 to 181,148 for a constitutional amendment permitting the leasing of public schools to private firms if integration is ordered. A legislative enactment of 1956 provides for closing of all the schools in a district if even one is ordered to integrate.

But a recent ruling of the U.S. Supreme Court struck a body blow at such laws. The court warned on Sept. 29 that "evasive schemes for segregation" involving use of public funds for private, segregated schools cannot be used to circumvent the basic integration decision.

Gov. Griffin has said that the state should cling to its private school plan until it is actually outlawed by the federal courts.

Gov.-elect Vandiver has vowed: "There will be no mixing in the classrooms come hell or high water." He adds that the state won't be stampeded into choosing between no schools and integrated schools, but he hasn't yet spelled out how he will avoid this hard choice. He says that the plans he will offer the Legislature will not include any local option privileges.

Growing doubt on the workability of the untried segregation laws has set the fires of public concern crackling in Atlanta.

White groups including ministers, teachers, physicians, scientists, parent-teacher associations and the Fulton County grand jury have issued statements decrying the prospect of school closings. Town hall type meetings at churches and schools have produced many resolutions calling for a change in the official, inflexible position.

And there was Mayor Hartsfield's stand that a vote of the people should determine the fate of their schools.

Griffin flayed the veteran Atlanta mayor, declaring he "cannot throw in the towel for me or any other Georgian."

Hartsfield stood his ground and said the 1954 vote was based on a belief that the private school system would work. Because of the later ruling against such evasions, the mayor said, "it now is a simple question of whether hundreds of thousands of white Georgia children shall be able to read and write.

"Let the state give us exactly what they are asking the federal government to do for Georgia. Let the people of Atlanta be the jury to decide the fate of their own schools."

State Rep. M. M. Smith plans to introduce the local option bill in the Legislature because "it's now simply a question of whether or not we want public schools. And I want public schools."

Negroes' Suit Will Be Won, Says Expert

ATLANTA (AP) — James W. Dorsey, former U.S. district attorney here and now chairman of the legal committee for Hope, Inc., Wednesday predicted Negroes would win their suit to get into Atlanta schools.

At the same time he said that while HOPE as an organization does not intend to start litigation to close all schools in the state should Atlanta's be closed, it expects individuals sympathetic with HOPE's aims to do so.

Dorsey, who resigned as district attorney Dec. 31, made the statements in an interview during a HOPE press luncheon where the announcement was made that a professional director has been hired by the save-the-public-schools organization.

Asked about the pending suit in which Negroes seek the right to attend any school in the city, white or Negro, Dorsey said, "I don't see how they can miss."

He added that he does not believe that the approach used in Atlanta will hamper the Negroes' chances of success.

It had been the subject of speculation previously that some organization like HOPE would file a suit to close the schools statewide should the governor or ...der Atlanta's schools closed to preserve segregation.

Georgia's Teaching Ranks Feel Segregation Tension

Vandiver Guarantee Hailed As 'Life Saver' for Schools

By [illegible]

Gov. Vandiver's guarantee of teacher contracts in the face of possible school closures was hailed last week as a "life saver."

And if that guarantee stopped 5,000 teachers from leaving the state, as one official has said, then calling it a life saver may have been putting it mildly.

Whether or not you accept the figure of 5,000 as authoritative (and some do not), there is little disputing the fact that teachers have been uneasy — and then some. (Although here again some persons connected with education in the state have said that the anxiety on the part of the teachers has not been demonstrable.)

"WE'RE DISTURBED all right," Mrs. Essalee Burdette said in answer to a question. Mrs. Burdette teaches at Washington, Ga., and is Southeastern Regional Director of Classroom Teachers for the National Education Assn.

"We've been disturbed since about last October," she said. "There's been plenty of unrest and anxiety on the part of teachers. I've noticed it here and at meetings with other groups of teachers."

Mrs. C. B. Collins of Gainesville, president of the Georgia Education Assn.'s department of classroom teachers has said pretty much the same thing.

"All teachers are disturbed about the uncertain future," she said.

BOTH MRS. BURDETTE and Mrs. Collins said they did not know of any unusual amount of resigning by teachers during the current year. But Mrs. Collins suggested that a very real indication of the teachers' feelings about the future would be seen when contract signing time comes up this spring.

"Many teachers," she added, "are waiting to see what happens in the Atlanta integration suit."

Frank Hughes, executive secretary of the GEA, was the official who estimated that 5,000 teachers would have quit the state's school between February and June without the assurance from the governor regarding contracts.

Five thousand is an alarming figure. In 1957 the State Department of Education made a teacher supply and demand study, covering the school year of 1955-56 and the first half of the 1956-57 year.

THAT STUDY SHOWED 1,480 teachers resigned during the whole '55-'56 year. Seven hundred twenty-seven resigned from September to February in the '56-'57 year.

That would mean that resignations in the February-to-June 1959 term would have been about seven times as great as they were during the similar term only three years ago—if Hughes' estimate of 5,000 was realistic.

Hughes said his figure was an "experienced estimate." Some of the experiences that led to the estimate were:

"Many, many letters, telegrams and calls from superintendents and others asking for some assurance to give anxious teachers concerning their contracts.

"ONE HUNDRED to 150 phone calls from teachers asking for assurance their contracts would be honored—in just the three-week period prior to Gov. Vandiver's letter's being made public."

"The fact that resignations have been a little higher so far this school year than usual." Hughes said there were no statistics on this, but that he had been given that impression in his talks with school officials over the state.

"There is a good deal of anxiety on the part of teachers, Hughes said, "especially in south Georgia."

South Georgia—particularly counties bordering on Florida—were cited by another education official as the area of greatest unrest. "A lot of teachers in those counties are investigating the possibility of moving to Florida to teach," she said.

FLORIDA'S PUBLIC school system has been a sort of a beacon to Georgia teachers for several years, however, and not all of the reasons have to do with integration.

One of the reasons, for instance, is money. "Florida," according to that state's educational association's executive secretary Ed Henderson, "has been getting an increasing number of inquiries from teachers not just in Georgia but all over the South."

Florida salary levels have been improving since 1947, and the inquiries for positions are probably as much related to that as to the threat of schools closing in other Southern states.

SCHOOLS COULD be shut down in Florida because of integration—and that issue has not been tested yet. While the state's constitution provides that free, public education is an obligation of the state, the governor of Florida has been given the power to close schools and other public facilities if an emergency warrants it.

In two counties in Florida there are challenges in the courts to segregated schooling.

Georgia's other neighbors don't seem to be having any higher-than-normal teacher turnover, as Hughes suggested this state had been experiencing up until the statement by Gov. Vandiver.

ALABAMA EDUCATION Assn. officials say the number of resignations there are normal this year. "It's generally not a question of anything but money when they do leave," AEA's Dr. W. N. Eddins said. He said most of the teachers that leave Alabama leave for jobs offering better salaries.

The same is apparently true in Tennessee, which has already integrated some schools. F. E. Bass, executive secretary of that state's education association, said the school closing had never been an issue in teachers' leaving there.

Bass said he did not know if many Georgia teachers were trying to get positions in Tennessee schools. "More than likely," he added, "Tennessee teachers are looking to Georgia for jobs, because of the salary situation here."

NOT ALL SCHOOL officials in Georgia are alarmed — at least, not publicly alarmed—about teacher unrest. According to school superintendents there seems to be little unrest in the larger cities.

Miss Ira Jarrell, Atlanta's school superintendent, said last week that there was not a single vacancy in the system. She added that teachers did not appear worried. Turnover in teacher employment was not higher than in former years, she said.

William Henry Shaw, superintendent of Columbus-Muscogee schools, said the number of resignations this year had been less than in the past.

GEORGIA ASKED TO STRENGTHEN SEGREGATION

Six Bills Are Offered by Gov. Vandiver

Atlanta, Jan. 15 (AP)—Six bills "designed to strengthen our position in the fight to preserve segregated schools in Georgia," were placed before the General Assembly Thursday by Gov. Ernest Vandiver.

In his first speech to the legislature, Vandiver said he "has no intention of turning Georgia schools and colleges over to the federal government for any purpose, anywhere, at any time during the next four years."

Could Close Schools

The six segration proposals proposed by Vandiver would:

1. Authorize the governor to close a single public school if it is ordered to be integrated, and to close the school attended by the pupil seeking integration.

2. Prohibit any political subdivision having an independent school system from levying ad valorem taxes to support mixed schools. This would keep such systems from attempting to operate their schools with local funds if state funds are cut off.

3. Permit the governor to designate legal counsel in school cases, and to pay fees and expenses of counsel and court costs.

Age Limits Set Up

4. Set age limits on prospective university system students except where special dispensation is made. This would be a bar to one of the three Negro women who successfully brought a suit against Georgia state college of business administration. She is more than 40 years old.

5. Authorize the governor to close any unit of the university system to preserve the peace.

6. Allow taxpayers credit on their state income tax for contributions to private schools. This would facilitate the setting up of schools such as are now in operation in Little Rock, Ark.

Nine children perish as bus sinks in pond

TIFTON, Ga., March 3—(AP)—A school bus carrying 86 children careened off a road into a farm pond today, drowning nine of the children.

Five girls and four boys ranging from 5 to 15 lost their lives as the terrified children fought to reach windows of the half submerged bus.

The vehicle, bringing the Negro pupils to schools here, hit a rut and slipped into the pond at 8:40 a.m.

TWO BOYS in the bus managed to open a window and crawl out. They, with two white men who saw the accident, broke windows and hauled all of the children out.

Thirty-eight of the children were brought to Tift County Hospital. All were released after first aid except three suffering shock.

Doyle Jones, 38, Negro, the driver, said the bus went out of control after hitting the rut and the wheels seemed to lock.

JAMES COLLINS, 17, and Oscar Holt, 15, first out of the bus, started pulling others out through the windows. They were joined by Carl Lowry and Charles Ahrens, first white men on the scene.

One mother fainted after viewing the body of her child. Others became hysterical.

Jack Withers, a farmer, saw the accident and summoned the State Patrol and ambulances. He joined others in giving artificial respiration to the victims. Withers said the bus was traveling about 30 miles an hour when it left the road.

Possible School Close Hit by GEA President

Atlanta Constitution

Constitution State News Service

DALTON, Ga.—To abolish public education would deprive a possible 90 per cent of the people of an education, a noted educational leader declared here this week.

Randall Minor, president of Shorter College and now serving as president of the Georgia Education Assn., made this prediction in a speech before the Dalton Rotary Club.

Minor also declared that the answer to maintaining public segregated schools has not been found, and that a solution to the present crisis will not come from the extremists of either side.

These remarks were made at the conclusion of an address which dealt mostly with the subject of private schools, Shorter College in particular.

He concluded his speech with a plea for prayers for a leader to steer us through the crisis in the right direction, saying that our survival depends upon human relationship at home and abroad.

"We are getting a bargain in public education," the educator of 30 years declared.

There are now about 10,000 students enrolled in private colleges in Georgia. The estimated cost to keep these students in school, not counting the capital outlay, is about $8 million annually.

Minor was introduced by Charles E. Bowen, a long-time friend and associate. The program was arranged by Norman Burkett. Two new members were introduced to the club, Dr. Robert W. Jackson and Bill Eakes.

Indiana School Will Get First Negro Teacher

HAMMOND, Ind. (AP) — The Hammond school system will get its first Negro teacher next fall, heading off a federal court suit on charges of race discrimination.

U.S. District Judge Luther M. Swygert dismissed the suit of Mrs. Annie B. Hicks, 22, Hammond, Wednesday after the school board called a special meeting and accepted her 18-month-old application for a teaching job.

Mrs. Hicks' lawyer, Henry Walker, East Chicago, said the hiring "proves to our satisfaction that there is no discrimination in the Hammond school system." There are 800 teachers in the system.

Her job application was rejected in June, 1958. She taught in the fifth grade of Gary school in 1958-59 and had sued for $1,500 damages for the expense of her travel between the neighboring

COLP'S SCHOOL ILLS LAID TO NEGRO BOARD

Tribune Chicago Ill. Wed. 9-23-59

State Orders Group to Revise Program

[Chicago Tribune Press Service]

Springfield, Ill., Sept. 22—George T. Wilkins, state superintendent of public instruction, said Tuesday that his top executives found that mismanagement by an all-Negro board of education is the chief cause of difficulties facing the Colp school district in Williamson county.

The Colp officials, all of whom are on relief, have been ordered to follow a reorganization program that could lead to probational recognition and restoration of state grants in February, Wilkins said they have promised to cooperate.

Lacks Direct Power

The state school official said he does not have direct power to force school integration in Williamson county. The ultimate solution, he told a reporter, would be consolidation that would have the Herrin district absorb Colp and other small grade districts. Residents of the Herrin and Colp districts have voted for consolidation, which was blocked by opposition in the other districts, which are all-white.

The Illinois branch of the National Association for Advancement of Colored People has complained that segregation has been allowed to exist in Colp.

Make 2 Inspection Trips

Part of the blame was placed on the Negro school board in a report by Guy E. Cornwell, Wilkins' first assistant; Kenneth H. Lemmer, legal adviser, and Joshua Johnson, a high school supervisor, who made two trips to Williamson county to study the situation. Johnson, former principal in Madison county, is the first Negro school supervisor to be appointed in Illinois.

The Colp school now has 43 Negro and two white students. Since 1957, when the white minority of three members resigned from the seven man board, most white students have boycotted the school. In two years, 18 white families with 41 children have moved out of the economically depressed coal mining area. The six incumbent board members are either unemployed or disabled, and all are on relief.

Orders Salary Cut

Wilkins sent Cornwell, Lemmer and Johnson to survey the Colp situation Aug. 27 and again last week-end. They ordered that the board reduce the salary of Secretary Abel Williams from $35 to $5 a month. His duties are to write minutes of board meetings.

Integration of the board by getting white members to serve also was recommended. Wilkins said the Negro incumbents agreed, but that former white members had refused to serve again.

Order School Abandoned

Also recommended was the abandment of the deteriorated school building, with classes to be held in a former white high school which can be rehabilitated. Colp children attend high school in Herrin.

Appointment of an additional teacher and integration of the faculty also was recommended. The school now has two Negro teachers.

Leslie Stilley, county superintendent of schools in Herrin, agreed to take over educational leadership by close supervision at Colp.

Urge Bond Issue

Other recommendations were for improvement of equipment and supplies and for a bond issue that would create a working cash fund and enable the school to continue operation until state aid can be made available.

Property valuations and potential bonding power are higher in the Colp district than in surrounding areas.

Cornwell and Lemmer said they have talked twice to officials of the Sunnywide district, which separates Colp from Herrin and which has been against consolidation. They said that Sunnywide has a poor school that would benefit by a general reorganization.

SMALL STATE HIGH SCHOOLS FACE PROBLEM

Tribune Chicago, Ill. Sat. 10-3-59.

Can Lose Recognition, Wilkins Contends

Springfield, Ill., Oct. 2 (AP)—A 1959 legislative enactment threatens small Illinois high schools.

The general assembly ruled a high school must have at least 60 pupils—it used to be 36—to be eligible for state aid.

Therefore, does the state school superintendent have authority to deny recognition to high schools with less than 60 pupils in average daily attendance?

State School Supt. George T. Wilkins said yes and promised a specific policy statement this month.

Twenty-five to 30 schools mostly in northern Illinois fall in this category, he estimated.

His assistant, Guy Cornwell said they could not be identified until their application for recognition were received.

Any high school district which is not recognized for two consecutive years must be dissolved.

Storms brewed recently when Wilkins withdrew recognition from two small high schools in Bureau county each with less than 60 pupils.

Wilkins rescinded the actions because he found that formal recognition from his office had gone to the same schools, a few weeks earlier.

Could Bar Other Funds

The reprieves also restored transportation funds which Wilkins withheld after he denied recognition. After denying recognition, the state suprintendent also would have authority to deny vocational and homemaking training funds.

A school that had never applied for state aid could be denied recognition under the Wilkins policy, critics said.

On the basis of present figures, nine high schools in Bureau, Putnam, and LaSalle counties would go out of existence in 1960 under the ruling.

Wilkins said he is willing to have his attitude challenged in a friendly suit. A test cannot come until applications for recognition are received next June 30.

"Must Take Stand"

"The public wants larger and better schools," Wilkins told a reporer. "We have to take a stand to raise standards of education."

A minimum average daily attendance of 15 for elementary schools has been set. Since 1945, schools districts have been reduced from 11,000 to 1,725.

"If the legislature won't give financial aid to a school with less than 60 pupils," Cornwell said, "it's the belief of this office that it should not recognize the school's program as effective.

"Doesn't Guarantee Quality"

"There isn't anyone in Wilkins' office who would say bigness in istelf guarantees quality. But we do believe bigness — how big, I don't know — will offer opportunities that small schools cannot provide."

Reinhard Gerdes, member of the board of education of Bureau Township High school with 34.26 pupils in average daily attendance commented during his school's controversy with Wilkins' office:

"We don't think that all the advantages for our children lie with bigness. Smallness has some very definite advantages too."

NEGRO SCHOOL PRINCIPAL IS ABLE EDUCATOR

BY ROI OTTLEY

Byron C. Minor, a World War II veteran and an educator for 20 years, heads Drew Elementary school, one of the newest south side institutions erected by the board of education.

Minor

His school, built at a cost of $900,000 and named after a distinguished Negro scientist, Dr. Charles Richard Drew, who developed the Red Cross blood bank, has a staff of 32, including 25 faculty members, and a student body of 800.

Has 22 Classrooms

The Drew school, which operates on a yearly budget of $191,500, has 22 classrooms, a combination gymnasium, assembly hall, and lunchroom, for youngsters attending from kindergarten to the 5th grade.

Minor, who passed the principals' examination in 1953, has been principal since the school opened in 1957. To serve the community after school hours, he conducts a social center program at the school three afternoons a week for children of Drew and Gillespie Elementary schools.

Before taking over Drew, Minor served as assistant principal of Forrestville Elementary school, and taught at Dunbar Vocational High school, and Drake and Williams Elementary schools.

Born in Vicksburg

The Negro educator was born in Vicksburg, Miss., Oct. 23, 1914. His late father, Cassor, who settled the family in Chicago in 1916, was a post-office employe. His mother, Willye, was a public school teacher.

Young Minor attended Willard Elementary school and Hyde Park High school, where he played football and tennis. He was graduated in 1933, and later entered Illinois Institute of Technology.

After two years, he transferred to Northwestern university, where he was graduated in 1936, receiving a bachelor of science degree. In 1938, he received a master's degree from the University of Chicago.

Minor has since taken graduate work at the University of Chicago, and studied education and administrative supervision at Loyola university. He also spent two years at John Marshall Law school.

In 1939, Minor resigned his post as a teacher to enter the army. He served in the Mediterranean theater with the 184th field artillery regiment, and with the 92d division in Italy.

He was mustered out a major, and was decorated with the Italian Cross of War. Minor presently is a lieutenant colonel of the 1st air defense battalion of the Illinois National Guard.

Has Three Children

He is married to the former Frances Anderson, a graduate of Roosevelt university and a public school teacher. They have three children—Diane, 7; Frank, 3; and Courtney, 2.

Minor is a member of the Chicago Urban league's board of directors, a member of the editorial staff of Principals Club Reporter, a quarterly publication, and a member of the advisory board of St. Edmund's parochial school.

Education Chief Names Negro Aide

By SIMEON B. OSBY

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. — George T. Wilkins, superintendent of public instruction, said Monday that he plans to take forthright action in cases of school segregation in Illinois.

Differing with his predecessor, Vernon L. Nickell, as to the responsibility of the state in enforcing school anti-segregation statutes, Wilkins declared:

"I think the major responsibility for enforcement under the law lies with this office. If we find a school district that persists in following a policy of segregation after we have instructed it otherwise, we will proceed to do as the law provides — withhold state aid funds including school lunch funds."

Wilkins said he believes the legislature should create a commission to investigate alleged cases of racial segregation in schools in some areas of southern Illinois.

He said he planned to consult "with members of the legislature with regards to the need" for such a commission.

He told a news conference the commission could look into "certain areas where we still have problems of" school segregation.

Nickell had insisted during his administration that the superintendent of public instruction was powerless to withhold state funds from a school district if the county superintendent of schools filed an affidavit with the state office, as required by law, declaring that there was no segregation of pupils because of race in the particular district.

Wilkins said he has had one meeting with the state Human Relations commission and the commission has promised to work with him in the areas where school segregation is still practiced.

Also at the conference Wilkins announced the pending appointment of the first Negro to his professional staff.

Joshua Johnson, principal of the Dunbar elementary school at Madison, a colleague of Wilkins for several years, will join the staff March 15, as general supervisor and classroom consultant.

In making the announcement Wilkins made a point that Johnson would be a full fledged supervisor and would not be restricted in his work as to district or to schools in a particular district.

"His authority will be the same as any other supervisor on my staff," he declared.

NEGRO BOARD FIRES COLP'S SCHOOL HEAD

Tells Money Problem Since Integration

Colp, Ill., June 22 (AP) — A Negro school board has fired the Negro principal of a grade school which was the center of an integration controversy.

The Rev. Archie Mosley said Monday he does not intend to fight the board's action. The five member board cited "financial reasons" in announcing the dismissal.

Financial difficulties started in the Colp grade school district in 1957 when white and Negro grade schools were integrated in the Williamson county village.

White students have refused to attend the integrated school. Most white students in the district pay tuition to attend schools in adjoining districts.

3 White Members Quit

Three white members of the Colp school board resigned after the seven member board voted, 4-3, to integrate the grade schools.

Colp is a town of 500 near Marion. More than half the population is Negro. County Supt. of Schools Russell Emery said the Colp school will have an enrollment of 50 pupils next fall.

When the school boycott continued last fall, the Rev. Mr. Mosley, 33, said the district would be unable to pay its way unless the white children returned.

Urge Staff Reduction

State education officials last year advised the Colp board that dismissing a teacher would help the school's financial condition. They also recommended that Colp ask for emergency state and federal aid. The Colp district is granted probationary recognition by the state.

The state also suggested the district discontinue the salary of the board secretary. State officials said the Colp district was one of two in the state which pays a salary to the board secretary.

The ouster of the Rev. Mr. Mosley was approved in February or March. It was made public Saturday by a Colp school board member.

The Rev. Mr. Mosley taught in Colp five years. The school now has two teachers, Willie Duncan and Mrs. Emma Carter.

COLP, Ill. — The Rev. Archie Mosley, principal of a grade school here, which was the center of an integration controversy, has been fired from his position.

The Rev. Mr. Mosley's dismissal from the school board was a result of financial difficulties that began in the Colp Grade School in 1957 when white and Negro grade schools were integrated here.

It was during this time that white students refused to attend the integrated school and that situation still prevails. It was found that most white students in the Williamson County District pay tuition to attend schools in adjoining districts.

IN ARCHBISHOP'S STATEMENT

Chicago Desegregation Move Urged

CHICAGO (AP) — The Roman Catholic archbishop of Chicago Wednesday told President Eisenhower's Commission on civil rights that Chicago needs a forthright program of desegregation, not merely an extension "of the boundaries of the racial ghetto."

The statement of the Most Rev. Albert G. Meyer was read on the second day of the two-day hearing in the U.S. courthouse by Msgr. John J. Egan.

The Archbishop said America boasts of many Negroes who have made the ascent into the middle classes but are unable to choose their place of residence. He added:

"We all must wish, work and pray for the disappearance of all disabling restrictions based on race, religion and national ancestry. Such evils cannot easily be terminated at a stroke. We ought to concentrate and insist on the not-inconsiderable accomplishments that could be ours now.

"This, it seems, is the case with residential integration," Archbishop Meyer said. "The Negro middle classes ought to have the choice of leaving the ethnic community if they wish, nor is it rash on our part to suggest that the time has come for practical measures to that end."

Archbishop Meyer called for "a truly free market" permitting the entrance into white middle class communities "of a proportion of Negro families who could only be considered as an asset in any neighborhood."

Members of the commission at the hearing are the Rev. Theodore M. Hesburgh, president of the University of Notre Dame; John S. Battle, former governor of Virginia, and George N. Johnson, dean of the Howard University Law School.

Segregation

Promises To Withhold Funds From Violators

State Superintendent of Public Instruction George T. Wilkins said in Springfield this week he would make a full investigation of charges that segregation is being practiced in schools in about 15 Illinois counties.

Wilkins said the charges were made by Dr. L. H. Holman, Joliet, of the Illinois branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Wilkins said, "If we determine that segregation actually exists we will request officials to halt such practices.

WITHHOLD FUNDS

"If local officials fail to act and make no effort to eliminate outright segregation, then we will enforce our policy of withholding state aid funds, including school lunch funds."

Wilkins did not say which counties or school districts were involved in Holman's charges.

For the past several years Chicago civic leaders have made vehement protests about racial segregation in the public schools here. Officials of the NAACP branch in their effort to end this discrimination have made several remedial recommendations to the Board of Education.

And Rep. Charles Armstrong has a bill pending in the state legislature which would prohibit gerrymandering of districts so that the school are racially segregated. The measure would promote integration in Chicago schools. It is currently before the Senate, having passed in the House.

Gerald Bullock as president of the Illinois Conference of NAACP, was one of the leaders who helped expose the illegal racial practices in the schools and has fought consistently for a program of integration.

School Board Fires Negro Principal

COLP, Ill. — (AP) — A Negro school board has fired the Negro principal of a grade school which white students refused to attend after integration.

The Rev. Archie Mosely said Monday he does not intend to fight the school board action. The five-member board cited "financial reasons" in announcing the dismissal.

Financial difficulties started in the Colp Grade School district in 1957 when white and Negro grade schools were integrated in the Williamson County village.

White students have refused to attend the integrated school. Most of them paying tuition to attend schools in adjoining districts.

Whites Boycott Colp School

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. (ANP) — State aid has been cut off from the Colp Attucks school in Williamson county because of "failure to meet standards."

George T. Wilkins, state school superintendent said the action affecting the school which has about 52 Negro pupils, had "nothing to do with segregation and integration," even though the financial straits of the school district No. 29, probably derive from a boycott of white pupils now attending nearby public schools and paying tuition.

State aid is paid on the basis of average daily student attendance. Wilkins said his action . . (withdrawing recognition and state aid from the school) means the school may no longer participate in state aid and will go out of existence at the end of the 1960-61 school year unless its standards are raised.

Said Wilkins, "this is unlikely because the 65 percent tax rate on the district's $864,000 of assessed property value brought in only $5,600 last year. This, swelled by state aid to about $10,000, was not enough to cover the salaries of teachers."

Financial difficulties started at Colp district in 1957 when the school board voted 4-3 to integrate white and Negro schools in the comunity of 500 persons. Since that time, three white members of the board resigned and the white students refused to attend the integrated school. Negro residents outnumber white residents in Colp.

RACE TROUBLED SCHOOL LOSES ILLINOIS FUNDS

Low Standards Traced to Pupil Boycott

Springfield, Ill. July 28 (AP — State School Supt. George T. Wilkins has withdrawn recognition and state aid from the Colp Attucks School in Williamson county for failure to meet standards.

The school was among 65 given notice of nonrecognition this year.

Wilkins said the action affecting the school, which has about 52 Negro pupils, had "nothing to do with segregation and integration."

He did, however, say the financial straits of school district 29 probably derived from a boycott of white pupils now attending nearby public schools and paying tuition. State aid is paid on the basis of average daily student attendance.

Integration Splits Board

Financial difficulties started in the Colp district in 1957, when the school board voted 4-3 to integrate white and Negro schools in the community of 500 persons.

The three white members of the predominantly Negro board resigned after the vote and white students refused to attend the integrated school. Negro residents outnumber white residents in Colp.

Wilkins, who took office in January, said the school was put on probation last year when it had three teachers for the pupils, all Negro, in grades 1 to 8.

Down to 2 Teachers

The school board intends to operate the school for about the same number of pupils next year, but with only two teachers, he added.

Wilkins said his action means the school may no longer participate in state aid and will go out of existence at the end of the 1960-61 school year unless it's standards are raised.

This is unlikely, he said. The 65 per cent tax rate on the district's $864,000 of assessed property value brought in $5,600 last year. This, tho swelled by state aid to about $10,000, was not enough to cover the salaries of teachers.

Because of the white pupil boycott, Wilkins foresaw little chance of a tax referendum's passing even if proposed.

Owen Integration Hearing Set Monday

Frankfort, Ky., Feb. 9 (AP)—Federal District Judge H. Church Ford Monday ordered a hearing here next Monday on a suit asking integration of Owen County grade schools.

Owen County high school has been integrated for some time, but the county's elementary schools have not opened their doors to Negro students, although a plan calling for integration in four years has been filed.

Study Shows School Gains In Kentucky

'Tremendous Improvement' In Five Years

Citing what was termed a "tremendous improvement" in Kentucky public schools, the Kentucky Council for Education yesterday released a study of the schools which showed:

1. More students are attending school more days of the year and more years of their lives.
2. A huge upswing in high-school graduates.
3. A whopping number of school districts had enriched their curriculums.
4. Vocational education on the increase.
5. An increasing use of vocational aids and equipment.

More Enter College

6. Increased library services in both elementary and high schools.
7. An increased number of high-school graduates entering college.

The study was based on information gathered from 175 of the state's 215 school districts and sent to K.C.E.'s executive director, Mitchell Davis. Some figures were projected on the basis of districts studied and others are actual State-supplied figures.

The council, made up of 175 state-wide business, civic, and professional organizations, was formed in 1950 to interest Kentuckians in improving their school facilities.

Formed In Louisville

It was formed in Louisville by officers and directors of the Kentucky Congress of Parents and Teachers, Kentucky School Boards Association, and Kentucky Education Association, and others interested in education.

Purpose of the organization was to encourage educational-facility studies, promote local education councils, formulate legislation to meet State education needs, and suggest plans of action for member organizations.

The statistics gathered represented the sweeping changes made between the school years 1952-53 and 1957-58.

Davis attributed the bright outlook indicated by the study to what he said was "obviously an improved school program and a greater interest in education by the people of Kentucky."

Enrollments	1952-53	1957-58
Grades 1-8	471,353	487,642
High-School Grades	103,463	133,242
Ungraded Children	951	1,786
Totals	575,767	622,670

Ungraded children are those in special categories—those who may require special attention in special fields because of handicaps.

The 46,903 increase during the period studied reflects a per centage increase of 8.15.

Projected increases suggest that the school year 1960-61 will show a 3.15 per cent rise over 1957-58. In the following year, an increase of 1.87 per cent is expected and for the year 1963-64 a rise over the previous year of 31,630.

Attendance Increases

A significant increase between the 1952-53 school year and 1957-58 was noted in average daily attendance. The figures showed 87.4 per cent attendance for the earlier year and 91.2 per cent attendance last school year.

Total number of children from 6 through 17 in 1952-53 was 682,830. Last year there were 718,158, an increase of 35,828. The number of children in public or private schools for the same years were 590,580 against 653,683, an increase of 46,903. The number not enrolled in school, either public or private, for the years studied was 85,800 in 1952-53 against 64,470, a drop of 21,330 in spite of an increased enrollment.

Enrolled at the end of the school year 1952-53 were 532,797. In school at the end of last year were 586,149, an increase of 53,352.

More Enter College

In 1952-53 there were 16,581 students graduated from high school. Last year 21,856 were graduated. In the first year studied, only 5,104 high-school graduates entered college. Last year's group provided 7,464 college entrants. This is an increase of nearly 4 per cent. For the same years, 1,191 entered some other kind of school after graduation from high school, against 1,657.

No figures are yet available to show the number of high-school graduates from last year who will be graduated from college, but of the 1952-53 class, 1,677 were graduated from college.

In 1952-53, ninety-two per cent of the children entering the first grade were under 6 years of age—a total of 29,760. Last year, 22,766 entered before their sixth birthday, or 31.11 per cent.

More Days In School

Total number of days the average student spent in school during the school year increased by one, indicating better health and less truancy.

For physically handicapped children studied from the years 1951-52, only 23 school districts provided programs. These districts were reimbursed 13.17 per cent of the excess cost of teachers' salaries only.

In 1957-58, there were 78.1 classroom units available for these educable handicapped children in 60 school districts.

Last years there were 46 classroom units for educable mentally retarded children in 14 school districts and five units in five districts for the trainable mentally retarded. No figures for the 1952-53 year were available.

Curriculum improvements or additions since the State's foundation program was enacted in 1954 showed both an increased interest in education by Kentuckians and reflected consolidation and desegregation policies of many school districts, which have decreased the number of schools in many cases.

These figures show a per centage of the districts that have improved their study programs in a few fields listed:

Subject	Elementary	Jr. High	Sr. High
Science	39.7	10.8	52.9
Physical education	18.2	13.2	16.5
Music	34.7	13.2	14.9
Home economics	—	—	10.9
Foreign languages	—	—	23.1
Driver training	—	—	15.7
Mathematics	—	—	38.9
Art	22.3	—	—
Industrial arts	—	6.7	19.0
Speech	—	—	15.7
Commerce	—	—	35.5
Agriculture	—	—	5.0
Social studies	5.0	—	6.7
Band	12.5	6.6	11.6
Sociology & economics	—	—	5.0
Reading	15.7	9.1	—
English	—	—	9.9

In 1952-53, the State paid a total of $861,243, at an average per-student expenditure of $1.83 for textbooks for Grades 1 through 8. Last year, the State expenditure was $1,044,313, or $2.14 a student. The average per-book cost rose during that period from $1.14 to $1.62. The number of books short for the two school years was 1,036,770 for the early year and 1,218,430 last year.

Vocational Enrollment Up

While programs in vocational education rose only slightly in number—representing consolidation figures, total enrollment increased from 28,883 to 40,570. The per centage of high-school students enrolled in home-economic studies or agriculture rose from 27.9 to 36.7.

Instructional aids and equipment showed spectacular increases for the comparative years, ranging in jumps from 78.9 per cent in use of film projectors to a 377.7 increase in the use of music records in school. Over all, there was a 304 per cent increase in the use of all training aids and equipment.

Libraries in elementary schools jumped from 746 to 838, a 10.7 per cent increase for the two years studied. And 151.4 per cent more money was made available to these libraries—from $223,040 to $596,306.

Amounts Increased

Amounts received from school boards also increased from $170,009 to 401,969. From other sources, money received jumped from $53,031 to $167,337.

High-school libraries showed a similar improvement.

From 1952-53 to 1957-58, the number of libraries decreased, another result of consolidation. But theamount spent jumped from $247,900 to $447,428. This reflects a per-student increase of from $1.86½ to $2.44½. School boards spent $202,449 in 1952-53 against $374,393 last year. Other funds available for high-school libraries went from $45,450 to $73,450.

Christian County Negro School Razed by Flames

Hopkinsville, Ky., March 19.—The Pee Dee Negro school burned to the ground Wednesday night.

The 14 students enrolled in the one-rool school near here were transferred Thursday to the Gainesville school.

County School Superintendent T. W. Stewart said the cause of the blaze had not been determined. The comparatively new frame building was heated by a coal stove. It was insured for $1,500.

The Pee Dee school is not expected to be rebuilt, school officials said. Christian County now has only three one-room schools, Edgefield, Brent Shop, and Gee—all Negro schools.

Owen County School Board Is Ordered To Integrate Elementary Grades In Fall

2 Negro Plants To Be Absorbed

By ALLAN M. TROUT
The Courier-Journal Frankfort Bureau

Frankfort, Ky., Feb. 16.—The Owen County Board of Education was directed Monday to integrate elementary grades at the September opening of the 1959-60 term.

The order was handed down in Federal Court here by United States District Judge H. Church Ford. It followed 4 hours of evidence and arguments in a case that has been pending since December 23, 1957.

Owen County High School was integrated in September in response to an order by Judge Ford on February 20, 1958. Nine Negro pupils are now in attendance there. The white enrollment is around 370.

Enrollment Totals 79

Two Negro schools will be absorbed in the elementary integration. One is at Owenton, with enrollment of 35, and the other is at New Liberty, with enrollment of 44. There is white enrollment of 413 in the elementary school at Owenton, and 208 at New Liberty.

A year ago, when Judge Ford ordered the high school integrated, he directed the board to make a "prompt start" toward integrating the elementary grades.

Louisvillian Files Suit

He noted from the bench Monday that the board has not made a "prompt start." To the contrary, he observed, the board has made no cost studies of integration. It has failed to integrate 15 Negro pupils for which, admittedly, there is room in the white school at New Liberty.

And, he went on, the board has not explored the possibility of using the two Negro schoolhouses to relieve the added overcrowding that integration might cause.

Nor is Owen County in a class to itself, Judge Ford added. Other counties have faced, and are facing, the same problems, but with the determination to find solutions.

The suit was filed and practiced by James A. Crumlin, Louisville attorney and president of the Kentucky State Conference of the National Association for The Advancement of Colored People. It was brought in the names of eight Negro pupils and their parents.

Describe Overcrowding

The suit was against the Owen County Board of Education and Howard C. Smith, County superintendent. They were represented by John Berry, New Castle attorney.

Crumlin made his case with three Negro witnesses. His evidence was merely to the point that Negro elementary pupils are being denied legal rights to public education by reason of their race and color.

His witnesses were Lawrence T. Grimes, a pupil; Mrs. Mary Grimes, the pupil's mother, and Mrs. Corinne Sanders, mother of four.

Berry made his case with these witnesses: Smith, the superintendent; O. V. Jones, elementary principal at Owenton; E. G. Traylor, elementary principal at New Liberty, and E. T. Reed, chairman of the Board of Education.

These witnesses presented a picture of insufferable overcrowding in the antiquated white schools. Except for room at New Liberty for six more third-graders and nine more sixth-graders, to crowd more into the two schools would create inhumane conditions, they said.

But, these witnesses went on, there is no disposition to evade the legal compulsion of integration. The board, therefore, submitted the question of a 5-to-50-cent special building tax at the November, 1958, election. A three-month campaign in its behalf was conducted to impress upon the voters the need for expansion in order to integrate the elementary grades.

Special Tax Defeated

The special tax was defeated by a vote of 1,511 to 474. Meanwhile, the board petitioned the court to approve a four-year plan of staggered integration, beginning in September with the first grade, continuing in 1960 with the second, in 1961 with the third, and in 1962 with the remaining five grades.

It was thought, the witnesses said, that Owen countians might approve a second submission of the special tax if, first, they realized integration is taking place and, second, as they observed that overcrowding becomes progressively worse.

But the court rejected both the line of defense reasoning, and the four-year staggered plan.

'Not Valid Reason'

Judge Ford observed that overcrowding, while abhorrent, is not within itself a valid reason against integration. Overcrowding is simply a condition that school districts either must tolerate or overcome.

Nor was the failure of the special tax a valid reason against integration, Judge Ford went on. It simply showed, among other things, that two thirds of those voting are willing to tolerate overcrowded schools.

"If we waited for districts to vote new taxes in order to integrate," he said, "there wouldn't be many integrated schools."

Registration To Be April 8 For Entering First Grade

April 8 will be toddlers' day in Catholic and public elementary schools here.

Parents of children who will reach age 6 on or before December 31 should take them to their neighborhood school that day and register them to enter the first grade in September.

Parents should also take along the child's birth certificate or other documentary evidence, and a statement or evidence of satisfactory vaccination against smallpox.

Registration hours will be from 9 a.m. to 2:30 p.m.

19 Systems Co-operating

A total of 19 Kentucky school systems are co-operating in the sixth annual preschool registration day. The hours, however differ in some of the systems.

The systems are Louisville Jefferson County, Louisville archdiocese, Anderson County Bardstown, Bullitt County, Burgin, Carrollton, Georgetown Glasgow, Greenup, Hardin County, LaRue County, Lebanon, Monticello, Mount Sterling, and Oldham, Shelby, and Spencer counties.

Preschool registration gives school officials information on which to plan for next fall, and acquaints parents and pupils with their school and its requirements. Further information may be obtained by telephoning school-board offices.

Wed. 10-28-59.

A new school named for a pioneer Negro educator and civic leader will be dedicated at 8 tonight. 14d(1) Ky.

It is the William H. Perry, Sr., School at 16th and Magazine. It replaces the 32-year-old school at 1526 Magazine.

Dr. Perry, who died in 1946 at age 86, was the first Negro to become a medical doctor by examination in Kentucky. He taught 50 years in Louisville schools until his retirement in 1927. He never practiced medicine but was a founder and board member of Red Cross Hospital.

Began Teaching Career At 17

He was a 33d degree Mason and grand master of the Prince Hall Grand Lodge of Kentucky. He was a graduate of Central High School, Loyola University, Chicago, and Illinois Medical College.

He began teaching at 17 at the old Maiden Lane School, now Booker T. Washington, and for many years was principal of Western Elementary School at 1526 Magazine. He was instrumental in founding Kentucky State College at Frankfort.

Another son, Bertelle Perry, is supervisor of the parcel-post division of the Cincinnati Post Office.

The children who are teachers have followed in their father's footsteps in being active in civic affairs.

William, Jr., is grand secretary of the Prince Hall Grand Lodge.

Victor is commissioner of the Midwest Officials Association, a former vestryman in the Episcopal Church, and a former director of the Kentucky Negro Education Association.

Mrs. Nevers is a member of Alpha Kappa Alpha sorority, a director of the Chestnut Street Y.M.C.A., and a member of the Falls City Medical Auxiliary.

William has taught 37 years; Victor, 33 years, and Mrs. Nevers 30 years. They all are graduates of Fisk University, Nashville.

The new $695,000 school has 892 pupils. Architecturally, it is unique among City schools with lower ceilings and square classrooms. The firm of D. X. Murphy & Brother was the architect.

The old Perry School will be razed and its site made into a playground.

DILEMMA IN THE SOUTH

Louisville Integration Just A Sham, Study Shows

Daily Defender

14dd Ky

By ENOC P. WATERS, JR.

In Louisville, in spite of glaring faults, mixed schools are an actuality. But under a free transfer system which permits whites to avoid attendance at a predominantly Negro school, schools, for the most part, are either mostly all colored or mostly all white.

Another factor blocking complete integration of the system is the stubborn refusal of School Superintendent Omer Carmichael to integrate the teaching faculties.

The obvious result is Negro schools with a few white or white schools with a token enrollment of Negroes.

James M. Bond elementary school, with all - Negro faculty, has 697 Negro pupils and two whites. The Belknap elementary school with all - white faculty has 347 and only two Negro pupils.

CITE FIGURES

The Stephen Foster grade school with an almost 50-50 enrollment, 370 whites to 302 Negroes has an all - white faculty.

With one exception every school with a colored faculty has fewer than six white pupils. The exception is Frederick Douglas grade school with 275 Negro and 83 white pupils.

Central high, the city's only Negro high school under the jim crow system, still has an all-Negro faculty and a 100 percent colored enrollment. The same is true of the city's three Negro junior high schools — Madison, Jackson and DuValle—they have no white teachers, no white pupils.

Louisville school integration has not reached them yet.

The only difference made by institution of the integration plan in Louisville is that all white high schools now have at least two Negro students. Their faculties are still all white.

Not only is there no integration of teachers in the Louisville system and no plan to do so any where in the near future, pupil integration as can be readily seen from the facts already presented is a sham, a timid beginning at integration, but nowhere near the accomplished fact that one is led to believe from the wealth of publicity given the "Louisville Plan."

OVER PRAISED

Further Omer Camichael, the school superintendent, has been overpraised for a job he didn't do, isn't doing and doesn't plan to do.

In the first place, it was not Carmichael's idea to integrate Louisville schools. In 1956, two years after the Supreme Court decision and a year after the state had moved to comply with the decision, the Louisville school board told Carmichael to submit a plan for the integration of Louisville schools.

As an employe of the board he had two alternatives, either to refuse to do so and resign or to submit a plan. The present status of integration in Louisville schools attests to how enthusiastic he is about mixed schools and how thorough was his plan.

He has been praised and applauded by public and educational leaders from President Eisenhower down because of the "peaceful transition." The peace was possible because there has been very little transition.

There has been very little transition because fundamentally Dr. Carmichael's thinking and philosophy have been conditioned by the era of which he is a product — the era the Supreme Court intended to destroy with its May 1954 dicision.

BRON IN SOUTH

Born and educated in the South, Dr. Carmichael has worked all his life in jim crow school systems. An integrated system is something with which he has had no experience, for which he has had no preparation, and of which he cannot spiritually be a part.

To Louisville Negroes who are demanding a thorough integration of the schools, including the integration of teachers, Carmichael says:

"White parents will not accept Negro teachers for their pupils."

Carmichael "is not sure the time has come to make a start on teacher integration."

He adds:

"The average white teacher is considerably superior to the average Negro teacher in competence as a person to teach children. . . How can a person come out of a slummy, crime ridden area of the city, with poor churches and a few of the things that go to enrich life — how can a person come out of such a background the equal of one who comes out of a more cultured community . . .?"

The most charitable thing that can be said of the widely heralded Louisville integration story is that only the introduction has been stated. We are far from the midway point in the story, far from the climax, and no where near the end.

The end, we know, must be fashioned by a different philosophy than the one which began it, and the hope that the direction of the story might change has come with the election of the first Negro to the school board in Louisville.

Plan To Shift Negroes To School At LaFayette Draws Protests

Courier-Journal

Cancel Order, 20 Ask Board

p 1 - 2

Special to The Courier-Journal

Louisville, Ky.

Hopkinsville, Ky., July 14.—A plan to transfer Negro students this fall to a community-built school for white pupils has drawn protests from citizens in the Lafayette community near here.

A delegation of some 20 La Fayette school patrons met Monday night with Christian County School Superintendent T. W. Stewart to urge that the School Board's action be rescinded.

"We want this plan dropped, so that our strong community spirit will not be damaged and our property values lowered," declared Edmund Burks, a member of the delegation.

Under the School Board plan adopted last week, the 240 white students who had attended La Fayette will be transferred to South Christian Junior High, four miles away.

Burks said some 200 people have already signed petitions opposing the moving of Negro students to the white school.

He explained that citizens of the community built the handsome eight-room school in 1931 and paid for it through numerous fund-raising campaigns.

"I laid a slab of concrete on my farm and gave dances for two years just to help raise money for the school," Burks said.

Study Of Matter Pledged

"Our P.-T.A. (parent-teacher association) bought the equipment for the cafeteria. Farmers brought their horses to the school and helped with the landscaping. Now we're going to lose it."

Edward T. "Ned" Breathitt, attorney for Christian County schools, said Superintendent Stewart was sympathetic with the delegation's request and promised to take the matter up with the School Board at the next meeting.

Stewart himself was out of town Tuesday and not available for comment.

Breathitt said the transfer came from pressure brought by the State Department of Education for the elimination of all one-room and two-room schools.

The consolidation plan involves some 150 Negro students from three one-room and two-room structures, all in poor condition.

Students Integrated In City Up 6½ Pct.

3,704 Remain In All-White Schools, While 3,469 Are In All-Negro Buildings

A total of 84.6 per cent of all City school pupils are enrolled in schools with both white and Negro students. This is an increase of 6.5 per cent over last year.

At the same time, the number of Negro pupils has increased and the number of white pupils decreased. There are 14,756 Negroes—924 more than last year—and 31,848 white pupils—a decrease of 955.

The total enrollment is 46,740, a decrease of 96 from last year.

There are 39,431 pupils in mixed schools this year, compared with 36,450 last year. A total of 3,704 are in all-white student bodies and 3,469 in all-Negro student bodies.

Segregation Off Steadily

The percentage of integration increased only .1 of a per cent from the time it began in September, 1957, to September, 1958. The number of children in all-white or all-Negro schools, however, has decreased steadily. There were 10.7 per cent of the pupils in all-white schools in 1957 and 11.1 per cent in all-Negro schools in 1957.

The all-white schools remaining are Beechmont, Bowman Field, Emmet Field, Jacob, Longfellow, Rubel Avenue, Rutherford, Shawnee Elementary, and Shelby. The all-Negro schools are Central High, Madison Junior, Talbert, and Booker T. Washington.

'Continues To Go Well'

(County schools, with a much smaller proportion of Negro students, reported 756 Negroes and 25,791 whites in 25 schools. There are three all-Negro schools with a total of 887 pupils. The remaining 29 schools are all white.)

In a memorandum to the Louisville Board of Education, City School Superintendent Omer Carmichael said yesterday the program of desegregation "continues to go well."

He commended the "very fine service of principals, teachers, and other workers. Their alertness in preventing and discovering incidents and their wisdom in handling them when they occur keep group problems from developing . . ."

Police Get Appreciation

Carmichael also expressed appreciation to Police Chief Carl Heustis and his staff for their help in handling and preventing incidents. The superintendent continued:

"Two problems we have had are more annoying than serious. One is unfounded gossip in regard to alleged problems of a racial nature or wild exaggeration of small problems which do arise in the schools. There are those in the community who apparently find delight in creating problems for us in this manner.

"The second is the fact that, on the basis of these exaggerated and often completely untrue reports, individuals who oppose the program of school desegregation file complaints with grand juries. With a new grand jury each month, a considerable amount of time on the part of school employees and sometimes school children is consumed in giving accurate information to grand juries. . . .

No Adverse Findings

"I believe during the 1958-59 school year, three different grand juries made such investigations. The number might have been larger, except for an understanding Commonwealth's attorney who helped new grand juries to understand the background from which these complaints generally, if not always, came. None of the grand juries reported any findings adverse to the schools."

The School Board heard a report that the number of free plate lunches served indigents during the first 15 days this school year increased 35 per cent over the same period last year.

A total of 8,706 free lunches were served, compared with 6,420 last year. There were 1,866 applications for free lunches this year, of which 141 were denied. The 1,725 children served represent 679 families.

A total of 57 per cent of those served list State welfare aid as their source of income. The median income per family is $108 a month.

Petition Received

The board received a petition from 150 residents of Hillcrest Avenue, protesting unsafe traffic conditions for school children. The petition was referred to Miss Mary May Wyman, supervisor of safety and special education.

The School Board learned expenditures for instructional salaries this year will exceed budget estimates because of the appointment of two additional elementary teachers, a household-arts co-ordinator, and the payment of $30 to each of 150 new teachers who reported two days early for a workshop. Also the cost of sabbatical leaves may be as much as $7,000 more than budgeted.

However, the additional costs are not expected to exceed $30,000 set up in a contingency fund.

Faculty Integration Causing No Problem

Carmichael Says No Parent Has Asked Child Moved Out Of Negro Teacher's Class

The presence of Negro teachers in classrooms with Negro and white students has caused "almost no specific problems at all," Louisville superintendent of schools Omer Carmichael said yesterday.

He said he had "not had a single call from a single parent wanting his child moved out of a Negro teacherer's class."

Carmichael promised 19 members of the Jefferson County Sunday School Association that the partial integration of facilities which began in five schools this fall was "only the beginning."

'Won't Come Overnight'

"The time will come when we will make (teacher) appointments with complete consideration on competence and not have to consider race." But he warned that "this won't come overnight" and that the school system would not move "at breakneck speed" in integrating teachers.

The Rev. Daniel J. Hughlett, executive secretary of the association, praised Carmichael in introducing him ,but commented, "He has not been as fast as some of us thought he might have been in integrating faculty."

Carmichael acknowledged this and said there were other group which felt he moved too fast. "I am so constituted that I move with caution," he said.

Praises 'Fine Spirit'

He said the 10 Negro teachers now in "all-white" elementary and junior-high schools "are discreet, and were selected for their professional competence and their fine sense of judgment and sensitivity."

He said he particularly appreciated "the fine spirit of the white principals and teachers" in assisting the integration of teachers. "If there is anything in the three years (of integration) which I appreciate more than any other single thing, it is the spirit with which our teachers have approached the problem."

The superintendent said a report on enrollment for this year soon to be finished will sho wthat there has been "some increase in integration" this year," both in the number of schools and the number of pupils in mixed classes.

Carmichael repeated an earlier report that tests of pupil achievement in scholarship over the first two years of integration in Louisville schools showed that Negro children had made "significant progress" and there had been "a little increase" in achievement among white students.

These findings "answer a question of some white parents who feared that integration would hold down the quality of learning by white children . . . There has been progress on the part of both (races) and definite progress by Negro children," he said.

The group to which Carmichael spoke has long been interested in the welfare of Negroes in Louisville. The small association representing leaders of some 25 Negro churches, holds an annual institute to discuss progress of the race.

Has Led In Projects

Mr. Hughlett recalled yesterday that it was to the association that Carmichael made the promise that a new Negro high school would be built as soon as funds became available. Central High School was the result.

The group has also taken the lead in projects for the improvement of health among Negroes—working for the support of Red Cross Hospital—encouraged the building of housing for Negroes, and given special attention to problems of Negro youth.

The institute will conclude today at Brown Memorial C.M.E. Church with a discussion of working conditions for Negroes, health, and housing.

Board Votes To Integrate Teachers in Fall

New Policy to Begin On Limited Basis

The Louisville Board of Education, in a unanimous vote last week, approved a plan submitted by School Superintendent Omer Carmichael that will desegregate the city's school faculties this fall.

The new program, which will begin on a limited basis, was approved in a closed executive session of the Board during its last meeting. City schools in the past have been staffed with faculties either all-white or all-Negro.

Would Help

The new move would assign Negro teachers to schools which have white faculties but a substantial number of Negro pupils. Carmichael stated that some principals and teachers in integrated schools with large Negro enrollments stated that Negro teachers would help them deal more successfully with the Negro children.

The teacher integration policy extends to the entire school system, said Carmichael, which will affect both elementary and secondary schools. He revealed that the exact details concerning the number of Negro teachers to be reassigned and where have not been released.

Carmichael also stated that the matter of teacher integration has been under intermittent review since the integration of pupils in September of 1956. Said Carmichael, "We have constantly discussed the problem of when to integrate the Negro teachers and how. The decision was not made until last Tuesday's Board meeting."

No Resistance

The Superintendent added that he didn't anticipate any resistance among white teachers to the new policy "since in the past he had adways received good cooperation from both white and Negro teachers on any program the board of education proposed."

Carmichael stated that Negro teachers who are most likely to be placed in integrated situations are those who have the "professional competence and personal qualities which we think will insure their success."

By personal qualities, Carmichael said he was speaking of those "teachers not too aggressive on the race question and who possessed good poise, judgement, consideration for fellow workers and all other qualities needed to insure success of the program."

The Superintendent said that the reason teacher integration was not recommended to the Board in 1955 along with pupil desegregation was because he felt that "faculty integration would develope opposition from some people who would accept pupil desegregation and that one big problem at a time was enough."

Reasons

Carmichael gave the following reasons prompting his teacher integration recommendation to the Board of Education:

1. That pupil desegregation has progressed to the point where he thinks teacher integration could begin with reasonable assurance.

2. That the school system has many Negro teachers with the personal and professional accomplishments to succeed in an integrated situation.

3. That the presence of Negro teachers on faculties would give designated Negro pupils a greater feeling of security.

4. And that faculty desegregation would be taken by Negro teachers as both recognition of their competence and a challenge to continued growth that will contirbute to their morale.

Criticism

The issue of teacher integration has bought considerable criticism to the Board of Education and Supt. Carmichael in the past from Negro leaders. Negro leaders believed that with integrated Negro children attending schools with white faculties and the decrease in number of Negro children enrolled in schools with Negro faculties, retiring Negro teachers would not be replaced.

Thus, they said, a gradual elimination of Negro teachers would occur. It would also amount to an economic situation, they stressed, for a minimum of 20 new teachers would mean at least $60,000 to the Negro community.

The Defender, in 1958, published "Teacher Integration," a series of articles which showed the feasibility of teacher integration and why the plan should not be delayed. The series, through exhaustive research and interviews, revealed the following points involving desegregation of teachers:

1. That white parents, as a whole, were not opposed to Negro teachers.

2. White educators would work with Negro teachers.

3. That Negro teachers were ready and qualified for teacher integration.

4. And that teacher integration has progressed in other communities without incident.

Educators Comment

Negro educators here have hailed the Board's decision to begin teacher integration. Most have attributed various organizations, groups and individuals for the all-important step. Included among these were the Baptist Ministers and deacons organization, the NAACP, The Defender, and Woodford Porter, the lone Negro member of the Board of Education, who's conduct as a Board member has been commendable.

Dr. Henry Wilson, instructor at Bellarmine College, who has worked in integrated situations for a number of years, had this to say: "My experience has been quite pleasant and agreeable. There is no doubt that the integration program will work as fine as the pupil situation."

Dr. Charles Parrish, head of the Department of Sociology at the University of Louisville, another who has worked closely with white educators, said: "Of course I work in a different situation than that of the city school system, but I think teacher integration should have begun in 1956 along with pupil desegregation." Dr. Parrish added that the whole situation was a matter of doing your job to the best of your ability.

Union County Integrates Lower Grades, 44 Register

A total of 54 Negro pupils were expected to enroll in former all-white Union County elementary schools this week after Federal Judge Henry L. Brooks ordered the schools integrated.

At total of 44 Negro children enrolled in the formerly all white schools during the first day of school this past Monday No Negroes registerd in two all-white elementary schools at Morganfield and Uniontown.

A total of 871 pupils registered in Union county during the week. Police patroled the school area but proceedings were quiet. State police had five cruisers in the area in case of trouble.

Judge Brooks failed to issue an injunction against the Union County board, noting that no representatives of the body were present for the hearings. He expressed belief that the board would comply and abide by the law.

James A. Crumlin, president and attorney for the Kentucky Branches of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, had initiated the action to require the Union County Board to integrate the schools on behalf of 41 Negro pupils living in Sturgis.

The students, before the integration order, had been traveling from 11 to 18 miles to attend the Dunbar Elementary, all Negro, in Morganfield. The Union County Board had paid for the transportation of the students.

Ready To Integrate

The Union County high schools were integrated in 1957 after a similar action by the district court. In this instance, a court order was issued to open the high schools and an injunction requested by the NAACP was turned down.

Said Atty. Crumlin of the integration order, "They (the school board) realized that it was no longer a legal, but a moral and social problem, but it was necessary to obtain a court order to integrate the schools."

Louisville, Ky.

Continued Crumlin, "They were more ready to integrate than segregate in the schools." The attorney stated that the county was already short of 3 Negro teachers and one Negro principal. "I suppose," said Crumlin, "that they will not hire replacements at this time."

Thurs. 9-3-59

Atty. Crumlin stated that the order "was in keeping with the policy set by the district courts of Kentucky which is essential to keep the state in the foreground of liberal states.

Union Told To Integrate Lower Grades

Negroes At Sturgis Now Travel 12 Miles

Federal District Judge Henry L. Brooks yesterday ordered the elementary schools of Union County to admit Negroes as well as white children when the schools open Monday.

James A. Crumlin, Louisville attorney for the National Association for The Advancement of Colored People, had asked for an order to require the Union County school superintendent, Carlos Oakley, and School oBard members to integrate the elementary schools.

Judge Brooks, pointing out that no representatives of the school system were in court to object to Crumlin's petition, said he did not believe it was necessary to issue an injunction. He expressed the belief the School Board would abide by the law and integrate the schools upon court order.

Recalls 1957 Action

He recalled the court took the same action in 1957 when Union County was ordered to integrate its high schools. At that time he issued an order but turned down the N.A.A.C.P. motion for an injunction against the school board.

"A mandatory injunction was not necessary then and I don't think it is now," he added.

Crumlin had charged that the Board of Education had refused to register "the infant plaintiffs in the public elementary schools at Sturgis." He cited two letters from the board in which admission was denied.

Attend At Morganfield

Parents and next of kin of 41 Negro elementary pupils brought the suit. All live in Sturgis but attend the all-Negro Dunbar School, about 14 miles away in Morganfield.

Two of the Negro children, accompanied by their mothers, were in court. They were Antoinette Lott, 7, daughter of Mrs. Ernest Jackson, and Gwendolyn Brown, 6, daughter of Mrs. Loretta Brown.

Scholarship Improved by Integration

By CHAS. K. PENTECOST,

United Press International.

LOUISVILLE, Ky., Sept. 5.—The social and legal aspects of public school desegregation have tended to obscure another vitally important question involved in the issue: How are the pupils in newly-integrated schools been doing scholastically?

In Louisville, which integrated its schools peaceably in 1956, and still is the largest city below the Mason-Dixon line to have done so, the answer is that there has been an improvement in both Negro and white students—"significant" among the former, slight among the latter.

Omar Carmichael, Louisville's superintendent of schools, whose careful preparation for integration helped smooth the way, says of scholarship levels since integration:

"For reasoning people, who think things through, the problem of greatest concern is preserving the quality of education.

"The achievement of Negro children in the first two years of the desegregation program, as measured by special tests, has increased in an amount which statisticians would say is 'significant.'

"While that was happening to the Negro children, the white children did not slip back, but improved, too, although not by a quantity statistically measureable."

Meeting a Challenge.

Mr. Carmichael added that "improvement in achievement also was shown during the test period among Negroes attending segregated schools as well." (Several schools in Negro areas have remained virtually 100 percent Negro.)

Elaborating on this phase of the survey report, Mr. Carmichael explained the situation this way:

"Negro teachers were distressed because I have said they are not as good as white teachers. They've worked like Trojans to disprove it. That's true in every case.

"The whole (school) system was keyed up to do good work and the Negro teacher was particularly anxious to prove himself—partly because of job insecurity."

The source material for the statistical report on Louisville's scholarships levels since integration came largely from Dr. Frank Stallings, now with the Department of Education of the University of Louisville.

Dr. Stallings investigated the scholarship levels of both white and Negro pupils in the second, sixth and eighth grades of the city school system.

Theanalysis was made of Negro children attending largely white schools with white teachers and those remaining in Negro schools with Negro teachers.

Integration In Louisville Raises Scholastic Levels

By CHARLES K. PENTECOST

LOUISVILLE, KY. — (UPI) — The social and legal aspects of public school desegregation have tended to obscure another vitally important question involved in the issue: How are the pupils in newly-integrated schools been doing scholastically?

In Louisville, which integrated its schools peaceably in 1956, and still is the largest city below the Mason-Dixon line to have done so, the answer is that there has been an improvement in both Negro and white students—"significant" among the former, slight among the latter.

Omar Carmichael, Louisville's superintendent of schools, whose careful preparation for integration helped smooth the way, says of scholarship levels since integration:

"For reasoning people, who think things through, the problem of greatest concern is preserving the quality of education.

"The achievement of Negro children in the first two years of the desegration program, as measured by special tests, has increased in an amount which statisticians would say is 'significant.'

"While that was happening to the Negro children, the white children did not slip back, but improved, too, although not by a quantity statistically measurable."

Carmichael added that "improvement in achievement also was shown during the test period among Negroes attending segregated schools as well." (Several schools in Negro areas have remained virtually 100 per cent Negro.

"Negro teachers were distressed because I have said they are not as good as white teachers. They've worked like Trojans to disprove it. That's true in every case.

"The whole (school) system was keyed up to do good work and the Negro teacher was particularly anxious to prove himself — partly because of job insecurity."

Carmichael's feeling that the city's Negro teachers have proved themselves is borne out by the fact that desegregation of teachers is now beginning on a limited scale.

A relatively small number of specially selected Negro teachers are being assigned to schools with white facilities and substantial numbers of Negro pupils. The superintendent feels that this will "give a greater feeling of security to the Negro pupils."

The source material for the statistical report on Louisville's scholarship levels since integration came largely from Dr. Frank Stallings, now with the Department of Education of the University of Louisville.

Dr. Stallings investigated the scholarship levels of both white and Negro pupils in the second, sixth and eighth grades of the city school system.

"It was consistent that no matter where the Negro student stayed, there was marked improvement," Dr. Stallings said.

"We were particularly interested in seeing whether the white child was handicapped at all when integration took place. The evidence was quite to the contrary — he was not handicapped."

Dr. Stallings said he and his assistants thought there might be something of a challenge when the Negro realized suddenly that he was in competition with the white pupil.

"In interviews with both Negro pupils and teachers, they mentioned over and over again that they feel that now they must show up well if they are going to intermingle. They feel they must hold their own — there is a definite challenge."

Dr. Stallings next wants to study the gifted Negro child, with an IQ exceeding 130, who he believes may have made "spectacular gains" since classrooms have been integrated.

"We believe there is something rather phenomenal there," he declared.

New Orleans Gets Orders

Civil rights body to probe Louisiana voting complaints

Afro-American

NEW ORLEANS, La.—For the third time, the U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals has affirmed a lower court decision ordering the desegregation of this city's public schools.

Two district judges, J. Skelly Wright and Herbert W. Christenberry, had ruled several times previously that students should be admitted to the public schools without regard to race.

Baltimore Sun

These rulings were appealed by the parish (county) school board through Jack Gremillion, state attorney general.

Pittsburgh Courier

THIS THIRD ruling by the appellate court seems headed for fulfillment. The state would gain nothing by attempting to appeal the decision to the U.S. Supreme Court because that court would probably act speedily in refusing to review the case. The state then would not receive any appreciable delay in the desegregation order.

The appellate court also upheld Judge Wright's ruling that Act 319 of the 1956 state legislature was unconstitutional.

This act provided for: the continuance of segregated schools in cities of over 300,000 population; the classification of new schools as "white" or "colored" and the employment of white teachers only for those schools labeled "white" and colored teachers for those called "colored."

THE WATERS in Virginia remained troubled with currents flowing in every conceivable direction.

Gov. Almond spoke for the graduation of the private schools set up by the Front Royal Education Association. He had been scheduled to speak almost since the school opened last fall.

Afro-American

However, when the state supreme court knocked out the "anti - NAACP" laws upon which the "massive resistance" program was based, segregationists called the governor a "traitor" and demanded that he not be allowed to speak.

However, his invitation to speak was not rescinded and the governor made still more enemies when he made a strong plea for the continuation of public education. (This was particularly ironic in that he was speaking at one of the very private schools that segregationists hoped to pattern a statewide system on.)

See full story on governor's talk on Page 8.

IN CHARLOTTESVILLE, school officials assigned 11 colored students to previously all white schools. Nine of these students had been parties to litigation which resulted in the system being ordered to desegregate.

The two other students had not been parties to the suit but were admitted on the basis of a simple application and a complex series of tests and evaluations devised by the board.

One colored student who applied was denied a transfer. R. Stanley Goodman, school board chairman said: "Because he had a physical defect, we didn't think it would be the right thing to do."

White students with physical defects are not denied admission on that basis.

Observers were elated over the move, however, because the admission of the two students who had not been parties to the suit tended to show that in the future it would not be necessary for every colored student wishing a transfer to file suit.

OVER IN FLOYD County, the school board refused to act on the transfer applications of 14 colored students. They said the applications had not been made on official state forms.

If made on the 'proper' forms, however, the forms would have been forwarded to the state pupil placement board. Now, although the board has 30 days in which to act, it is expected to rule on the applications at its next meeting.

THE RECALL ELECTION in Little Rock, Ar. that resulted in three die-hard segregationists being kicked off the school board, came to fruition last week when three persons were named by the school board to replace them.

One told newsmen he was "very much in favor of public schools." The father of two teenaged boys, he said he did not support the view that he "would rather be ignorant and uneducated than to go to school with Negroes."

The three new members are: J. H. Cotrell Jr., a state representative; B. Frank Mackey, a retired police detective now employed by an insurance company, and H. L. Hubbard, a building contractor.

Rep. Cottrell made the statement in support of public education.

IN HOUSTON, the financial capital of Texas (Austin is the) looms testing whether or not local citizens want the public schools desegregated.

The city is actually under federal court order to desegregated. However, state law requires that each city must have the vote before it desegregates; otherwise, the school will lose state funds.

Mrs. Charles White, wife of a local dentist and only colored member of the board, opposed the election. She told her fellow board members:

"I suggest the board sit down together to work out plans for following Federal Judge (Don) Connally's order rather than to go to this great expense to circumvent it."

The board voted against this proposal because, a spokesman said, "if we did not vote for the city- wide referendum on the question, the state would cut off the $5 million we get every year."

A DIFFERENT state with a different point of view is Illinois where an official said of counties suspected of segregation:

"I we determine that segregation actually exists, we will enforce our policy of withholding state aid funds."

This statement, in direct contrast to those being made further to the south, was delivered by M. Wilkins, state superintendent of public instruction.

He spoke in answer to the complaint of Dr. L. H. Holman, state NAACP official, that there were 15 Illinois counties with segregated schools.

New Orleans schools told to integrate

News #2

Baton Rouge, La., 7-15-59

NEW ORLEANS, July 15—(AP)—A federal district judge today ordered the Orleans Parish School Board to present by March 1, 1960 "an over-all plan covering the complete desegregation of the public schools in the city."

U. S. DISTRICT JUDGE J. Skelly Wright issued the order. He commented that the school board "apparently has done nothing to comply" with his directive in February, 1956 ordering the board to end segregation with all deliberate speed.

Wright's order suggested that the board "consider a plan under which the first grade would be desegregated the first year, the first and second grades the second year, and soon until all grades have been covered by the plan."

THE ORDER also said that "the choice as to whether New Orleans will become another Little Rock is not the school board's alone. Our news media, our public and private leaders, our church men, and the public generally will share the responsibility for that decision . . ."

The court, the order concluded, "has every confidence that these responsible influences on our community life will take their places, as they have in the past, on the side of law and order."

Rainach Voices Criticism at YMBC Meeting

News-Item 7-23-59

Federal Judge J. Skelly Wright, who last week gave the Orleans Parish School Board until March 1 to present a plan for desegregating public schools, was sharply criticized Wednesday by State Sen. W. M. Rainach.

Baton Rouge 7-24-59

The criticism was voiced by the segregationist candidate for governor at a luncheon meeting of the Young Men's Business Club at the Roosevelt Hotel.

"Judge Skelly Wright is inviting the people down here in New Orleans to participate in their own self-destruction," said Rainach.

'WE'VE SLOWED THEM'

Rainach charged that the date for submitting a plan for integration was deliberately placed after the gubernatorial campaign. He said he heard "they were told to hold off or else you might elect Willie Rainach governor."

"We've slowed them down," the speaker said. "We've even gotten up to the supreme court of the United States. They handed down three decisions in one day slapping the NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People) in the face. That's a far cry from 1954. Do you think they wanted to turn around? We made them turn around."

The speaker said he regards himself as a Southern Democrat.

"Instead of the NAACP becoming the balance of power in the United States, the Southern Democrats could become the balance of power," he added.

Rainach charged that the state of Louisiana and the federal government are encouraging immorality by subsidizing children.

He said that although he is in favor of labor unions, he is definitely not in favor of permitting the labor bosses to take over and run the various states.

PLEDGES PORT SUPPORT

Rainach said "you should take more power from Baton Rouge and put it back in the parishes."

"In New Orleans," he added, "you've got your port. Trade is the life blood of your city. I pledge to you that I will work with you for the growth of this important part of your economy. You need a good climate in this state so industry can look down through the years and say, 'We can come in and develop.'"

Rainach charged that the Communists are trying to stir up racial hatred in the South. He said it is all part of an international Communist plan.

Rainach said that he is a business man, and that the NAACP tried to have him boycotted.

"But the colored people who were my customers didn't pay any attention. I have 1500 of them on my books. The colored people prefer their own country. And I can't say I blame them. They probably have lots more fun."

New Orleans Ordered To Act on Integration

NEW ORLEANS, July 16 (AP). — A Federal District Judge yesterday ordered that a plan for desegregation of New Orleans schools be presented by next March and said the choice of whether the city will become another Little Rock "is not the school board's alone."

Judge J. Skelly Wright suggested the Orleans Parish (County) School Board consider a plan for gradual integration of the schools, starting with the first grade the first year and expanding each year "until all grades have been covered by the plan."

He noted the School Board apparently had taken no action to heed his directive of February, 1956, ordering that public schools be desegregated with "all deliberate speed."

Reviewed 5 Times

The United States Supreme Court twice has reviewed the judgment which was made final last October 23 and the United States 5th Circuit Court of Appeals upheld Judge Wright's earlier ruling for the third time last June.

"It is now the order of this court," Judge Wright said yesterday, "that the (school) board prepare, present and file in the record of this case by March 1, 1960, and overall plan covering the complete desegregation of the public schools in this city."

"The choice as to whether New Orleans will become another Little Rock is not the School Board's alone," he said in reference to the Arkansas city where National Guardsmen were sent to protect integrated students. "Our news media, our public and private leaders share the responsibility of that decision. It is only with their help, their intelligent and active support that the board will be able, without civic excitement, to comply with its duty under the law."

"Confident" of Compliance

"This court have every confidence," his ruling concluded, "that these responsible influences of our community life will take their places, as they have in the past, on the side of law and order."

Mrs. Constance Baker Motley, a Negro attorney from New York, represented Negroes seeking the desegregation plan. She asked that such a plan be offered by September. She also asked the court to direct the school board to present a plan by August 15, designed to comply with the 1956 desegregation order of the court.

Instead, Judge Wright issued the March 1 mandate.

U.S. Judge Orders City To Have Integration Plan By Next March

By The United Press International

NEW ORLEANS, July 15.—A Federal judge Wednesday ordered the New Orleans School Board to map out an integration plan by next March, and said he was confident New Orleans would not become another Little Rock.

United States District Court Judge J. Skelly Wright told the school board to submit by March 1, 1960, an integration plan "covering the complete desegregation of the public schools in this city."

Judge Wright suggested that the plan call for integration of the first grade the first year, the second grade the second year and so on up the line until all grades are integrated in the largest city in the South.

New Orleans has already experienced some integration without undue excitement.

Many Involved

Judge Wright said that the "choice as to whether New Orleans will become another Little Rock is not the school board's alone."

"Our news media, our public and private leaders, our churchmen and the public generally will share the responsibility for that decision.

"It is only with their help, their intelligent and active support that the board will be able without civic excitement to comply with its duty under law.

"This court has every confidence that these responsible influences on community life will take their places, as they have in the past, on the side of law and order."

Judge Wright issued the order in response to a motion filed last July by A. P. Tureaud, attorney for 39 Negro students and their parents. Tureaud said Wednesday that he would have no comment until he has studied Wright's order.

No Comment

The school board also would not comment.

Judge Wright ordered the school board on Feb. 16, 1956, to end segregation with all deliberate speed. But he said Wednesday that "other than appeal that decision, the board has apparently done nothing to comply with that order."

The segregation barriers in New Orleans were pierced last year when the public transit system was integrated with only minor incidents, although a sort of voluntary segregation has been practiced on buses and streetcars.

In February of 1959, Louisiana State University's New Orleans branch was integrated, again with only minor incidents.

School Board Given Until Mar. 1, 1960

The Orleans Parish School Board was ordered last week by Federal Judge J. Skelly Wright to prepare by next Mar. 1, a plan for desegregation of public schools, and to let it include a plan for a grade a year desegregation, starting at the first grade and continuing through high school.

The case was presented for the Negro plaintiffs by a woman lawyer, Mrs. Constance Motley, New York, assistant counsel, NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund.

There were just 14 Negroes in the courtroom and five Negro lawyers -- including A. P. Tureaud and A. M. Trudeau, local figures associated in the case -- and 24 whites. One of the court attendants remarked that integration cases seemed now to be only run of the mill cases.

No real trouble is expected in integrating schools in New Orleans. Buses and street cars have already been integrated with minor incident and City Park, large recreational center, is now being integrated with Negroes holding picnics and no incidents recorded.

Catholic schools in New Orleans are almost as large as public schools and have nearly as many students. Archbishop Frances Joseph Rummel, head of the Catholic church in the New Orleans area, said last week that Catholic schools would be integrated along with public schools. Thus, they will not represent a haven to which those seeking separate schools may send their children.

Upon handing down the decision, Judge Wright remarked, "The choice as to whether New Orleans will become another Little Rock is not the School Board's alone. Our news media, our public and private leaders, our churchmen and the public generally will share the responsibility.

After Judge Wright's action, Lloyd J. Rittiner, vice president of the School Board said: "We have several legal steps which can be made by March." He added, "We don't think this is the proper time to integrate the schools and hoped Judge Wright would delay his decision until these appeals could be ruled on by the Supreme Court."

The school board's major plan is an appeal to the United States Fifth Circuit Court which would remove the board as defendant in a suit filed by 39 Negro students and their parents.

The Court of Appeals has previously dismissed the board's appeal and the present action now calls for a rehearing.

School Board Attorney Gerald Rault said if the rehearing is not granted the board will file application for writs in the U. S. Supreme Court. The Supreme Court has already on three occasions upheld Judge Wright's decision ordering the New Orleans Public Schools to submit a plan of action for its public schools.

Meanwhile, elsewhere in the state, segregation leaders appear to be grouping their forces. Rep. John Garrett of Haynesville, vice chairman of the joint legislative committee on segregation vowed in a press conference Thursday that Louisiana public schools will continue to operate on a segregated basis if at all.

According to the Claiborne parish segregationist the existing laws are sufficient enough to thwart the court's decision.

What kind of laws does Louisiana have? "Massive resistance" failed to subvert the court's decision in Virginia and most recently the celebrated case of Little Rock, Arkansas went by the boards. Is Louisiana above the law of the land?

Orleans Parish Gets '60 Deadline to Mix

By JOHN E. ROUSSFAU

NEW ORLEANS—The United States District Court, with Judge J. Selkly Wright, presiding, has ordered the Orleans Parish School Board to prepare by March 1, 1960, an over-all plan for desegregating public schools in New Orleans.

The court originally had ordered the desegregation of Orleans Parish schools "with all deliberate speed" on Feb. 15, 1956.

The hearing was on a motion filed by the plaintiffs, Earl Benjamin Bush et al, for further relief from Judge Wright's 1956 ruling which was made final in October, 1958.

The recent motion was made by Atty. A. P. Tureaud, New Orleans, and Atty. Robert Carter, New York; Atty. Thurgood Marshall and Atty. Constance B. Motley, New York.

During the hearing, Atty. Constance Baker Motley, representing the plaintiffs, offered the court a suggested plan for desegregation of the public schools by September, 1959.

She asked the court to direct the school board to present a plan by Aug. 15, designed to comply with the desegregation order of the court.

Judge Wright, however, gave the Orleans Parish School Board until March 1, 1960, to "prepare, present and file in the record of this case" a plan for integrating the schools.

Gerard Rault, special attorney for the school board, indicated he would appeal Judge Wright's order to the Fifth U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

ABOLISH OFFICE, LA. P-TA URGES

Asks Education Superintendent's Job Ended

The Louisiana Parent-Teacher Association Saturday adopted a resolution proposing a constitutional amendment abolishing the office of state superintendent of public education.

The resolution states that [illegible] be appointed instead by the state board of education.

The action was taken as the association ended its convention in the Jung hotel.

RESOLUTION TEXT

Presented by the association [illegible]

Mrs. W. B. Myrick, president, Baton Rouge; Lawrence Higgins, Baton Rouge, first vice president, and Mrs. a Cash, third vice president, Monroe.

The new president succeeds Mrs. George Walther Jr., Lake Charles.

The resolution calling for the constitutional amendment abolishing the office of state superintendent of education won by a vote of 431 to 201.

The resolution read:

"We continue to be concerned that the selection of the state superintendent of education is determined by a partisan political campaign requiring no qualifications other than residence in Louisiana. We propose a constitutional amendment abolishing the office of state superintendent of public education effective at the expiration of the current term.

The state board of education shall appoint in lieu thereof a commissioner of education."

A substitute motion pulling much of the teeth of the resolution was beaten by a vote of [illegible] to 120. The substitute motion was made by Dumont C. [illegible], Lake Charles.

It said:

"We continue to be concerned that the selection of the state superintendent of education is determined by a partisan political campaign requiring no qualifications other than residence in Louisiana.

"We favor all measures that work toward the removal of partisan politics from the office of the state superintendent of education. We concur with the findings of the Peabody survey and recommend that the Louisiana P-TA work toward the creation of the professional climate essential to the implementation of the recommendations of this survey group."

After Mills' resolution was beaten, the original one was adopted.

Opponents of the original resolution noted that it "has not accomplished anything because it says nothing of the qualifications of the commissioner."

The present state superintendent of education is Shelby Jackson.

Another opponent suggested that "making the position appointive will not take it out of politics."

10. We request the state Legislature to initiate procedure for a re-evaluation and equalization of tax assessments throughout the state.

School Mixing Hearing Slated

Alabama Journal Montgomery Ala

NEW ORLEANS (AP) A hearing will be held July 15 in federal court here on a National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People motion which seeks to end segregation in New Orleans public schools.

U. S. District Judge J. Skelly Wright set the date yesterday.

A. P. Tureaud, Negro attorney, filed the motion asking the court to order the Parish school board to present a desegregation plan as soon as possible.

Tureaud cited Judge Wright's Feb. 15, 1956, preliminary injunction enjoining the school board from "requiring and permitting segregation" and ordering the board to end segregation "with all deliberate speed."

The suit charged that since the judgment the board has not made any arrangements for admission of children in public schools on a racially mixed basis.

The U. S. Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals at Cincinnati earlier this week upheld a plan by the Nashville, Tenn., school board to spread integration of its public schools over a 12-year period. The NAACP had attacked the plan, calling it a circumvention of the U. S. Supreme Court's 1954 school desegregation decisions.

ORLEANS LOSES SCHOOL APPEAL

New Orleans La

Circuit Court Affirms Desegregation Order

Times-Picayune

The United States fifth circuit court of appeals Tuesday, for the third time, upheld an order directing the desegregation of the New Orleans public schools.

In a brief opinion the court upheld an order of District Judge J. Skelly Wright denying a school board motion to dismiss the case based on the contention that the board was not a proper party to the suit and citing Act 319 of the 1956 Legislature.

The appeals court also upheld Judge Wright's action in holding Act 319 unconstitutional on its face and issuing a permanent injunction restraining the school board from continuing a practice of segregation.

In the latest appeal, the school board claimed that Act 319 deprives the board of the power to change the racial classification of the Orleans parish schools. The act applies to cities in the state with populations over 300,000 and provides that public schools in these cities presently being utilized for white children through the 12th grade shall continue to be used only by whites and those being used by Negro children continue to be used by Negroes.

NEW SCHOOL RULE

It also provides that new schools erected after the date of the legislation be classified as white or Negro by the special school classification committee of the Legislature and that only white teachers shall teach white students and only Negro teachers shall teach Negro students.

The school board contended that the district judge should have awaited the outcome of a suit pending before the Louisiana supreme court which seeks an interpretation of Act 319.

In this respect, the court of appeals said:

"We affirm the judgment of the trial court. It is immaterial whether the 1956 law is held by the state supreme court to be constitutional or unconstitutional so far as concerns the correctness of the trial court's judgment. It has long been held that state officers found to be operating state institutions or performing state functions contrary to the provisions of the constitution may be enjoined from continuing such acts."

The opinion pointed out that Judge Wright determined, in accordance with the duty imposed upon him by the United States supreme court, that the Negroes are entitled to an order directing an end to segregation in the New Orleans public schools at an unspecified future date.

'STILL PROPER PARTY'

"Since under the act of 1956, the operation of the Orleans parish schools is still confided to the appellant board, it is still the proper party to be made subject to any proper court order touching upon the manner of the operation of the schools under its control," the opinion stated.

On two prior occasions Judge Wright's order to desegregate the schools was upheld by the fifth circuit, and the United States supreme court has twice refused to review the case.

The school board may now ask for a rehearing in the fifth circuit and then, if denied, apply to the United States supreme court for the third time.

The fifth circuit opinion was by Chief Judge Joseph C. Hutcheson Jr., and Judges Richard T. Rives and Elbert Tuttle.

5th Circuit Upholds Judge Wright's Action

Weekly New Orleans La Sat. 6-20-59

An order of District Judge J. Skelly Wright denying a motion by the Orleans Parish School Board to dismiss the case to desegregate New Orleans Public Schools was upheld here last week by the United States fifth circuit court of appeals.

The three-judge court was composed of Chief Judge Joseph C. Hutcheson, Jr., and Judges Richard T. Rives and Elbert Tuttle.

According to the motion by the School Board, the claim was that "the board was not a proper party to the suit, citing Act 319 of the 1956 Legislature (Louisiana)."

The appeals court upheld Judge Wright's action that the Act 319 was unconstitutional, which gave grounds for the issuing of a permanent injunction restraining the school board from continuing a practice of segregation in public schools.

According to the appeal of the school board, Act 319 denies the board the power to change the racially classified Orleans parish schools. The Act applies to cities in the state with populations of over 300,000. It further provides that public schools in such cities presently used by white children through high school level shall continue to be used by whites and those presently used by Negro children continue under their same status.

THE THOMY LAFON ELEMENTARY School (above) in New Orleans will be one of the architectural exhibits displayed this summer at the American National Exhibition in Moscow. The 550-pupil Lafon School, designed for the Orleans Parish School Board by Curtis & Davis and Associated Architects & Engineers of New Orleans, was the recipient of the First Honor Award in 1954 in the National Competition of The American Institute of Architects. In making the announcement of the selection of the Lafon School to represent our country in the field of Education, N. C. Curtis, Jr., partner of the architectural firm, stated that the school will be displayed by means of life size photographs which were made especially for this exhibit. The Exhibition is being sponsored by Government funds to show the Russians the American way of life and is expected to be officially opened by Vice President Richard Nixon on his tour to Russia in July.

The Act further provided that new schools erected since the Legislature date be classified as white or Negro by the special school classification committee of the Legislature and that only white teachers would teach white students and Negro teachers would teach Negro children.

Although the school board contended in its motion that the district judge should have refrained from his action pending the outcome of a suit before the Louisiana Supreme Court seeking an interpretation of Act 319, the three-judge court in supporting Judge Wright's action said:

"We affirm the judgment of the trial court. It is immaterial whether the 1956 law is held by the state supreme court to be constitutional or unconstitutional so far as concerns the correctness of the trial court's judgment."

The opinion further emphasized that "It has long been held that state officers found to be operating state institutions or performing state functions contrary to the provisions of the constitution may be enjoined from continuing such acts."

On two previous times Judge Wright's order to desegregate the schools was upheld by the fifth circuit and the U. S. Supreme Court has twice refused to review the case.

As a continued delaying action the school board may ask for a rehearing in the fifth circuit and if denied may apply to the U. S. Supreme Court for a third time.

The fifth circuit court not only upheld Judge Wright's action but pointed out that he (Judge Wright) worked in accordance with the duty imposed upon him by the United States Supreme Court, that the Negroes are entitled to an order directing an end to segregation in the New Orleans public schools at an unannounced date in the future.

At press time the Orleans Parish School Board had not issued a public statement as to what its next move would be.

U. S. District Judge J. Skelly Wright, in October, 1958, made final an injunction originally issued in 1956 which enjoined the board from practicing segregation in public schools. The judge also ordered desegregation "with all deliberate speed."

Wright's injunction had been twice affirmed by the appellate court and twice the U. S. Supreme Court refused to review the matter before he made it final.

New Orleans School Plea Hearing Set

NEW ORLEANS (AP)—Federal District Judge J. Skelly Wright Thursday set July 15 as the hearing date on a motion filed by the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People seeking an end to school segregation in New Orleans.

The motion filed by Negro Attorney A. P. Tureaud asked the court to order the Orleans Parish (county) school board to present a plan ending school segregation as soon as possible.

The motion cited Judge Wright's preliminary injunction on Feb. 15, 1956, enjoining the school board from "requiring and permitting segregation" and ordering the board to desegregate "with all deliberate speed."

The suit alleges that since the entry of judgment in 1956 the school board has not made any arrangements for admisison of children in public schools on a racially mixed basis.

Tureaud said Negro petitioners have not sought further relief in the past in order to give the school board what they believed a reasonable length of time to take some action.

New Orleans asks rehearing in school case

NEW ORLEANS, July 1—(AP)—The Orleans Parish School Board today sought a rehearing in the U. S. Fifth Circuit Court of appeals on a federal court order to desegregate public schools in New Orleans.

In its petition yesterday, the board said the U. S. Supreme Court handed down two opinions which were not available to the appellate court on June 9 when it affirmed the desegrega-

NEGROES' SUIT ASKS DEFINITE MIX PLAN

Requests U.S. Court to Order School Action

A definite plan for desegregation of teh New Orleans public schools "at the earliest practicable date" was asked Thursday in federal court.

Negroes seeking the desegregation, through their attorney, A. P. Tureaud, filed a motion asking that the court conduct a hearing and then order the Orleans parish school board to present to the court "a complete plan for bringing an end to racial segregation in the public schools of New Orleans at the earlier practicable date."

A hearing on the motion has been set for July 15 at 10 a. m., before District Judge J. Skelly Wright.

In his motion, Tureaud briefed the history of school board integration case, pointing out that on Feb. 15, 1956, Judge Wright issued a preliminary injunction enjoining the board from "requiring and permitting segregation" and ordering desegregation "with all deliberate speed."

This injunction has been twice affirmed by the United States fifth circuit court of appeals. And the United States supreme court has twice refused to review the matter before the judgment was made final by Judge Wright on Oct. 23, 1958, according to the motion.

On June 9, the fifth circuit affirmed the judgment making the injunction final.

"Since the entry of the judgment on Feb. 15, 1956, the board has not made any arrangements for admission of children on a racially non-discriminatory basis with all deliberate speed as required by the United States supreme court . . . ," the motion alleges.

It adds that "plaintiffs have refrained from seeking further relief in the past in order to give the school board a reasonable length of time in which to make whatever arrangements might be necessary for the admission of children on a racially non-discriminatory basis."

It alleged that it is apparent that no arrangements have been made as required by the court order.

Desegregation Plan Ordered In New Orleans

NEW ORLEANS (AP)—A federal district judge today ordered the Orleans Parish (County) School Board to present by March 1, 1960 "an overall plan covering the complete desegregation of the public schools in the city."

U.S. District Judge J. Skelly Wright issued the order. He commented that the school board "apparently has done nothing to comply" with his directive in February, 1956, ordering the board to end segregation with all deliberate speed.

Wright's order suggested that the board "consider a plan under which the first grade would be desegregated the first year, the first and second grades the second year, and so on until all grades have been covered by the plan."

Solon Vows Segregation For Louisiana Schools

Opposes grade-a-year proposal for N. Orleans

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — State Sen. John Garrett of Haynesville, vice-chairman of the joint legislative committee on segregation, declared Thursday Louisiana's public school system would continue to operate on a segregated basis if it operates at all.

Garrett's comment was made on the heels of a federal court order for the Orleans Parish School Board to prepare a plan by March 1, 1960 for complete desegregation of the New Orleans public school system.

Meanwhile the Orleans Parish School Board is preparing legal action to delay school integration as directed Wednesday by Federal Judge J. Skelly Wright.

In addition the U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals dismissed a school board application for a rehearing in an integration suit brought by 39 Negro students and their parents.

The school board lost in an attempt to have itself removed as a defendant in the case. School Board Attorney Gerard Rault said the board would appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Sen. Garrett, in his interview, said:

"Our laws are clear in that our school system, if it operates at all, will continue to operate on a segregated basis.

"We have seen what integration has done to the public school systems of other states and we do not intend to see our public schools destroyed in efficiency or otherwise by even token integration.

"We haven't made any preparations in Louisiana on integrating our school system on a token basis nor do we intend to make such preparations."

Rep. Clairborne Parish legislator said he considered the Louisiana segregation laws sufficiently strong to block the move toward integration in New Orleans. He said at this time his committee is planning no additional legislation.

As to the New Orleans court-ordered integration plan, School Board Vice President Lloyd J. Rault said:

"We have several legal steps in the plan to take, all of which can be made by March 1. We don't think this is the proper time to integrate the schools."

NEW ORLEANS, La. — "If the school board does submit a stair-step integration plan, we will in all likelihood oppose it."

This was the answer of A. P. Tureaud Sr., militant civil rights attorney, to the hint from a federal judge that New Orleans schools could take 12 years to desegregate.

The AFRO contacted Mr. Tureaud in his busy law office.

Judge J. Skelly Wright, in ordering the city school board to submit a desegregation plan by March 1 next year specified that it must be "an over-all plan covering the complete desegregation of the public schools in this city."

JUDGE WRIGHT continued, however:

"It is suggested that the board consider a plan under which the first grade would be desegregated the first year and first and second grades the second year, and so on until all grades have been covered by the plan."

This is the pattern followed in Nashville, Tenn. — it is known, in fact, as "The Nashville Plan."

In saying he would oppose such a plan if submitted by the school board, Mr. Tureaud said:

"IT'S TOO slow. It gives the city too much opportunity for delay and evasion. Actually, some of the original parties to this suit filed in 1952 have graduated from college.

"A great many more of the 39 present plaintiffs will have finished college before the 'Nashville plan' would benefit them," he said.

In filing his order, Judge Wright noted that he had told the board in February, 1956 that it must end segregation.

"Other than appeal that decision," he said, "The board has done nothing to comply with that order."

"THE CHOICE as to whether New Orleans will become another Little Rock is not the school board's alone. Our news media, our public and private leaders, our churchmen and the public generally will share the responsibility for that decision.

"It is only with their help, their intelligent and active support that the board will be able without civic excitement to comply with its duty under law."

Commenting on the possibility of disorder in the event of school desegregation, Mr. Tureaud said:

"The local politicians and also the White Citizens Council have both been outspoken against desegregation. There's a doubt, however, that the occasion will arise soon since the city has ample time to plan and execute some delaying tactic such as an appeal.

"They (school officials) have never intended to desegregate," he declared.

Mr. Tureaud, long active in civil rights fights, is the counsel for the 39 students in the school suit.

He is assisted locally by Attorneys A. M. Turdeau Jr. and Ernest Morial, and also by the NAACP national legal staff represented by Thurgood Marshall and Mrs. Constance Baker Motley.

Mr. Tureaud's son, A. P. Tureaud Jr., was the first colored undergraduate student at Louisiana State University. He is now a teacher in the city school system.

NEW ORLEANS TOLD TO ACT ON SCHOOLS

Judge Orders Board to File Integration Plan March 1

Pleads With Public

NEW ORLEANS, July 15 (UPI)—Federal Judge J. Skelly Wright ordered the New Orleans School Board today to submit a plan of desegregation by March 1, 1960, and pleaded with the public to keep New Orleans from becoming another Little Rock.

Judge Wright told the School Board to file in his United States District Court by March 1, 1960, "an over-all plan covering the complete desegregation of the public schools in this city."

"It is suggested," Judge Wright said, "that the board consider a plan under which the first grade would be desegregated the first year, and first and second grades the second year, and so on until all grades have been covered by the plan."

Judge Wright noted that on Feb. 16, 1956, he ordered the School Board to end segregation with all deliberate speed.

Cites Need for Help

"Other than appeal that decision, the board has apparently done nothing to comply with that order," he said.

"The choice as to whether New Orleans will become another Little Rock is not the School Board's alone," Judge Wright said. "Our news media, our public and private leaders, our churchmen and the public generally will share the responsibility for that decision.

"It is only with their help, their intelligent and active support that the board will be able without civic excitement to comply with its duty under law.

"This court has every confidence that these responsible influences on community life will take their places, as they have in the past, on the side of law and order."

39 Negroes Represented

Judge Wright's order was in response to an order filed last July by A. P. Tureaud, a Negro lawyer representing thirty-nine Negro students and their parents.

Mr. Tureaud said the "whole meaning isn't clear to me yet." He said he was waiting for a copy of the order.

The public segregation barriers in this city were first cracked on the educational front last September, when Louisiana State University's new branch here was integrated, with only minor incidents.

Earlier in that year, the public transit system was integrated, also with only minor incidents. However, most white persons and Negroes have observed voluntary segregation on buses and streetcars.

Conference Set on Mixing Issue

(Special to The Times-Picayune)

BATON ROUGE, La. (AP) — The East Baton Rouge parish school board next Thursday will meet with top figures in defense against a suit to integrate public schools.

The school board will confer with state Atty. Gen. Jack P. F. Gremillion and W. M. Shaw of Homer, chief counsel for the joint legislative committee on segregation.

The United States district court suit was filed a few weeks ago by A. P. Tureaud, New Orleans attorney who has served as counsel for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, for several Negro children.

It asked that East Baton Rouge and St. Helena parishes produce plans to integrate schools.

Dist. Atty J. St. Clair Favrot last week filed five federal court motions and asked that they be heard April 11, 1960, first day of the spring term of federal court here.

Both East Baton Rouge and St. Helena parish school boards have vowed to fight integration moves, both of which had been inactive several years when reopened.

Willing To Pay Big Price For Segregation

KENNER, La. — (ANP) — The Jefferson parish school board, which controls local schools, said that it would prefer to pay more money for a tract of land than it is worth, rather than get it and risk integration of schools within the next two years.

The tract in question was appraised at $71,000, but the school board voted to purchase it for $164,000. It is an 11-acre tract and plans are to construct a school which will be located near a Negro subdivision, Bunche Village, and will supply Negroes living there.

In a public meeting, a motion to rescind the vote to purchase was made but it died because of lack of a second. One board member said he knew that segregation was an expensive thing, but felt that any amount spent to keep "this portion of the world segregated in schools was economical."

Louisiana Next Mixing Arena, Says Gremillion

Jackson Daily News
Jackson, Miss.

BATON ROUGE (AP) — State attorney general Jack Gremillion said Friday the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People has picked Louisiana as the "next battleground" in the southern integration struggle.

Gremillion's comment came after the NAACP asked a federal court here to order desegregation plans from East Baton Rouge and St. Helena Parish school boards.

A. P. Tureaud of New Orleans, NAACP chief counsel in Louisiana, asked for summary judgments after the completion of its New Orleans test case.

The almost forgotten parish desegregation cases originated in 1952 in St. Helena Parish and in 1956 in East Baton Rouge Parish.

Gremillion said the NAACP's "alleged success" in Arkansas and Virginia has allowed them to concentrate on another state.

"However," he added, "I wish to assure the people of this state that the attorney general of Louisiana will resist to the utmost these legal attempts to enforce federal will upon the sovereignty of the state of Louisiana."

Gov. Earl Long said he was "sorry this had to come up."

"As governor of this state, I will do everything I reasonably can to preserve segregation," Long said, "I don't think integration will help anybody."

In the New Orleans case, U.S. Dist. Judge J. Skelly Wright has given the Orleans Parish school board until May 16, 1960 to file its desegregation plan.

That is also about the date the Legislature convenes with a new governor taking office. All the state's major gubernatorial candidates are pledged to preserve segregation.

Tureaud, for years the foremost Negro lawyer in each Louisiana integration case, said he acted now in the parish cases because he has disposed of the New Orleans case.

Gremillion said he did not think the New Orleans case was settled "by a long shot."

ST. HELENA SETS RACE SUIT PLAN

The States-Item
New Orleans, La.

Meeting Held by Parish Officials

Jn. 11-6-59

GREENSBURG, La. (AP) — The St. Helena parish school board met Thursday night to consider means of opposing the National Assn. for Advancement of Colored People's court request for integration.

Atty. W. M. Shaw of Homer, chief counsel for the joint legislative committee on segregation, planned to attend.

First Asst. Atty. Gen. George Ponder has been in contact with Dist. Atty. Duncan Kemp, after NAACP atty. A. P. Tureaud, New Orleans, asked the Baton Rouge federal court to direct the rural school board to file a plan for desegregation.

Louisiana is in the stretch drive for its race for governor, with the Democratic primary falling on Dec. 5. All major candidates, including state Sen. W. M. Rainach, top segregation leader, have pledged their efforts to preserve separation of the races. Shaw is one of Rainach's key lieutenants.

The NAACP filed similar motions against the St. Helena board, and against the East Baton Rouge school board, which earlier this week voted unanimously to do what it can to maintain school segregation.

A hearing date on the NAACP motions has not been set.

While it will be up to the judge, usually motions are heard only in October and in March. If the court waits until March, the main action in the Democratic race for governor will be all over then, since the first target since the Democratic runoff is Jan. 9.

St. Helena was the first target of a Negro integration attempt, in 1952, two years before the US supreme court ruling.

The East Baton Rouge case was filed in 1956.

Both cases long have been inactive, while the NAACP pushed its prime Louisiana test in New Orleans.

A federal court has directed New Orleans to file a plan for desegregation by next March.

BY U.S. JUDGE

IntegrationPlanOrdered Of Orleans School Board

NEW ORLEANS, July 15 (AP) A federal district judge today ordered the Orleans Parish (county) School Board to present by March 1, 1960, "an over-all plan covering the complete desegregation of the public schools in the city."

U. S. District Judge J. Skelly Wright issued the order. He commented that the school board apparently has done nothing to comply with his directive in February 1956 ordering the board to end segregation with all deliberate speed.

Wright's order suggested that the board "consider a plan under which the first grade would be desegregated the first year, the first and second grades the second year, and so on until all grades have been covered by the plan."

The order also said that "the choice as to whether New Orleans will become another Little Rock is not the school board's alone. Our news media, our public and private leaders, our churchmen, and the public generally will share the responsibility for that decision..."

The court, the order concluded, "has every confidence that these responsible influences on our community life will take their places, as they have in the past, on the side of law and order."

1st of 17 School Projects In Integration Plan OKd

The Montgomery County School Board has tentatively approved the largest of 17 construction projects termed necessary for completing racial desegregation in the schools by 1961.

Board members tentatively approved construction of the $568,500 Travilah Elementary School as part of a $3.7 million building program aimed at providing smaller classes.

Educators said the expansion program would provide a ratio of 23 to 28 students per classroom teacher instead of the standard 30 pupils per teacher.

The decision Wednesday night was made during one several sessions the school board is holding on its proposed capital budget for the 1959-60 fiscal year.

Other Sessions

Both capital and operating budgets are slated for completion Tuesday. Other school board sessions will be held tonight, all day tomorrow and Monday night.

The size of the Travilah School was cut by one room and a proposed addition to Potomac School was cut by three classrooms.

Board members noted that the special construction projects to carry out the integration program might be completed in several steps rather than all at the same time. They pointed out that last night's decisions might be reconsidered in later budget sessions.

Nevertheless Board Member William Thomas urged that 1961 be set as the date for ending all racial segregation in the county. His motion failed to receive a second and died.

Await Budget Study

Board members said they felt a definite date for complete desegregation should be set after the construction budget considerations have been completed. Most members agreed with Mr. Thomas that a definite timetable is necessary and should be set soon.

The integration-geared special construction program is in addition to a regular $17.7 million building program requested last November by School Supt. C. Taylor Whittier.

Tentative approval also was given for construction of a new elementary school in the Cedar Grove-Woodfield area. The school originally had been planned for Cedar Grove, but Woodfield residents Wednesday night protested that location. A site for the building has not been selected.

The county's desegregation program was approved recently. At present 60 per cent of Montgomery's 3,136 Negro students are attending segregated schools—nearly all of them in the rural upper half of the county. The new plan calling for coutywide racial integration would put students in smaller classrooms so teachers could provide more individual attention.

Move to Erase Bias in School Laws Defeated

45 Maryland Delegates Decline To Vote on Civil Rights Measure

By Laurence Stern
Staff Reporter

ANNAPOLIS, March 30—A bill to wipe out racial discrimination in Maryland public school laws was rejected today by the House of Delegates.

Introduced by Del. Verda Welcome (D-Balt.) the bill would have deleted the word "white" from Maryland's compulsory attendance act.

At present the school law applies only to white children.

Mrs. Welcome's proposal received only 56 votes — six short of the needed majority. It was killed by abstentions, rather than negative votes. Recorded as "not voting" were 45 of the 123 delegates.

The measure took an even worse beating on a second try by Del. Richard T. Rombro (D-Balt.). Then 70 delegates did not vote.

Two other civil rights measures proposed by Mrs. Welcome squeaked through by narrow majorities. They would abolish the word "colored" in describing certain industrial schools and state teachers colleges in present laws.

Teacher Pay Bill

In other developments, Gov. J. Millard Tawes served notice that he wants the bulk of funds provided in his teacher pay raise plan to be earmarked for salary increases.

His declaration was prompted by disclosure that less than 35 per cent of the state's 23,500 teachers would be assured raises under the Governor's program.

This finding was presented to the Senate Finance Committee by John S. Schriver, director of the Fiscal Reasearch Bureau, the Assembly's financial watchdog committee.

Schriver was backed up in his opinion by Assistant Attorney General James O'C. Gentry, who drafted the pay raise bill. Tawes said he will propose amendments, if necessary, to carry out his salary goals.

A public hearing on the pay plan is scheduled for 10 a. m. Tuesday.

Tawes, Almond to Meet

Tawes also announced that he will confer with Virginia Governor Lindsay Almond Jr. in an effort to iron out differences between the states on the hotly-contested Potomac River Compact.

Maryland has adopted several changes including one to curb leasing, dredging or mechanical tonging of oyster beds in the Potomac.

A controversial proposal to revamp the State Racing Commission was temporarily halted in the House after running into fusillage of criticism from the heavily out numbered Republican minority.

The measure would expand the present three-man commission to five and end the terms of all incumbent commissioners on May 31.

Del. Charles N. Mathias Jr. (R-Fredrick) branded the proposed reorganization "a classic example of the ripper—the old fashioned, outmoded, bossism, machine ripper."

One of the sponsors, Del. Russell O. Hickman (D-Worcester) conceded that the idea behind the bill was to give Tawes a "free hand" in naming new appointees.

The measure was refered to the House Ways and Means Committee.

Colored Principal Named For Desegreaated School

Special to Journal and Guide

BETHESDA,, Md. — Mrs. dominantly white school in been named principal of a predominately white school in Maryland's Montgomery county.

A veteran of 28 years as a teacher and principal in the county, Mrs. Jones assumes duties as administrator of the Bannockburn elementary school here next school term.

SHE IS THE first member of the race to head such a school.

Mrs. Jones' appointment as principal of the school here was approved in informal discussion by the school board and the superintendent. And while it is a milestone in Montgomery, which is now in the process of desegregation of schools, The Maryland News, a county weekly newspaper says editorially:

"A FEW YEARS from now there will be no special news significance to an appointment of this type."

Of Mrs. Jones, the editorial says: "She has proven to be an outstanding educator and we are glad her ability has once again been recognized.

MRS. JONES is leaving her post as principal of Rock Terrace elementary school, one of the county's four segregated elementary schools. According to the county's plans, total desegregation of schools will be effected in a few years. The faculties of several schools have been desegregated already and a recent survey by the school board showed that colored teachers rank "slightly higher" in overall efficiency in the system.

Negro Woman to Head White Maryland School

Evening Star Washington D.C. Dec. 7, 1957 Sat. 7-11-59 p. 20

Mrs. Margaret Jones, a teacher and principal in Montgomery County schools since 1931, is expected to become the county's first Negro principal of an all-white school in September.

Mrs. Jones, the principal of Rock Terrace School in Rockville, is scheduled to take over the post at Bannockburn Elementary School in the Bethesda area.

She was a supervisor of Negro elementary schools in the county from 1951 to 1955 and was principal of the former Lincoln Junior High School.

School officials said no objections have been made to Mrs. Jones' appointment, expected to be made by the school board at a meeting Monday. Several members of the parent-teacher association at the school already have conferred with her on plans for the coming year.

She will replace Alexander M. Gottesman, who is expected to be named administrative assistant to School Superintendent C. Taylor Whittier. His present assistant, Gerald G. Raymore, probably will be named vice principal of a secondary school.

Mrs. Jones earned her master's degree at Columbia University and has received post-graduate credits from Catholic University, University of Maryland, District of Columbia Teachers College and New York University.

Mrs. Jones entered the school system as teacher in a one-room school in a small settlement known as Scotland on Seven Locks road near Bethesda. She was transferred to the Rockville school in 1943.

Mrs. Jones is married to Howard I. Jones who is employed by the Government. They live at 2038 Eighteenth street N.W.

Negro Principal Move Protested

Evening Star Washington D.C. Sat. 7-11-59 p. 38

The Maryland Petition Committee, Inc., segregationalist group, his filed a protest with Montgomery School Supt. C. Taylor Whittier over appointment of a Negro as principal of an all-white school.

The school board approved without comment yesterday the appointment of Mrs. Margaret C. Jones as principal of the Bannockburn Elementary School in the Bethesda area.

The segregation group sent a telegram to Dr. Whittier putting itself "on record in opposition" to the appointment.

The telegram was signed by Robert L. Wiseman, president of the petition committee. The committee also said it wanted to be heard if a hearing was scheduled on the appointment.

No such hearing has been scheduled.

54 Pupils Ask Integration

Evening Star Washington D.C. Wed. 8-12-59

The Prince Georges County School Board has received applications from 54 Negro students asking admission next month to previously all-white schools.

The applications involve 15 schools, of which only two have not had Negro students before, School Supt. William S. Schmidt said at a board meeting yesterday.

If approved, the new applications would raise to 309 the number of Negro students in previously white schools at the beginning of classes September 8. The total anticipated enrollment is a record 56,500 students.

School board staff members will review the applications to see if they comply with the county's integration policy adopted in 1955. It permits integration if a formal request is filed and pupil assignment causes no school bus transportation or classroom capacity problems, or other circumstances deemed inadvisable by the board.

30 Involve Transfers

Of the 54 applications, 24 are for first-grade students and the remainder for transfers. The deadline for filing was July 31.

Mr. Schmidt said the number of requests is "somewhat smaller" than those received last year.

If the transfers are approved, the county will have 21 of its 124 schools integrated. Six new schools are expected to be opened later in the year. There are 17 all-Negro schools in Prince Georges.

The two new schools involved in the requests are elementaries—Woodley Knoll in Boulevard Heights and Brandywine. A first-grader seeks admission to Brandywine, while two first-graders and one transfer student have asked admission to Woodley Knoll.

Schools Involved

The largest request concerns Maryland Park Junior High, where 18 Negro students seek admission. Other schools and the number of requests:

Andrews Air Force Base Elementary, 1; Beltsville, 1 first-grader; Laurel, 1 first-grader; Laurel Senior High, 1; Seat Pleasant, 8 first-graders and 1 transfer; Greendale in Seat Pleasant, 1 first-grader; Buck Lodge Junior High in Adelphi, 1 transfer.

Also, Carole Highlands, 3 first-graders; Chestnut Hills in Beltsville, 4 first-graders; Cheverly, 3 first-graders and 4 transfers; Glenridge Junior High, 2 transfers, and John Hanson Junior High, 1 transfer.

Asks Lawmakers To Inspect State

Jackson News

WASHINGTON (AP)—A. Boyd Campbell, former president of the U. S. Chamber of Commerce, today invited a congressional civil rights subcommittee to study the integration problem first hand in Mississippi.

Campbell addressed the house subcommittee, urging the members against approving additional civil rights legislation.

Integration of the races, he said, cannot be accelerated by the enactment of federal laws. In fact, he added, federal civil rights laws enacted since the 1954 U. S. Supreme Court school desegregation decision "have solved nothing. They are creating a chasm of bitterness."

Campbell, now a Jackson businessman, blamed the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People for usurping local Negro leadership in the South to compel speedy integration.

"The deteriorating relationship between the races in the South," he said, "will continue as long as outside groups attempt to force integration upon us."

Campbell rejected as false the often - repeated statement that the treatment of Negroes in the South provides fuel for Communist propaganda.

He added that the remedy, congressional laws forcing people to maintain the right attitude toward each other, is futile.

The complete text of Campbell's statement to the subcommittee follows:

My name is Boyd Campbell. I am a small businessman from Jackson, Mississippi. I appear before you in my individual capacity and not as the representative of any organized group. I must, therefore, ask your indulgence if I make frequent use of the first person singular pronoun.

When I made known my intention to request the privilege of making a statement to your committee on the proposed legislation that is currently under consideration — in particular, HR 4457, HR 127, and HR 619 — some of my friends, with apparent genuine concern about my sanity and safety, warned me to stay away. I was reminded that no Southerners were on the committee. I was told that my statement would be met with hostility. One counsellor said I would be "clobbered." Another said I would be "drawn and quartered."

I admit that I am without experience in this role, but if there was ever any doubt about the rightness of my request for a hearing, it was resolved when I encountered so much misunderstanding about legislative processes on Capitol Hill. The misconception about the treatment of an American citizen who in a spirit of good will and sincere conviction makes statements before a committee of the Congress that might possibly be in conflict with the equally sincere convictions of the committee members was amazing.

METHODS CLASH

Even though we are dealing with a highly controversial subject, the discussion of which sometimes engenders more heat than light, I am constrained to believe that the goals of the sponsors of these bills are not vastly different from my own in the area of improved race relationship. The difference between us arises out of the proposed methods by which they are sought to be attained. Without meaning to be presumptuous, I am inclined to believe that there are thousands, probably millions of unorganized Americans who believe as I do.

Before proceeding further, I wish to present my credentials for the sincerity of what I will try to say.

I am the grandson of two non-slave-owning Confederate soldiers, both of whom returned from the War with wounds that crippled them for life. In their reminiscences and discussions of the War, I never heard from them one word of recrimination or bitterness. From them I learned the meaning of good will. I did not appreciate its value then. I do now. In the area of our relationships, domestic and foreign, the factor of good will appears to be eroding at a time when our national well-being requires that it should be increasing.

For all of my mature life, as have thousands of my white neighbors in Mississippi, I have advocated better education, better economic opportunity, better living conditions, better health services, and equality before the law for Mississippi Negroes.

In 1950, as a member of a statewide group of educators and lawmen, I was privileged to raise a sum of money from friends and associates to finance a study of Mississippi's school system in an effort to create sentiment for the enactment of an education code that would correct inequalities and inequities; that would establish uniform standards and would eliminate discrimination between the races in salaries and facilities.

With the aid and assistance of the State Chamber of Commerce and the support of a sympathetic state administration, Mississippi's Education Foundation program was enacted into law in the year 1953.

Early in the year 1954 there was authorized to be spent by the State to supplement local funds a total of $180,000,000.00 for public school buildings. To date approximately $63,000,000.00 has been allocated, of which 70 percent is for schools for Negroes.

ON SCHOOL BOARD

It is my privilege to serve as a member of the board of trustees of one of our finest institutions of higher learning for Negroes. I refer to the Piney Woods Country Life School, which was founded and is still administered by Dr. Laurence C. Jones, one of Mississippi's most distinguished and highly esteemed citizens.

On Sunday, April 5, here in Washington, an American vocalist, who has received international acclaim, gave a concert in Constitution Hall. She is Leontyne Price, a Negro soprano of Laurel, Mississippi, whose first public concert it was my pleasure to sponsor when the young artist was still a student at Juilliard.

Against this background, I am here to express grave concern as to the effect of this proposed legislation upon the well-being of Southern Negroes in particular and upon our national unity in general.

The integration decision of May 17, 1954, appears to have become the inspiration for legislation and litigation designed to take over and expedite, the program which was making great progress voluntarily through the joint efforts of leaders in both races, in thousands of communities throughout the entire South.

The result has been exactly the opposite. I can express this conviction no better than to quote a telegram to the Christian Science Monitor, in which I responded to a request from its editor, Dr. Erwin Canham, for a statement on "Southern state of mind and specific American attitudes necessary to avoid violence and bring healing to a deteriorating situation."

MONITOR WIRE

Following is the telegram, which the Monitor carried in full on March 10, 1956:

"The vast improvement in race relationship and the progress of Southern Negroes in education, health and economic opportunity was brought about by the enlightened leadership of men of good will in both races. This progress came to a jarring halt when the NAACP usurped local Negro leadership and undertook to speedily compel a condition by methods that are abhorrent to the American tradition. The problem is one that will not be solved by name calling and weight-throwing. The deteriorating relationship between the races in the South will continue as long as outside groups attempt to force integration upon us. History does not record a single instance of compulsory integration. It will not do so in this instance. Meantime, there are heartaches aplenty on both sides as we witness the result of years of patient effort being swept away ruthlessly by methods that engender hatred rather than good will. We can only hope that those who condemn us would first try to understand us, and to understand the vastly complex problem which is ours and which lends itself to no superimposed solution. If and when methods of pressure and compulsion are abandoned, the voices of the moderates of both races will be heard and heeded."

In support of the foregoing statement, Editor Percy Greene of the Jackson Advocate, leading Negro newspaper, made the following comment:

"That this statement by Mr. Campbell is indisputably true can be easily seen by looking at conditions in Mississippi as well as elsewhere in the South.

"Prior to the decision in the school segregation cases, using Mr. Campbell's assumption, when the NAACP took over Negro leadership, there were many easily seen signs of Negro progress toward first - class citizenship.

"It had been pretty generally conceded that the Negro had been extended the right to vote along with other citizens of the state, a view that had been supported by many white editors of small but influential new papers. There had also developed a real and honest effort to provide equal educational opportunities for Negro and white children of the state and equal pay for Negro and white teachers.

OTHER SIGNS

"There were many other signs then evident to the intelligent and fairminded observer that time and space will not permit mentioning here.

"Perhaps greater than all the factors mentioned and those that could be mentioned, was the fact that the lines of communication between the two races were wide open and the leaders of both races were getting together at local levels to discuss their problems in an intelligent and understanding manner.

"Since the 1954 decision nothing which could then be pointed to affirmatively is now true as regards the progress of Negro citizens in the state toward first-class citizenship."

The telegram to the Monitor was dated March 6, 1956. If I were called upon to appraise the situation today, I could do no better than repeat it and add that federal laws enacted subsequent to that date — for example, the Civil Rights Bill of 1957 and the decisions of the federal courts — have solved nothing.

They are creating a chasm of bitterness. As history repeats itself, they are setting neighbor against neighbor, friend against friend, and brother against brother. Human dignity cannot be preserved or protected by penalizing one minority to befriend another.

In a dynamic society like our own, change is inevitable, but change in attitudes, change in human relationship — the kind of change that endures because all men accept it and live with it — does not come suddenly. It is a maturing and a ripening. We of this generation should have learned that it cannot be accelerated by edict or decree. It cannot be accelerated — with deference to the honorable members of the Congress who think other-wise-by the enactment of federal laws.

Our memories are short. We need to remind ourselves of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act. The Great Experiment failed because it undertook at one fell swoop to accomplish that which can only be attained by a change in the attitudes of citizens of a society toward moral and social accorentability. There is a parallel here.

FORCE DOOMED

The mores and traditions of forty million free people cannot be changed by compulsion.

Recently we have been hearing a lot about "second-class citizenship." The words are used in at least one of the bills which you are considering. I am not sure that I know what "second-class citizenship" means, but if it means what I think it does, it will never be abrogated by statute. First-class citizenship is a status that has to be earned. It cannot be attained by any short cuts.

Long before the Supreme Court's decision in 1954 men of good will in the South wrestled with the problem of improving race relationships and enhancing the condition of Southern Negroes. The people of the South felt then, as they do now, that the solution of this problem was their responsibility, their obligation — the obligation of white people and colored people working together.

Meantime, Southern people were not concerning themselves with the problem of relationships with other ethnic groups - for example, the Mexicans in the Southwest, the Asiatics on the Pacific Coast, and the Puerto Ricans in New York. They conceded to the people who lived closest to these problems the right to work out their own solutions within the framework of moral and ethical considerations.

Since the precedent of quoting laymen in a judicial decision — in particular, Mr. Gunnar Myrdal a Swedish sociologist - has been established by the Supreme Court, I feel privileged to quote an American novelist and Nobel Prize winner in support of my views. He is William Faulkner of Mississippi, who, in an article titled "A Letter to the North," which was published in the March 5, 1956, issue of Life magazine said:

"From the beginning of this present phase of the race problem in the South, I have been on record as opposing the forces in my native country which would keep the condition out of which this present evil and trouble has grown. Now I must go on record as opposing the forces outside the South which would use legal or police compulsion to eradicate that evil over-night. I was against compulsory segregation. I am just as strongly against compulsory integration. Firstly of course from principle. Secondly because I don't believe compulsion will work."

The white people of the South are constantly told that their so-called "treatment" of Negroes is a liability in our country's international relationships. We are said to be providing fuel for Communists fire. Therefore, Congress should pass a law to force people to maintain the right attitude toward each other.

FALSE CHARGE

I submit that the charge is as false as the remedy is futile.

I do not pretend to be an authority on international relationships but I have been exposed to the relentless, unchanging Communist conspiracy, the purpose of which is to dominate the world.

They cannot do this while we stand strongly in their way. Every official act-legislative, judicial, or executive - that concentrates power in Washington at the expense of our sovereign states brings joy to those who would destroy us.

As I come to the close of this statement, I fully recognize how inadequate my words have been in an effort to portray a condition that needs to be experienced to be understood - that needs to be studied at firsthand rather than from afar.

The hardest working people I know are members of the Congress of the United States. There are many more demands upon their time than they can possibly meet. I thank you heartily for the time which you have given me today but, in connection with the problem with which we are mutually concerned, I sincerely wish you could find the time -and on behalf of all Mississippians for whom I now presume to speak, I invite you - to come to Mississippi and talk to the leaders of both races. I think you would find, gentlemen, that, almost with a united voice, you would be told that more legislation is not the answer to our problem.

Scott Negro School Progress Outlined

MORTON, Miss. (Special) — Interesting figures regarding educational facilities offered Negro children in the Scott County educational system were released by the Scott County Board of Education following a county-wide visit to the schools over the county.

Five days were spent in this inspection and groups doing this were different for each day. Teachers from different schools as well as representatives of the PTA groups were invited to make the trip with the county board and the county superintendent. Several different teachers from Morton school made the trip, but no teacher spent more than a day.

All members were impressed with the cleanliness of the schools and the progress being made. Bettye Mae Jack, Jennes teacher, has been acting as co-ordinator of Negro schools, for the last twenty two years. She has seen the time when there were 41 Negro schools in operation with a total enrollment of less than 2000 students in the county.

Then there was not a single high school in the county for Negroes. The average school was one teacher, for a period of five months, and the salary of the teachers was about $23 per month. At the present time there is a Negro enrollment of 3140 pupils, no school is for less than eight months and most of them nine, and the teacher receives $300 per month.

There are three high schools for Negroes and they are transported in steel buses, county owned that are dependable and all busses are equipped with heaters and drivers are paid the same salary by the county as white drivers.

The 41 school have been reduced to eleven and further reductions are planned in the number of schools for next year and as fast as facilities can be completed for consolidation.

At the present time a new $315,000 addition is under construction at Morton and plans have been filed with the State Education Finance Commission for renovation of the school at Ludlow and the addition of a combination cafeteria and auditorium that will seat 200 as well as office space and indoor toilet facilities. This will give the school at Ludlow a school with grades 1 through 6 and six classrooms. This is to be a permanent school as is the one at Morton.

At Lake, plans are on file for the same type renovation of the present six room building. The cost of the project as Ludlow is estimated at $50,000 and the one at Lake at $40,000. The State finance commission will act on the application at their next meeting on Jan. 19.

In addition to the school at Morton for grades 1-12 and the schools at Lake and Ludlow for grades 1-6 there will be a least two more schools constructed in the eastern side of the county north of Highway 80 and all of the funds coming from the state.

When the plans are finally completed, within three years, it is hoped, there will be either two or three Negro high schools and two or three elementary schools in the county unit.

It is hoped that all schools in the county will be nine months next year.

Counterfeit Experts' on Segregation Blasted

Miss. Governor Speaks to College Group

By W. F. MINOR

(Times-Picayune Staff Correspondent)

JACKSON, Miss., Gov. J. P. Coleman said Thursday the state's ability to preserve its segregated public schools is being weakened by "counterfeit" segregation experts in the state.

"This problem can't be settled with lungs and tongues," Coleman told the Mississippi Association of Colleges. "It can be solved only with clear heads and capable brains."

If Mississippi had to abolish its public schools, Coleman charged, "we would be ruined for the second time in 100 years."

He said it would "place a premium on knowledge, and industry wouldn't come to the state if there were no public school system.

"We know that Mississippi will not support integrated schools," he declared. "Even if a governor were to use the National Guard in an effort to integrate public schools, scholastically speaking, it couldn't be done."

SEES TASK AHEAD

The state's major task, he said, is to preserve its present public school system; "but we must rely on ourselves to do it, because we can't get help from Congress, the President or the federal courts."

He pointed out that "not a single segregation case has been won" by the South since the United States supreme court held May 17, 1954, that school segregation by law is unconstitutional.

"Anybody can get up any place and call himself an expert on segregation and get headlines in the newspapers," he told the college group.

"The one great problem for this year, next year and years to come will be the ability of the people to distinguish the real from the counterfeit," he added.

The penalty for destroying the public schools, he asserted, "will not be inconvenience, but once again total ruin."

BUDGET BALANCED

Mississippi is now "at the highest point that it has ever achieved" economically, Coleman asserted, adding that the state has been able to keep a balanced budget and is able to meet its financial obligations.

He said, "Even the great state of Texas has a deficit of $65 million. Georgia has overspent its budget by $22 million; and South Carolina, which is very much like us, has a $15 million deficit."

The state's progress, he said, has been stepped up by the "educational breakthrough" which was made during the past few years.

"Without education," he asserted, "we are not going to make progress in the future."

Coleman was presented by Phillip Sheffield, president of Itawamba Junior college and head of the Association of Colleges. The group was meeting here Thursday as a part of the Mississippi Education Association convention.

"Absolutely Absurd"

"Equal, But Separate" Is Voted By GEA

The Georgia Education Assn. Friday voted overwhelmingly in favor of continued racial but separate public schools.

But at the same time, the association rejected a new state law that puts an age limit on new students who would enter institutions in the state university system. The law was passed during the last session of the legislature in an attempt to combat integration.

The delegates to the GEA's annual meeting voted 569-257 for a resolution to "reaffirm its belief in the desire for a continuation of equal, but separate, public schools."

However, the resolution received stiff opposition in floor debate from three public school teachers and a Georgia Tech professor.

A Clayton County teacher, Mrs. Jim Woods, called the resolut-

...on "absolutely absurd," and stated that "the era of equal, but separate, public schools is over" in Georgia.

"Steak Every Night"

The resolution also read that the "delegate assembly of the GEA in its conventions throughout the years has stated its loyalty to Southern traditions and customs." To this, Mrs. Woods replied it is "like wanting steak every night."

Another opponent of the segregation portion of the resolution, Wendell Weaver of Polk Couty, said: "Although we all subscribe to Southern loyalty, we must face reality."

He said the important issue facing Georgia today is "the education of the boys and girls," adding that educational leaders should take a stand and not "be led by others."

Georgia Tech Professor David Comer sought to insert in the resolution the statements: 'Resolved: That the Georgia Education Assn., at the same time goes on record as opposing closing down our public schools.

Comer said he concurred wholeheartedly with the stand taken by Mrs. Woods and Weaver, and added. "we have a choice of some integration in some schools or no schools at all."

But it was ruled that Comer's suggested addition was, in effect, a new resolution and was therefore unacceptable.

Reject Age Limit Law

The delegates rejected overwhelmingly the college age limit law in a voice vote. The law states that no one can enter college over 21 and no graduate student who has reached his 25th birthday can enter a college or university.

Sparta school teacher David Dyer said that in rejecting it the teachers were "tying the hands of the governor" who is attempting to preserve segregation.

"Segregation is not dead," Dyer shouted. But he added, "I believe we came to bury it."

V. W. Webb of Moultrie said "I don't see how the GEA can come here without upholding elected officials" dedicated to preserving segregation.

"I don't see how we can come here and appease the NAACP and other subversive groubs who want to overthrow our schools and all other forms of our southern heritage," he said.

An Open Letter To Principals And Teachers In Negro Schools

Dear Friends:

The subject of this letter may well be, How the Principal or Teacher can help a bright student from an economically handicaped family prepare for the beginning of a College Education.

The implementation of such a subject, appears to me to come within the area of the school's Guidance Program.

In a number of cities and towns in the state there are now JACKSON ADVOCATE agents who sell more than a hundred papers each week. These agents are mainly students, from among whose parents we have been informed from time to time that by means of the money saved as agent for the JACKSON ADVOCATE, upon the completion of high school training the student had saved enough money to pay for the beginning of a college education.

It appears easy to me to visualize the money that a high school beginner would have at the end of four years, who out of an amount of say $20 per month, saved $10 per month towards the beginning of a college education.

It has occurred to me that among the beginners in every high school, and among those in the higher levels of the elementary schools, there are exceptionally bright students with no possible chance, without some financial assistance, of making the beginning towards a College education.

With this in mind, knowing the limited opportunities for Negro students to make money while still attending school, it has occurred to me to suggest to you, within the area of your guidance program, that you recommend such a student, boy or girl, from your school to become an agent for the JACKSON ADVOCATE with the aim of making and saving money towards a college education.

The value of the experience gained by the youth in the sale of newspapers appears to me to be too well known in informed circles to mention here.

We do not expect this letter to arouse the attention nor the thought of those in this time of crisis for our group who are attempting the difficult, if not impossible feat of trying to "run with the hare, and hope with the hounds."

We do believe however, that the subject of this letter will be given the sincere thought, attention, and aroused action of those principals and teachers, who in this time of crisis still honor the high principle of American Freedom of Speech, as expressed by one who said, "I disagree with everything you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it."

Gartin Is Clear On Race Mixing

Says Mississippi Will Not Integrate Schools

CHIDES SUPREME COURT

By KENNETH TOLER
From The Commercial Appeal
Jackson, Miss., Bureau

JACKSON, Miss., April 11.—Lt. Gov. Carroll Gartin said Saturday that, regardless of the action taken by the Congress on pending civil rights bills, Mississippi will not have integrated public schools.

His position was made in a statement filed with a House Judiciary Subcommittee studying civil rights bills.

"I urge this committee not to approve legislation which will lead to the destruction of our public school system and wipe out the progress made in our state since 1865," Mr. Gartin said.

No Race Mixing

"The people of Mississippi love our public school system and will make any necessary financial sacrifice to assure an education to the children of both races," he said. "However, we will not have an integrated public school system."

"There will be no mixing of the races in our public schools," he added.

Mr. Gartin said he was making the statement to the committee "fully conscious of the problems involved and keenly aware of the desire of the people of both races to maintain segregation."

He pointed to the school building construction program commenced prior to the 1954 Supreme Court integration decision which he said "is progressing rapidly and assures the most modern school facilities to the children of both races."

Asserting that the courts have adequate authority to enforce their orders in specific cases, the lieutenant governor said "additional legislation on this subject is unwarranted and useless."

Won't Ignore Constitution

He suggested that the Civil Rights Commission be permitted to die under terms of its creation and not be continued.

"We will not ignore the Constitution which wisely preserved to the states the right to regulate their internal affairs. We will not be a party to a change in our complete system of constitutional government, sought because of some book on psychology or sociology, written by persons having no real experience or actual knowledge about race relations.

"I respectfully suggest that this committee should consider legislation to prevent further unauthorized abuse by the court of the powers reserved to the Congress, as well as the states."

Mr. Gartin said that "the mere fact that some feel that additional legislation is necessary to 'carry out the decisions of the court' should be ample proof that the court has been legislating rather than interpreting laws adopted by the Congress and provisions of our Constitution."

Long Asleep

"It is strange indeed that these 'constitutional questions' were permitted to sleep so long before suddenly being rudely awakened by the court in 1954,' he said.

"I hope the time never comes in this nation when the Federal Government will further take over our public schools because our young people cannot be effectively taught by this system.

"What the Federal Government teaches in Washington is not wanted. Please do not extend this type of 'learning' to Mississippi."

SCHOOLS UNDER FIRE, PROBES SOUGHT

Segregationists Hit At Mississippi Educational System

BY JAY MILNER

WHILE THE MORE overt aspects of white Mississippi's campaign to maintain segregation are hitting the headlines a more sinister manifestation of the struggle is growing quietly in the heat of that state's emotional involvement.

White Citizens Council leaders have often expressed the realization that, as one put it, "the weakest link in our solid front of resistance is our youth. They are so impressionable." Apparently with this in mind some Mississippians have set out to purge all levels of education in the state of influences that might tilt the status quo.

Two Previous Purges In Education Tried

THIS IS THE THIRD such purge faced by Mississippi educators in the last quarter century. One was tragically successful. Another was snuffed out before it got rolling.

Twenty-five years ago, Gov. Theodore Bilbo, exercising the rights of the political spoils system, cleaned house at the University of Mississippi and put his cronies in charge. This caused the University to lose its accredited rating. It took years of hard work after Bilbo was out of office to regain scholastic sanction.

A few years ago there were some ill organized attempts to persuade the Board of Trustees of Institutions of Higher Learning to fire a group of University professors whose names were on a black list compiled by some of the more frantic segregationists.

This move was diverted by the calming influence of Gov. J. P. Coleman and some members of the board of trustees. During that time, however, a large number of professors resigned, many declaring they were "tired of coping with Mississippi's negative attitude toward education and academic freedom" and tired of "continual interference" from state legislators.

Probe Of Ole Miss Faculty Is Demanded

THE LATEST ATTACK on Ole Miss professors and their teaching practices comes from State Rep. Wilburn Hooker and former Rep. Edwin White, alumni of the school and prominent in Citizens Council circles. They have asked the trustees to investigate certain university factulty members, including the dean of the Law School, who has advocated adherence to Supreme Court decisions. These professors, according to White and Hooker, "teach integration" so they should be fired.

They also want the trustees to find out why "most university education professors from 1946 to 1957 came from the North and Middle West and most of them received their higher degrees from schools noted for liberalism."

Legislative Airing In January Expected

THE BOARD OF TRUSTEES has dismissed these oblique charges as groundless and expressed confidence in the way the university is being run. But White and Hooker are persistent and the matter is expected to be brought before the Legislature in January.

Education on the lower levels in Mississippi also is having its troubles.

Not long ago the National Defense Committee of the Daughters of the American Revolution issued a statement declaring that many public school textbooks were "unfit" because they "advocate subversion and other alien philosophies such as socialism, communism and one-wordism."

In most places the DAR declaration was ignored. But the Mississippi American Legion got excited about it and adopted a resolution accepting the DAR committee's finding and demanding an investigation of Mississippi public school textbooks.

School Group Raps American Legion, DAR

THE RESOLUTION from the politically potent Legion caused the ordinarily quiet Mississippi School Administrators Association to speak out. At its October meeting the association publicly called the American Legion and the DAR "witch-hunters." It's been fairly quiet on that front since then, although the Legion has a committee out reading textbooks now.

Meantime, the Citizens Council, through its own facilities, has continued its youth program. Cash prizes are given periodically to high school and junior high students who write essays judged best on assigned subjects such as the sovereignty of states and the integrity of races.

And on Jan. 1 Ross Barnett replaces J. P. Coleman in the Mississippi governor's chair. White supremacy rabble rousing has been Gov.-Elect Barnett's political forte. He will be able to appoint several new members to the state college board because of term expirations. Mention this to most Mississippi educators these days and they shudder.

Leake Negro School Case Bond Hiked

CARTHAGE, Miss. (Special) — Chancellor C. D. Williams has raised the required bond required in [illegible] injunction proceedings from $200 to $5,000.

This followed the issuance of an injunction October 22 to petioners who objected to the location of the new Conway-Thomastown Negro school. The injunction halted construction of the school by rendering the Leake County School Board unable to act.

The injunction resulted from the protests of 57 white and Negro property owners and taxpayers of the Conway-Thomastown school district.

Williams said that in the event that the bond is not made before December 5, the injunction now in effect could be dissolved.

Coleman Stresses Needs Of Negroes

Says School Fees Too Small To Finance Building

JACKSON, Miss., Dec. 2.—(AP)—Mississippi charges such small fees to students at state Negro colleges it cannot sell bonds to the Federal Government to finance dormitory construction at the schools, Gov. J. P. Coleman told the Legislature Wednesday.

White schools have financed the construction of dormitories by selling revenue bonds to the Federal Housing Administration, with student fees being set aside to retire the bonds.

Governor Coleman said Negro students were charged such low fees that the Government would not buy revenue bonds for construction on the Negro campuses.

He made the observation in calling for $1,325,000 to construct dormitories, an infirmary and a student union building at Alcorn A&M College. He recommended state bonds to finance the work.

Governor Coleman said Alcorn is isolated between Natchez and Vicksburg and has almost no medical facilities or recreational facilities.

He said this lack has led to student unrest, which will flare up again unless the need is met.

Hawkins Explains Integration Ideas

Guns Forcing Issue In Mississippi, He Says

Special to The Commercial Appeal

HOUSTON, Miss., July 1.—[illegible] Hawkins, candidate for lieutenant governor, in a television address in Columbus Wednesday night, said no Federal marshal's gun "is sticking down our throats to make us integrate the schools in Mississippi."

A district attorney from Boston declared "The separate but equal doctrine which we lived with for more than 50 years posed very much the same problem as does the 1954 school decision.

"The difference now," said Mr. Hawkins, "is that our fathers and grandfathers acted with more intelligence than we are showing. They kept their mouths shut and the politicians knew to keep theirs shut.

"If this separate but equal decision—then the Supreme Court ruling—had been constantly, daily advertised, if sensational newspapers and magazines had ballyhooed it, if politicians had blabbered about it, we would have created trouble where there was none.

"Without question such continued advertisement would have encouraged lawsuits to equalize school facilities. To have complied with this decision would have either wrecked our school system, or completely bankrupted the impoverished state of 50 years ago."

Mr. Hawkins also said certain conditions and circumstances have brought on integration in all of the places where schools have been integrated in Southern and border states. He said these conditions do not exist in Mississippi.

The completely modern Negro attendance center is expected to be ready for occupancy by Sept. 1 and will accommodate approximately 1500 students. G. R. Mississippi Takes The Lead

ROSS BARNETT, governor-elect of Mississippi, has begun carrying out the main pledge of his recent campaign. He assured people that he would devote his earnest attention to bringing unity in segregation strategy of the South.

The Citizens Councils of Mississippi will stage a big banquet next Tuesday night in Jackson. The Mississippi State Democratic executive committee is participating in the affair, and has invited the State Democratic chairmen of Southern states to be present. Governor-Elect Barnett will be the chief speaker at this banquet and it will be his first public appearance since the recent primary election in which he was winner by a large majority.

Mississippi has had to bear much of the brunt of Northern criticism for its ardent defense of segregation and it is therefore appropriate that Mississippi party leaders should be recognized for leadership in unifying the entire South in defense of the South's way of life against all detractors, whether it be the United States Supreme Court or the National Association of the Advancement of the Colored People.

151 School Districts To Welcome Pupils

There Were 5,406 Districts Back In Depression Years

BY BONITA APPLETON
Daily News Staff Writer

The three R's — like the ole gray mare — just aint' what they used to be.

For readin', ritin', and 'rithmatic have grown and grown until today they include subjects that range from modern foreign languages to the vocational fields of individual students.

Modern transportation has made the world smaller makin' for more varied knowledge of the words of the world necessary and Mississippi's expanding industry has played a large part in this extra curriculum in Mississippi.

When Mississippi's students file into their school buildings this month and next they'll do so in larger buildings than the little one room red school house their parents and grandparents knew.

For today, most of the one-room, one-teacher schools have given way to the new, modern, consolidated school plants that wuld make any state proud. And Mississippi has a right to be proud of every one of her 151 school districts.

Before the reorganization of 1956 there were 723 districts and just to show how Mississippi has improved since 1930 — there were 5,406 districts during the depression years.

And as the Magnolia State has taken wide awake giant steps in the direction of reducing administrative districts, pupil enrollment has swelled because of the higher birth rate and the added industrial activity.

231,890 WHITE

Last year the school figures for white and colored students in the state stood thusly: there were 9,104 white students in private elementary schools and 222,186 white students in public elementary schools. This brought the total of Mississippi's white elementary school students to 231,890 students.

239,233 NEGRO

In the colored elementary schools there were 4,949 private school students and 234,284 elementary public school students. This brought the total of Mississippi's colored elementary school students to a total of 239,233 students.

In the white high schools there were 2,586 youngsters in private schools and 72,167 students in public high schools. This means there were 74,753 high school students in white schools in the state.

There were 1,664 colored students in private high schools and 41,603 students in public high schools, making a total of 43,267 colored high school students in Mississippi last year.

TOTALS

Thus the final totals show 306,643 white students in the state. These white students attended a total of approximately 1,034 public and private schools in the state and studied under nearly 10,467 Mississippi teachers.

In the Negro schools the total number of 282,500 students attended some 1,347 schools and learned, from 7,128 teachers.

The teacher shortage in Mississippi is still a thing to be contended with though it's not as acute as it has been in the past.

This doesn't mean that teachers are lacking in some respects — it means simply that the thing lacking in some cases is trained personnel with dedication.

DEDICATION NEEDED

And that missing factor "dedication" is being found more and more often in Mississippi teachers. The number of college students who train themselves to teach by attending the state's colleges and Universities and then leave to go to more lucrative paying states seems to be slackening somewhat.

The most critical shortages seem to be in the fields of public school music, trained librarians and lower elementary grades. This shortage is evident in both white and Negro schools.

There is no acute shortage of math, science and English teachers as there has been in the past. There are enough of those teachers to "go around" but many schools do not have enough applicants for a position to choose the best from two or three.

Emphasis in the school room is being placed in the modern language courses, in new Mississippi history courses and on vocational interest. In many schools guidance personnel are working with students and teachers to co-oridinate activites.

The trend seems to be to stay in Mississippi and make the Magnolia state one of greater power in the school world.

Predicts Schools Won't Mix Races

Mississippi Racial Harmony Based On Co-operation

JACKSON, Miss., Sept. 3. — (UPI) — George Malone, director of the State Sovereignty Commission, predicted Thursday there will be no school integration attempts in Mississippi during the coming school year.

"The state's racial harmony," he said, "can be attributed to co-operation among leaders of both races."

The Sovereignty Commission is the state's official agency to maintain segregation.

"If there is ever any sign of trouble anywhere," Mr. Malone said, "our people work with the local Negroes to bring about complete harmony."

Governor - nominee Ross Barnett has accused the commission of not doing its job. But Mr. Malone defended the commission. "We have tried to go about our work quietly and effectively," he said.

14d(1) 1959

MISSISSIPPI

School System Must Keep Pace With Steady Growth Of Jackson

The special school bond election of April 17 is an all-important factor in educational progress of the Jackson Municipal Separate School District, embracing our city and areas beyond present corporate limits. The proposed issuance of $5,800,000 in bonds for new schools and additions to present buildings is necessary and urgent.

The expansion program has been planned conservatively, in a manner thoroughly consistent with sound economics. And our tax structure can conveniently handle the additional levy necessitated by the program. In a nutshell, here is the situation as outlined by the District's Board of Trustees:

Enrollment in Jackson public schools has grown by leaps and bounds during the past decade. In 1949, the total enrollment here was 9,992. Today's enrollment is over 26,000 and by 1961 it is expected to exceed 31,000. By September, 1961, some 170 new classrooms will be needed, above and beyond those now under construction.

II

Jacksonians must face the fact that our school system has outgrown its present buildings. This year 2,272 pupils are attending classes under makeshift conditions. More than 40 classes meet in temporary quarters. More than 50 per cent of the pupils attend classes larger than the 30-pupil maximum at which the system aims. In oversize classes and in makeshift teaching situations, youngsters cannot do their best work.

Despite substantial school construction in recent years, our system has not kept pace with actual needs, because of steady population growth coupled with an accelerated birth rate. The Board of Trustees, after due consideration, has determined that $5,800,000 will be required to provided new buildings, additions and purchase future sites. Here is the actual budget cost of school needs by September, 1961:

Item	No. Classrooms	Cost
New schools	114	$3,935,000
Addition to schools	56	1,505,000
Improvement to existing schools	—	160,000
Sites for schools to be built after 1961	—	200,000
TOTAL	170	$5,800,000

(If the new bonds are sold as planned, .65 mill increase in tax levy will be necessary next year for debt service.)

III

Forward-minded citizens and civic organizations endorse this bond issue, because they realize the new program is justified and urgent. Prominent among these is the Jackson Chamber of Commerce, which through its board of directors has gone on record as favoring the issue. The board unanimously adopted a resolution previously given unanimous approval by the Chamber's Education Committee.

The new program is geared to serve our expanding school needs, yet it is planned on a basis more modest than programs of some neighboring cities with smaller financial resources and less population. Taxwise, our district debt at present is less than 50 per cent of the legal limit for school construction. With the assessed valuation climbing at the rate of $25 million annually, our fiscal position is favorable.

IV

Despite criticism on the national level against too-generous spending by which classroom units cost as high as $75,000, there is no extravagance in school planning locally. The Jackson classroom figure is only $30,000, which speaks highly of our district trustees and administrative staff and the conscientious job they are doing to provide maximum value per dollar expended.

Here is the situation, reduced to its simplest terms. Jackson is growing by leaps and bounds. Our educational system must keep pace with this rapid growth. Mindful of the fact that educational expenditures represent an investment in our dynamic future, Jacksonians must accept this responsibility by voting "yes" for the special bond issue on April 17.

$20 Million Mississippi Bonds Sold For Schools

JACKSON, Miss. (AP) — Mississippi sold 20 million dollars in school construction bonds Wednesday and Gov. J. P. Coleman said racial peace on the school front made the "gratifying" interest rate possible.

"This is another example of administration policies paying off," the pleased governor said after a 60-firm syndicate bought the bonds at an interest rate of 3.02199 per cent. "If we had school litigation pending, we couldn't have sold these bonds at anywhere near this low interest.

"Bond men here said we probably couldn't have sold them at 6 per cent interest if we had been tied up in court suits."

A syndicate headed by Chase Manhattan Bank of New York and First National Bank of Jackson submitted the low bid.

Coleman said the highest rate on the winning bid was the second best the state has received. It was bettered only by a 2.6806 per cent rate offered for a smaller issue some time back.

"I am greatly gratified with the interest rate," Coleman said. "We got a better interest rate than Massachusetts did yesterday (Tuesday) for its AAA General Obligation bonds."

The 20 million dollars will be used by the educational finance commission, the state agency in charge of the school equalization program designed to bring both white and Negro schools up to certain minimum standards.

The bonds, backed by the full faith and credit of the state, will be retired from a fund supported by $550,000 monthly from the state sales tax.

An EFC spokesman said a big backlog of school projects is waiting for funds from the sale, with the backlog of projects estimated to cost about 16 million dollars.

Resist School Mixing, Asks Mississippi Leader

Refuse to Issue Report Cards, Whitten Urges

By W. Ed MINOR
(Times-Picayune Staff Correspondent)

BILOXI, Miss. — A Mississippi congressman told the state bar convention here Friday that the state should resist school integration down to the point of refusing to issue report cards to Negroes.

Rep. Jamie Whitten called for a type of massive resistance in his home state in which the "first and last Mississipian" would refuse to co-operate with a federal integration order.

"We can refrain from doing what many people of Little Rock did," Whitten declared. "We can refrain from giving the federal government one ounce of co-operation."

He sair school boards could refuse to hire any teachers who would support integration, and teachers could "refuse to ask the first question, or grade the first paper, or issue the first report card to a Negro."

WOULD FORCE SUITS

Such a resistance, he declared, would force the filing of suits for every action, however minute.

"I don't think a court or president can run the day-to-day details of a school," the congressman declared.

Meanwhile he said that if Mississippi political candidates make no effort to obtain the Negro vote, and oppose those who do, "there will be precious few Negroes who will vote in Mississippi for many, many years."

Whitten renewed an appeal he made several months ago for Southern states to select independent presidential electors who would not be bound by party loyalty.

"If as many as five other Southern states would join us, this offers real promise," he declared. The South could withhold 128 electoral votes in the electoral college, Whitten said.

"Could we control every election?" he said. "Of course, we could not; but we would be sought after for the next one, the next and the next."

Both the Republican and Democratic party platforms next year, he predicted, would endorse the supreme court desegregation dicisions and approve the use of troops at Little Rock.

SOLON BACKS WHITTEN

"How in good conscience as Mississippians can you stay in either house," he said. "Nobody wishes to do what I'm talking about. But it looks like what we are going to have to do."

Later U.S. Sen. James O. Eastland, in a speech to the Mississippi bar, backed up Whitten's call on Southern unity.

"No citizen is obligated to support any party that is bent on the destruction of the Southern people, and their customs, and the American system of government," Eastland declared.

Eastland, who has been one of the staunchest critics of the U.S. supreme court for its decisions both on integration and treatment of Communists, paid the court a faint compliment for its decisions Monday clarifying its earlier rulings in the Communist field.

"The court took a few steps backwards," he said, "because in my judgment they realized what public sentiment was in this country."

Eastland said he believed "we would have more of this if our lower federal courts would hold their ground."

The Mississippi senator charged that "gradualism is a deadly doctrine. Once the dam is breached, there's no turning back."

Eastland said he believed the best threat to making the rest of the nation aware of the gravity of integration would be to "close he schools and let them stay closed."

"When weclose schools, if we will give private schools a chance to organize, your private school system will be a success," he said.

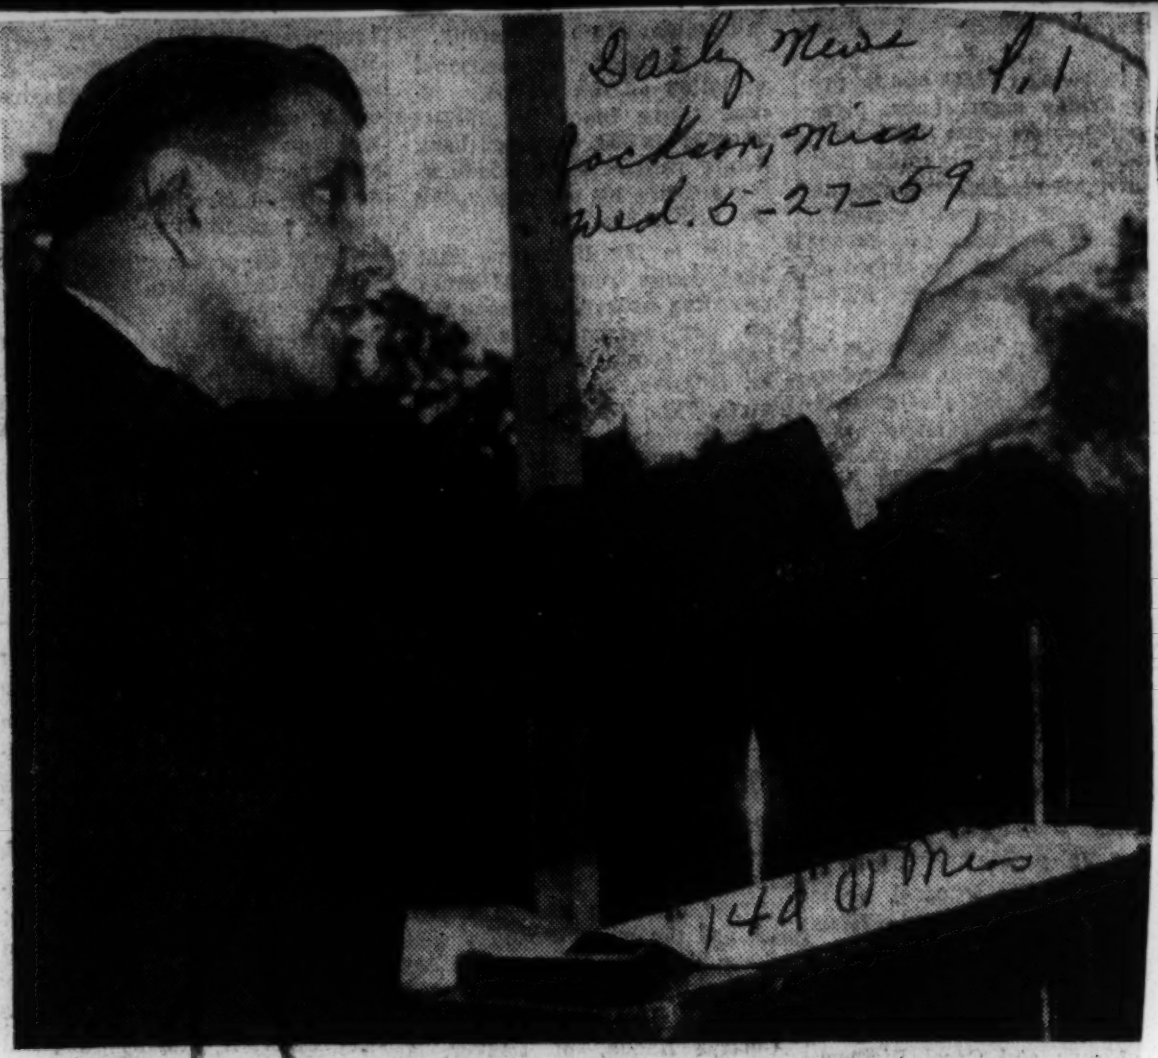
Eastland said he believed the "weak point" in the South aaginst closing of schools are the "big businessmen, because they are afraid of losing business."

Breed O. Mounger, Tylertown, president of the Mississippi State Bar, welcomed the 400 lawyers attending the convention at the opening sessions in the Hurricane Room of the Buena Vista hotel here.

The convention is slated to when Gov. Orval Faubus of Arkansas will speak.

Alfred S., Julian, New York, president of the National Association of Claimants' compensation attorneys, discussed some of the new developments in cases involving products liability.

Julian added that there is a campaign of "subliminal propaganda" being used to do away with jury trials in the United States.



GUBERNATORIAL CANDIDATE GARTIN WARMS TO SUBJECT
Boosts Industry, Assistance for the Aged

FIRST CAMPAIGN CANNONADE

Gartin Vows He'd Close Mix-Threatened School

By BERRY FREECE
Daily News Staff Writer

LAUREL, Miss.—Lt. Gov. Carroll Gartin opened his gubernatorial campaign last night with his hand on the school-closing switch.

"I stand ready to close any public school in this state before I will see Mississippi children attend an integrated school," he said.

Throwing out his script to the apparent delight of his overflow South Mississippi Fairgrounds crowd, Gartin waxed:

"I could have ranted from every political stump in the state about segregation. But I didn't. But my record as lieutenant governor will show that I have stood firm."

DARTS AT ROSS

These were apparently darts at his opponent, Ross Barnett, making his third bid for governor.

In his strongest statement yet for segregation-at-all-costs, Gartin said he was not "just a newspaper segregationist or political segregationist."

Gartin then pronounced he would not adopt the "mud-slinging, vilification or slander" tactics of his opponents.

On a 52-station, statewide network, the 47-year-old Gartin outlined his platform. It included:

1) Increasing Mississippi per capita income by 60 per cent in the next four years.

2) A program to purchase medicines for persons on the old-age pension rolls.

3) "Industrial tax reforms" that would make Mississippi's tax structure "competitive with that of . . . neighboring states."

4) A state program of "outright grants" for airport construction "to any county desiring an airstrip."

5) Repeal of the state 10 per cent black market tax on wholesale whiskey, coupled with

6) Retention of Mississippi's prohibition laws.

7) A program to "provide pine seedlings to every Mississippian who w ants to become a tree farmer."

Gartin also repeated his past endorsement of the Mississippi Education Association's recommended schedule for increases in teacher pay, starting at $3,000.

He called again for a group of decentralized "golden age homes" for the aged, which he said would enable them to remain in the home areas of their families.

The Lieutenant Governor said he could see "no new sources" of tax revenue, but said "increased wealth" for all Mississippians through stepped-up indsutrialization would underwrite his programs.

He patted the backs of the administrations of ex-governor Hugh White and Gov. J. P. Coleman on which he served as lieutenant governor.

MORE PLANTS

Gartin said in 1958 Mississippi got more new industrial plants than Alabama, Arkansas, Louisiana, South Carolina, or Virginia.

He declared school appropriation has increased 144 per cent and appropriation for the College Board 141 per cent in the last eight years.

Forestry appropriation picked up 167 per cent over the period, Gartin stated.

He underlined his experience as twice Laurel mayor and twice Lieutenant governor and took another poke at Barnett, a Jackson attorney.

"Our people have never been willing to turn the governor's office over to one whose only qualification is an ambition to be governor," said Gartin.

Full Segregation Gartin's Pledge In Laurel Speech

By KENNETH TOLER
Staff Writer

LAUREL, Miss., May 26.—Lt. Gov. Carroll Gartin formally launched his campaign for governor here Tuesday with a pledge to lead the fight to maintain total segregation in Mississippi.

He said he would make that promise regardless of the "personal hardships and sacrifices" he may be forced to endure.

"I'm a total and absolute segregationist, one who genuinely believes that segregation is the best for both races," Gartin said. "Mississippians cannot traffic with those who are soft, faint-hearted, apathetic or indifferent."

He said "If necessary in that fight, I will close any public school in this state before I will see Mississippi children attend an integrated school." There is a state law, enacted with his support, giving the Governor that power.

Gartin also said he is "still convinced that the maintenance of prohibition is best for the people of our states." Dist. Atty. Charles Sullivan of Clarksdale, also seeking the governorship in the Aug. 4 Democratic primary, favors county-option legalization.

The 46-year-old lieutenant governor and World War II veteran declared that Ross Barnett of Jackson, whom he termed "my chief opponent" has no public record and that "the people of Mississippi have never been willing to turn the governor's office over to one whose only qualification is an ambition to be governor."

S. H. McDonnleal, Jones County farmer, introduced Gartin. Former Gov. Hugh White, who has thrown his support to Gartin, was in the audience.

Tutor Says Segregation Is Big Issue

MAGEE — G. L. (George) Tutor, candidate for state superintendent of education, declared here Friday night at a rally held in his behalf, that he stands firm for segregated schools and that he does consider this an issue in the coming election campaign.

"My opponent (J. M. Tubb) has said that segregation is not an issue in this campaign," Tutor cited. "I differ with him. I feel that the next four years will be the most crucial in our history insofar as segregation is concerned.

"Only recently an NAACP leader told in Meridian that we can expect integration or closed schools in Mississippi this Fall," Tutor said. "Yet, my opponent still says segration is not an isue and re-n segration is not an issue and remains silent and will not take a stand."

Tutor, declaring himself a member of the Citizens Council said that he will fight for segregation. He declared further that he "will not use state employees and state facilities to gain my personal political desires. I respect the taxpayers' dollar enough to use it for educational need only — not as a means of insuring my own election."

Mayor G. O. Parker, of Magee, who introduced the principal speaker, Mr. Tutor, estimated that 3,000 persons attended Friday night's rally, the largest crowd recalled for such an event.

He said that a cavalcade of 72 cars came from Natchez, former home of Mr. Tutor, and that banners were paraded by groups rep

Fired Missouri Teachers Seek Court Rehearing

11 Discharged Instructors Blame Bias For Dismissal

ST. LOUIS — (NNPA) — The United States Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals is asked to reverse the decision of the Federal District Court here that racial discrimination has not been proved as the cause for the wholesale dismissal of all 11 colored teachers at Moberly, Mo., when public schools there were desegregated.

In an appeal brief filed on behalf of the colored teachers, the NAACP asserts that the evidence, "objectively appraised, compels the conclusion of racial discrimination was the sole motivating factor" in firing the colored teachers in Moberly.

The NAACP attorneys contend that the action of the Moberly Board of Education was "arbitrary and irrational" and based solely on the color of the dismissed teachers.

The colored teachers had taught in Lincoln School, a combination elementary - secondary Jim Crow school, from one to 30 years before the schools were desegregated and the Lincoln School abandoned during the 1955-56 school term.

After the 1954 Supreme Court decision outlawing racial segregation in public schools, the Moberly Board of Education adopted a plan of desegregation which called for the abandonment of the Lincoln school and the absorption of the colored pupils into the remaining schools.

AFTER DESEGREGATION

The changeover seemed to necessitate fewer teachers, that is, the total teaching force at Lincoln formerly there were only seven teachers less after desegregation.

1954-55, a total of 98 were employed — 87 white and 11 colored. In 1955-56, 91 teachers were employed, all of whom were white.

Faced with an apparent need to reduce the teaching force, the Superintendent on April 11, 1956, wrote the school board setting out the training and experience of all the teachers in the school system.

He informed the board that there would be a need for 11 fewer teachers, that in reviewing the training and experience of both the white and colored teachers, he found the board's standards met by both groups, and concluded that the dismissal of one teacher to keep another employed would not be justified.

Colored teachers met with the board prior to its formal meeting of April 13, 1956, and were assured that they would be given consideration. At the meeting which followed, the board adopted the recommendations of the superintendent and ended the contracts of four white teachers.

The colored teachers were qualified to fill the vacant positions in the elementary and junior high schools. But the board then voted to end the contracts of all colored teachers, who were notified of the board's action on April 15, 1956.

Between May 4, 1955, and August 8, 1955, 12 white teachers were hired, three of whom had had no prior teaching experience, and on June 6, 1956, additional white teachers were hired.

EXPECTED EMPLOYMENT

The colored teachers contend that they met all the qualifications to teach in Moberly, that while they had no tenure, they expected continued employment as long as their services were satisfactory.

They also contend that when it became evident that a reduction of 11 teachers was not required because the contracts of three whites teachers were being terminated, the three best qualified colored teachers should have been retained and assigned to the vacant positions.

Afterwards, when vacancies occurred prior to the ending of the school term, they maintain, the colored teachers were entitled to consideration before any other applicants.

The failure to renew the contracts or to reemploy the colored teachers, under the circumstances, NAACP lawyers assert, constitutes unlawful discrimination, based on color, in violation of the 14th Amendment.

The school board holds that color was not involved, that the colored teachers were not retained or reemployed because they were not as qualified as the teachers retained on April 13, 1955, or those subsequently employed to teach in the Moberly schools.

All of the colored teachers, except Miss Yutha Hughes, held degrees from Lincoln University at Jefferson City, Mo., a state institution.

13 YEARS EXPERIENCE

One of the colored teachers, Mrs. Mary Ella Tymony, when the University of Missouri, dropped its color bars, enrolled there and received a Master's degree. She taught American History, Sociology and Speech in the Lincoln School. She had taught in Moberly for 13 years and had a total of 36 years of teaching experience.

Mrs. Ella Mae Pitts had taught at Moberly for eight years and had a total of 14 years of teaching experience. She taught the third and fourth grades.

Mrs. Lotus Harris had taught for 20 years. After teaching at Moberly from 1932 to 1942, she retired but returned in 1946 and taught until the end of the 1954-55 school

NEA Split Threatens On Integration Issue

ST. LOUIS, June 30 (AP).—The public school integration issue is threatening again to split the Nation's largest educational organization along geographical and racial lines.

White delegates from the South want the National Education Association to adopt the same mildly worded resolution that was accepted after a bitter fight in Cleveland last year. Negro delegates, with the support of some Northern whites, want a strongly worded statement condemning racial segregation.

Advocates of a strong stand lost a skirmish yesterday, but indicated they plan to keep on fighting. The showdown will come at Friday's general session.

The resolutions committee held an open hearing yesterday on the resolutions that will be up for consideration by the full convention Friday.

Reasonable Stand Asked

The proposed statement on integrating public schools called for a "spirit of fair play, good will and respect for law," and said the problem can be solved at local levels "by citizens of intelligence, saneness, and reasonableness working together. . . ."

"The resolution was attacked as wholly ineadequate, said Charles J. Suddeth, Negro principal of an elementary school in San Pablo, Calif.:

"This resolution takes no stand at all. . . . It represents a victory for those who favor segregated schools."

Southern whites protested that anything stronger would be resented in the South.

"We in the South are as deeply dedicated to equal education (for Negroes) as anyone in the country," said Robert Williams, executive secretary of the Virginia Education Association. "But we are on the firing line—we need a framework within which we must work to preserve education."

Original to Go to Floor

After an hour of debate, the committee went into closed session to review the various proposals. An informant said the committee decided to send the original to the convention floor, although any delegate may submit a proposed change before 6 p.m. today.

L. H. Pitts of Atlanta, Ga., said he planned to submit a formal proposal to make the statement stronger. Mr. Pitts is executive secretary of the Georgia Teachers and Education Association, one of 13 Negro NEA affiliates in Southern States.

Walter Ludwig, a social science teacher from Mamaroneck, N. Y., indicated he might take the floor Friday to ask for a much stronger resolution. Mr. Ludwig also wants the NEA to urge its white and Negro affiliates in the South to integrate.

REPORT DISCOUNTS INTEGRATION GAIN

Desegregation in Missouri Schools Is Found Curbed by Rental Restrictions

Special to The New York Times.

ST. LOUIS, June 13 — At least 95 per cent of Negro school children in Missouri are attending desegrated schools, but in large measure the desegregation is in name only, a report this week said.

The report was issued by the Missouri Advisory Committee of the Federal Commission on Civil Rights.

Although Missouri has acted swiftly to comply with the 1954 decision of the United States Supreme Court, the committee found that residential segregation has resulted in a large percentage of Negro children attending schools that are, in effect, Negro schools.

"Despite the much vaunted claims of complete integration in Kansas City and St. Louis—admirable as are their achievements thus far—[some] high schools remain as segregated as before integration started," the report stated.

The committee said school integration would "remain a mockery" so long as "the free choise in home-buying and renting" was denied.

100 Districts Studied

The 119-page report was prepared by Lorenzo J. Greene, Professor of History at Lincoln University, Jefferson City, Mo. Ia was based on a study of 100 school districts in which 91 per cent of the state's estimated total of 77,000 Negro school children were enrolled during the past school year.

Only two of Missouri's 114 counties have made no start on integration, the report stated. They are Pemiscot and New Madrid Counties in the extreme southeastern part of the state known as the "bootheel."

"Public officials there say no steps [to integrate] are in prospect and that both Negroes and whites are satisfied," the report said.

The committee detected a slowdown in integration since the first year after the Supreme Court decision. Of the 100 districts queried as to the date of integration, fifty-five responded and the following break-down was made:

Twenty-one districts desegregated in 1954-55; thirteen in 1955-56; ten in 1956-57; eight in 1957-58, and three in 1958-59.

Seeking reasons for the slowdown, the committee reported:

"Perhaps there has crept in a certain amount of complacency as a result of the favorable comments which Missouri's attitude toward desegregation has elicited outside the state."

The report devoted much space to praise of the desegregation program in St. Louis, which is by custom a segregated city. It gave credit to the work of civic and religious organizations and social agencies during the preceding ten years in making efforts to change the customary pattern of segregation.

"They activity helped bring about desegregation of St. Louis University, Catholic elementary schools, Washington University, increasing desegregation of major hotels, desegregation of the largest legitimate theatre and the major league ball parks, and in 1950 the desegregation of swimming pools and other municipal recreational facilities," the report said.

Many of these organizations called on the Board of Education to initiate a program of desegregation when the Supreme Court decision was made. The report noted that the organizations offered their complete cooperation.

The school board plan for quick and complete integration, accompanied by an appeal for public understanding and cooperation, met whole-hearted community response, the report said.

'Failure to rehire teachers unusual'

ST. LOUIS, Mo. — The United States District Court of Appeals conceded that failure of The Moberly School district to rehire seven colored teachers after integration in 1955 was "must unusual."

But the court ruled there was no racial discrimination.

The court upheld an earlier ruling by U.S. Judge Roy W. Harper. The teachers appealed the lower court ruling.

They had not been re-employed after the Moberly board closed a colored school when integration went into effect.

The appellate court found that "integration was completed promptly and in a manner satisfactory to all concerned. The wishes of colored persons were fully considered and observed.

"It is unusual," the court conceded that the district failed to hire "any" of the seven teachers.

"However, the judges said, "the record discloses that experts in the field of education are not always in agreement as to the best methods of evaluating qualifications."

Federal Cash Denied South's Closed Schools

Federal grants under the 1958 National Defense Education Act will go to public schools closed down or changed over to private schools, Welfare Secretary Flemming assured Senator Javits, Republican of New York, yesterday.

Senator Javits said this policy would apply immediately to schools already closed in Virginia and Arkansas.

"From the language of the National Defense Education Act it is evident that no Federal payments could be made with respect to schools which are not in operation," Mr. Flemming wrote in a letter made public by the New York Senator.

Couldn't Get U. S. Funds

The case of schools which have been converted to 'private' institutions, their very name that they are any longer 'public' would render them ineligible for Federal grants already under the act to secondary schools.

"On the same basis such schools could not receive individual aid from Federal grants to the State educational agency or the local school district, since all such grants must be distributed in accordance with plans submitted by the States and approved by the Commissioner of Education."

Senator Javits said that this ruling currently affects 13 Virginia and Arkansas schools. He noted that eight Southern States have various laws which could be used to close public schools ordered to integrate.

Others on Own Also

If additional schools are shut, he said, they also would be automatically ineligible to receive any of the approximately $90 million authorized by the National Defense Education Act.

That 1958 law established a seven-year program of aid primarily for public school instructional facilities in science, mathematics and foreign languages and for student testing and guidance programs.

"Clearly the Health, Education and Welfare Department has decided that the law requires its administrator to consider the Supreme Court's Little Rock opinion of last September that neither 'ingenious nor ingenuous' schemes to evade Federal court orders should work," Senator Javits said.

the world in dedicating its space capabilities to peaceful purposes?"

Military Uses Stressed

The United States last year created a civilian National Aeronautics and Space Administration to develop principally peaceful space projects, and opened a campaign in the United Nations for the orderly development of outer space exploration.

The committee, which participated in the creation of NASA, emphasized that many space projects cross military-civilian lines.

"The military potentialities of space technology . . . . are greater than general public discussions to date suggests," the report said. "Reconnaissance for merchant ship lane patrol and for peaceful mapping of resources can also be used to locate military targets. Communications to improve global relations can also be used to control military forces.

"Rockets for cargo and passenger delivery can also carry thermonuclear weapons. Satellites designed to return men from an orbit to a pre-selected point can also deliver bombs."

The group pointed out that a nation with real or apparent supremacy in space could gain global mastery without firing a shot.

Power Balance Can Shift

"The strategic balance of power can shift to the nation first achieving operation usability of scientific developments," it said. ". . . In the political and psychological struggle, when more than one nation has great military power, scientific leadership of itself can win respect and support from other nations."

While conceding that space work is expensive, the committee observed:

"The decision to undertake a space program cannot be made in the context of domestic conditions alone. Whether the United States undertakes such a program or not, the Soviet Union has already launched a massive program with considerable momentum. . . .

"Soviet leaders implicity believe they will be the first to explore and to use outer space. They doubt that others will be in a position to follow."

1958 Critics Now Sign

But the space group warned that "inventions cannot be scheduled in advance" and "crash programs are the most expensive kind to undertake." Ironically, these positions, when taken last year by NASA Deputy Administrator Hugh L. Dryden, brought down on him criticism from some of the officials who signed the House report.

The group listed nine "policy implications for the space program" which appeared to sum up congressional feelings about the race into the cosmos. These are:

"1. Inexorable changes in society and political power will follow the development of space capabilities; failure to take account of them would virtually be to choose the path of national extinction.

"2. What program the United States could achieve and what it will in fact achieve may be two very different things.

"3. Budget pressures in the short run should not be the primary basis for decisions on space programs which are long range and involve the very survival of the Nation.

"4. This Nation should not make inadequate short-run expenditures on its space program at substantial risk to its survival a few years later.

"5. The best advice . . . supports the view that within a decade peaceful applications of space development to weather prediction and long-range communication alone will more than pay back to the economy all the funds previously required to achieve these capabilities.

"6. The greatest benefits of space development and exploration in all probability cannot even be predicted today.

"7. Although engineering secrets related to national defense deserve the utmost protection, the greater part of the space program will progress more rapidly without the shackles of an undue security control.

"8. Full scientific and technical co-operation among the nations of the free world is essential to their joint survival and to the fastest growth of the American space program.

"9. Scientific education in the United States stands in need of critical review."

Expert Fears Lax Security

Krafft A. Ehricke, San Diego rocket designer, told The Star he subscribed in general to the committee's policy statements, but added that he saw the possibility of harmful tip-offs to the Russians in too broad, too free disclosure of missile plans.

Agreeing in general with the 12-to-18-month and 5-year time lags stipulated by the group, Mr. Ehricke said the 5-year delay might not be necessary.

"Everybody is always speaking about catching up," the engineer said. "But if we are determined enough and leap forward boldly enough, maybe it is not a question of catching up at all, but a question of passing them."

Mr. Ehricke said that Russian statements make it clear that the Soviet Union regards space exploration as a "race" or a "competition" rather than a matter for international cooperation.

"As long as this is the case,' he said, "I don't think we should give the other side the advantage of knowing our long-range plans, five years or so in advance."

Gap May Be Greater

Dr. Arthur Kantrowitz, a leading rocket propulsion expert, inclined to the view that it might take more, rather than less, than five years to close the gap with Russia.

"A lot depends on how vigorously they are going to move," Dr. Kantrowitz, vice president of AVCO Manufacturing Co., said.

The Boston scientist noted that in one field the United States seems to be ahead of the Soviet Union. This is in the area of measuring devices.

"As far as data obtained from satellites is concerned, I would note that we have done very well," he said. But he agreed that in the vital field of propulsive power, the United States is behind the Soviet Union.

"With the launching of Atlas, I think we did something quite equivalent to the Russian Sputniks," he added.

ALSO BALK AT MOSCOW TRIP:

Governors Oppose School Integration

BILOXI, Miss. (AP)—A states rights school desegregation plan and a proposed trip to Moscow faced almost certain defeat in today's closing session of the Executive Committee of the National Governors Conference.

Objection to the proposed trip to the Soviet Union came Monday from governors who felt that the 25-30 day junket in July plus the ensuing weeklong national governors conference in Puerto Rico in August would be too long for them to be away from the United States.

URGED BY COLLINS

The school desegregation plan, proposed by Gov. Leroy Collins of Florida, chairman of the nine-governor committee, is aimed at letting each state decide where, when and how to start integrating schools.

Collins told newsmen he feared his proposed federal-state program would be rejected in the Executive Committee for lack of immediate encouragement from the President.

He indicated the plan would be submitted to the President at an undetermined date. The full plan hinges on cooperation of the President, the Congress and the governors.

BOARD FOR EACH STATE

A five-member commission recommended by the governor and appointed by the President would be set up in each state to handle civil rights and school desegregation cases.

The federal courts, which now have original jurisdiction in these matters, would be given appellate jurisdiction except in cases where the commission failed to act.

The commission has a two-fold purpose, Collins explained: "To facilitate desegregation where it is feasible and to set up specific safeguards against efforts to force desegregation where it is not feasible."

Success of the plan hinges on cooperation by Congress, the President and the governors. With the absence of interest from the White House, Collins said, "I don't see how the goal could be accomplished and there is no point in pursuing it any further here."

He does plan, however, to introduce the proposal at Tuesday's session.

The nine governors came here to work out the agenda for the Aug. 2-5 National Governors Conference in Puerto Rico.

Integration Middle Way Is Offered

Let States Lead, Gov. Collins Asks

BILOXI, Miss. (AP)—A federal-state program aimed at letting each state decide where to start school desegregation was advanced Monday by Gov. LeRoy Collins of Florida.

Collins, chairman of the National Governors Conference executive committee, told a news conference that both extremes must yield if a solution to the racial issue is to be reached.

"The two extremes will have to be brought together," he said. "The area we have to work in is in the middle area, and solutions to problems there do not please either extreme. It is essential that a solution be found if we are to develop a long-range solution."

HELPS WHERE FEASIBLE

Collins' plan is designed to "facilitate desegregation where it is feasible and to set up specific safeguards against efforts to force desegregation where it is not feasible."

His plan calls for a five-member commission in each state, recommended by the governor and appointed by the President, to take original jurisdiction in school desegregation cases and decide on the state level where, when and how schools will be desegregated.

Federal court would act as appellate court in cases where the commission failed.

If Norfolk Stays Closed

Navy Plans to Ask Money For Integrated Schools

WASHINGTON (AP)—The Navy was reported Monday to be planning to ask federal money to operate racially integrated schools at its Norfolk base, if closed Norfolk schools do not open soon.

The Navy schools would be for the use of children whose parents live on the base.

Secretary of Welfare Arthur S. Flemming reported on the Navy idea at a news conference in which he outlined steps he said federal agencies are taking to provide schooling for children of military families whose usual schools have been closed in the integration situation.

Flemming said his department could act on a Navy request for funds within 24 hours, once an application was received in proper form.

Civilian Employes.

He also said Federal civilian employes as well as assigned military personnel who work in communities with closed schools are "confronted with an intolerable situation."

Flemming reported his department is working on proposed legislation to allow it to provide education for children of military personnel who live off the base, if their public schools are closed.

He said the present thinking is to confine the legislation's coverage to those under orders to stay in the community. This would include military, but not civilian, families.

As for the civilian families, Flemming said "the basic question is how far the government should go in dealing with a local situation of this kind. I would not foreclose the possibility we may move to aid them in the future."

He also said the civilians' situation "raises the question of the ability of the federal government to retain and recruit qualified personnel who are willing to carry on its work in these communities."

Gov't Plans Integrated School For Navy Children

By HELEN THOMAS

WASHINGTON—(UPI) — The government announced Monday it will set up an integrated school next month for 500 Navy children who live on the Norfolk, Va., naval base unless Norfolk's closed public schools are reopened before then.

Arthur S. Flemming, secretary of health, education and welfare, also told a news conference the administration is preparing legislation to permit the federal government to set up schools for children of military personnel who live off of military bases.

Present law permits the government to provide schooling only for children who live on federal property when other public education is not available.

TO SEEK FUNDS

The Navy announced last week it would seek funds from Flemming's department to provide schooling for children living on the nava lbase unless closed Virginia schools reopened "shortly."

Flemming said the funds would be forthcoming "immediately," so that federal school facilities could be ready in time for the start of the new school term in February.

Norfolk public schools, as well those in two other Virginia communities, have been shut down under the state's "massive resistance" to Supreme Court desegregation rulings.

CALLS SPECIAL SESSION

The Virginia Supreme Court and a three-judge federal court recently struck down the laws designed to avoid segregation. But Virginia Gov. J. Lindsay Almond has called a special session of the General Assembly Wednesday to hear other plans for forestalling integration.

Flemming said of the four communities where schools are closed because of the desegregation issue, "Norfolk presents the most acute problem to the government in terms of numbers of students."

The three other communities to which he referred are Little Rock, Ark., and Charlottesville, and Warren County, Va.

Omaha Looks For Teachers

OMAHA, Neb. — English, science, mathematics and home economics teachers who wish to secure employment can find jobs in Omaha where 250 to 270 teachers are needed.

Omaha is an important railroad center and food processing city, accompanied by a number of distribution firms. It is a city of over 339,000, with almost one-tenth, or 25,000, Negroes.

Teachers interested are requested to write to Fred Hill, Associate superintendent, Board of Education, 3902 Davenport St., Omaha, Neb.

FATHER BLAMES INTEGRATION IN AMPUTATION OF SON'S LEG

HACKENSACK,N.J.(AP) A father filed $250,000 suit claiming racial integration at an Englewood school was a prime factor in the amputation of his son's leg.

Benjamin Doktor,Englewood, filed the suit in Superior Court on behalf of his son,Robert,14, against the Englewood Board of Education.

Doktor said his son was a student at Engle Street Junior High School in 1957 when Negroes were first enrolled after passage of a state antidiscrimination law. Doktor said a 16 year old Negro student, new to the building, wandered into Robert'S classroom by mistake Feb.15,1957/

He began pushing Robert and the boy fell against a desk,breaking his leg. It later had to be cut off, Doktor said.

Doktor said the fact that older boys "of different backgrounds" were integrated into the school was a'prime factor' in his son's injury. He also blamed what he said was inexperience among the faculty.

Ransacked School Is Forced to Close

MAYWOOD, N. J., Jan. 15 (UPI)—An 800-student grammar school was forced to close today after being ransacked by juveniles on a wild search for money.

The burglars took about $15 during their rampage of smashing windows and ripping desks at Memorial School, causing damage estimated at between $300 and $1500. The intruders broke the windows of at least 25 classroom doors, ripped open two locked desks and rifled 20 others.

New Jersey Negro Claims Bias Blocked Teaching Job

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) — The superintendent of schools and the president of the board of education of Madison Township Tuesday denied racial discrimination in refusing to hire a Negro teacher.

Dr. Eugene W. Schronk, superintendent of schools, said he did not consider Charles E. Williams of New Brunswick qualified to teach a group of younger retarded students.

And Richard Pine, president of the board of education, said it hires only on the superintendent's recommendation.

Schronk said he would be willing to recommend Williams for a job if a suitable vacancy occurred for which he was qualified and Pine said the board would not hesitate to accept Schronk's recommendation.

Pine and Schronk testified at a hearing conducted by Dr. John P. Milligan, director of the state division of discrimination, on a complaint against them by Williams.

Williams, who holds a bachelor of science degree in education and a limited state certificate to teach in elementary schools, contends he was denied consideration for a job because he is a Negro.

Milligan said he hoped to reach a decision by Easter.

There was testimony at the hearing that no Negroes are employed by the Madison Township Board of Education, that no classes below the fourth grade are taught by men, and that more than 20 of the 90 teachers in the school system have less certification than Williams.

Schronk testified that the post for which Williams applied is now filled by a teacher without special experience with retarded children but with many years of experience as a regular teacher. He said he considered this an important point.

Negro History Gets NY Okay

NEW YORK—In an initial step to have Negro history become a part of the curriculum of New York's elementary schools, the curriculum committee of P. S. 63 has received faculty approval to integrate the study in the school.

According to an announcement from the committee, "The Integration of Negro History in the public schools will provide for each child the knowledge that all ethnic groups have made contributions to American history. It will stimulate, on the part of the Negro child, a greater desire for democratic participation.

"When a comprehensive study of the Negro becomes a part of the curricula of his school, the colored child will identify more completely with those theories concerning social competence and an individual's worth to his group if he feels that he, too, had ancestors who made some of these valuable contributions."

RTHERN REPORT

New York School Board Feuds Over Fresh NAACP Demands

By CHARLES WILLIAMS
News Special Writer

NEW YORK CITY (Special) — The integration situation in the New York City school system is reaching at the boiling point. For five years, the battle over public education in minority areas has raged without a final decision being reached. New legal moves have now made the local issue of national interest.

The latest crisis began when Negro children attempted to transfer to schools outside of Harlem. Their parents based requests for such transfers on the U.S. Court's 1954 desegregation decision, and claimed that conditions in Negro residential areas were segregated and inferior.

The New York City Board of Education refused to allow the children to reigster outside their school district, and the issue was brought before the Dec. 15, Judge Justine Polier of the Domestic Relations Court gave her decision. She said that the children did not have to comply with the established school zoning because the area schools are segregated and inferior as the parents charged.

Judge Polier also said: "The parents have a constitutionally protected right to elect to educate their children rather than subject them to discriminatory inferior education."

INTENSE OPPOSITION

The decision that the Board of Education should appeal Judge Polier's decision met with intense opposition. Dr. Gardner C. Taylor, president of the Protestant Council of New York City — and a member of the Board of Education — led the attack. According to reports, Dr. Taylor said he didn't know the merits of the case, but that it was clearly one of discrimination. Dr. Taylor said that appeals this decision would be government of, for, and by the people, but government against the people."

Before the Board of Education reached a decision on whether or not to appeal the Court ruling, the parents of the Negro children involved demanded the removal of school superintendent John J. Theobald and other officials for incompetency. The charges included:

"Failing to maintain the public school system of New York City in accordance with the Constitution of the United States and that of the State of New York by discriminating against Negro and Puerto Rican school children.

"Ignoring charges of discrimination against Negro and Puerto Rican children. Rather than investigate, they covered up and issued false statements.

"Ignoring and refusing to implement the recommendations of the Board's Commission on Integration as the Board directed it to do.

"Instituting a program diametrically opposed to the Commission on Integration by failing to assign teachers subject (minority area) schools and rezone segregated areas."

Despite the furor, the Board of Education voted four to one to appeal Judge Polier's decision, with two abstentions and two members of the Board absent.

The four who voted to appeal were:

Francis W. H. Adams, former Police Commissioner.

Cornelius J. Walsh, insurance executive.

Dr. Charles F. Rank, savings and loan association officer.

Mrs. Cecile Ruth Sands, president of the Hebrew Education Society of Brooklyn.

LONE DISSENTER

The lone dissenter on the Board was Dr. Gardner C. Taylor, who denounced the Board for "committing the city to a course."

Other reaction was equally intense. The four Board members who voted in favor of the appeal were named as "Enemies of civil rights of the week" by the leading Negro newspaper, Amsterdam News. (Contrary to the practice of New York newspapers to refrain from identifying an individual's religion or race, the article specifically mentioned that two of the men were Roman Catholics and the other was a Mason.)

State Senator James L. Watson and Assemblyman Lloyd E. Dickens announced plans to introduce a joint resolution in the State Legislature for an investigation of the city's school integration problems.

The Mayor was given an ultimatum to fire all members of the Board of Education with the exception of Dr. Taylor. (Charles H. Silvers, president of the Board, a long time supporter of integration, was not even spared in the demand for officials' scalps.)

The most spectacular opposition came from the Emergency Committee on the Harlem School Crisis. Led by ministers, the group has been set up to direct a mass march on City Hall if the plan to appeal the Court decision is not dropped. The Negro community is being mobilized, and leaders of the march hope to have thousands in the demonstration — tentatively scheduled for Feb. 20. A simultaneous boycott of the city schools by Negro children is planned.

(There is little likelihood the planned demonstration and boycott will come off as the result of an agreement reached Tuesday to have the students attend classes at schools designated by the superintendent of schools pending the outcome of litigation).

On the legal front, the attorney for the parents, Paul B. Zuber, will not have to face the appeals court alone. Thurgood Marshall, chief counsel of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, will help defend the case.

Compromise has been ruled out by the Negro parents and their supporters. NAACP attorney Thurgood Marshall, who has been meeting with members of the Board of Education and school superintendent Theobald, has emphatically denied reports that he is seeking a compromise solution.

Unless one side surrenders, the case will eventually reach the Supreme Court. A decision in favor of the parents by the high tribunal could decree that school zones are unconstitutional when minority groups are concentrated in certain neighborhoods.

The ultimate effect of such a decision — both in its own right and as a precedent — could be as great as the original 1954 Court ruling on school segregation.

Report Hits New Yorkers' Segregation

NEW YORK (AP) — Tens of thousands of Negro and Puerto Rican children are receiving inferior education because New York City schools are in effect segregated, a Jewish group charged Sunday.

The unit, the New York Metropolitan Council of the American Jewish Congress, called on the board of education to take steps to end racial discrimination in the schools.

The council said the board has been slow to follow recommendations for integration made by its own integration commission. Five separate reports by the commission contradict a recent statement by Schools Superintendent John J. Theobald that discrimination does not exist in the schools, the council said.

The Jewish group called upon the board to:

Work out a plan of permissive transfers, under which children attending "segregated" schools could attend those more racially balanced.

Work out a school zoning plan that would result in more racially balanced school.

Build new schools in "border areas" — those that bridge sections where one race or group predominates.

Harlem Negroes OK School Plan

NEW York (AP)—Negro parents who have been keeping nine children out of Harlem schools since September, on the ground that education there was not up to citywide standards, agreed Tuesday to enroll them at others designated by the superintendent of schools.

Supt. John J. Theobald said the youngsters would not be assigned either to the original schools or those requested by the parents. He said the schools would be selected strictly on the basis of "the educational and emotional development of the children."

The parents held their children out of school on the claim of segregation and poor facilities in Harlem institutions.

Interim Pact Is Reached on Harlem Schools

Children to Attend Class While Court Decides on Bias

By GENE CURRIVAN

An interim solution was reached yesterday between the Board of Education and Harlem parents who have kept their children out of schools they considered inferior and discriminatory.

The parents agreed to send their nine youngsters to schools selected by Dr. John J. Theobald, Superintendent of Schools, pending the outcome of litigation. The children will not return to the schools they had attended or to others their parents had requested.

Instead, those who attended junior high schools will be sent to J. H. S. 43 at 509 West 129th Street, and the others to elementary schools not yet selected. J. H. S. 43 embodies a pilot project with unusual guidance and counseling services and a cultural program sponsored by the College Entrance Examination Board and the National Scholarship Service for Negro Students.

The announcement was made in the offices of the Mayor's Committee on Intergroup Relations at 80 Lafayette Street by Dr. Theobald and Paul Zuber, attorney for the parents.

Dr. Theobald stressed the point that this was an interim solution made in the interest of the children's education. He said that the board would continue to enforce compliance with the compulsory education law. He also said that this decision would have no bearing on the pending court cases.

The board has an appeal pending in the case of two of the parents whose contention that the schools were inferior was upheld by Justine Wise Polier, Justice of the Domestic Relations Court. Other parents are appealing from another decision made by Domestic Relations Justice Nathaniel Kaplan who ruled that the parents had violated the education law by keeping their children out of school.

There also is a civil suit pending in which the parents are demanding $1,000,000 in damages from the city for the alleged injustice suffered by the children in "segregated" schools.

Mr. Zuber declared that the decision of the board to appeal the Polier case would eventually force the issue to the United States Supreme Court "and cost each side about $50,000." He charged that Francis W. H. Adams, former Police Commissioner and member of the board was the leading figure behind the move. Dr. Theobald said the board's decision was made solely on a jurisdictional basis.

Dr. Theobald announced that there would be on extension of the J. H. S. 43 pilot project this month to junior high schools 120, 136 and 139 in Central Harlem; J. H. S. 171 in East Harlem and J. H. H. 142 in South Jamaica, Queens.

4 NEGRO MOTHERS FREED IN BOYCOTT

Four Negro mothers who had been found guilty of violating the Compulsory Education Law escaped punishment yesterday under a ruling by Justice Nathaniel Kaplan.

Justice Kaplan of Domestic Relations Court, announced last week he would take no action against the parents if they returned their children to school under an agreement reached between their lawyers and the Board of Education. The mothers had kept their children out of Harlem schools they considered "inferior and discriminatory." The agreement provided that they could send the children to other schools designated by the board. This was done.

The mothers were Mrs. Donald Ware of 1220 Madison Avenue, Mrs. Isaac Prioleau of 2[illegible] Madison Avenue, Mrs. Elijah Wadley of 1980 Park Avenue and Mrs. Mary Mallory of 212 West 129th Street.

A pending case of a similar nature against Mrs. Ruth Porter of 255 West 127th Street has been dropped by the board.

16 Schools To Join In Integration

Parents and taxpayers' organizations in Glendale, Queens, will hold a rally Thursday night to discuss permissive transfers of pupils from six Bedford-Stuyvesant schools into some sections of Queens as well as to other sections of Brooklyn. The meeting has been called by the Glendale Taxpayers Assn.

The permissive transfers involve more than 2000 Bedford-Stuyvesant pupils. They will be allowed, if their parents consent, to transfer from their predominantly Negro schools to 10 schools in neighborhoods which are predominantly white.

In some instances, the pupils will travel as much as three miles to their new schools. If they have to travel more than a mile, free bus transportation will be provided.

The permissive transfers were announced by the Board of Education yesterday at a conference with some of the parents.

The six Bedford-Stuyvesant schools from which the permissive transfers will be authorized and the schools to which the pupils may go, are listed below. All addresses are in Brooklyn unless otherwise specified.

PS 21, Chauncey St. and Patchen Ave.—To PS 155, at 1355 Herkimer St.

PS 25, at 787 Lafayette Ave.—To PS 123, at 100 Irving Ave.

PS 28, at 1001 Herkimer St.—To PS 221, on Empire Blvd., and PS 91, on East New York Ave.

PS 129, at 640 Quincy St.—To PS 86, on Irving Ave., B'klyn., and to an unspecified Queens school.

PS 137, at 121 Saratoga Ave., to PS 116, on Knickerbocker Ave.

PS 26, at 1014 Lafayette Ave., to unspecified Queens schools.

The Queens schools to which the Bedford-Stuyvesant pupils may be transferred are PS 68, in Ridgewood; PS 77, Ridgewood; PS 88, Ridgewood, and PS 91, Glendale.

NAACP Puts Suburbs On Target List

Speaker Says School Mixing Futile If Housing Ban Holds

NEW YORK (UPI) — Delegates to the 50th anniversary convention of the National Assn. of the Advancement of Colored People were urged Tuesday to extend the integration front to housing.

Dr. Robert C. Weaver, vice chairman of the association, said the NAACP "cannot fight for racial integration in public schools and acquiesce in segregated suburbs."

On the convention floor a personality flare-up involving Negro Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-N. Y.) was resolved when NAACP Executive Secretary Roy Wilkins invited Powell to address the convention's concluding session Sunday at the Polo Grounds.

Powell earlier had turned down an invitation to speak Thursday because—according to a spokesman—he had not been asked until last Friday, and then "only as an afterthought." He accepted the new invitation.

In his call for action on integrated housing, Weaver asserted: "What we do about housing will go far in determining how real the school integration decisions of the Supreme Court will be in our lifetime."

He said local housing committees are operating "in a more favorable climate than ever before." But he charged that Negroes were being discriminated against by being forced to move to the suburbs by paying unduly high rents in city slums.

Experts Say Race Is Not A Factor

By Patricia McCormack

NEW YORK. 2 (UPI) — Did "Revenge for Tallahassee" have anything to do with the gang-rape of a 14-year-old white girl by a band of Negro teen-agers in a New York schoolyard?

No, say some New York authorities who have investigated the case. Not likely, say others. Possibly, says a sociologist.

Racial tension? Not an issue, the investigators and families of the children say.

Background and living conditions of the teen-agers? A factor, the experts state, yet not an obvious one.

Why then, did the six boys, — ranging in age from 14 to 17 — seize the girl one night a week ago, drag her to a dark spot on an outside stair landing, knock her down and two of them sexually assault her?

One Had Kissed Girl

At a magistrate's hearing this week to determine whether the case should be sent to the grand jury for possible indictments, a fraternization factor was brought out by the defense when it was testified that a few days before the assualt, the girl—whose name authorities are withholding—was kissed and hugged by the 16-year-old youth, Jacob Bethea, whom she identified as the leader of the attackers.

In response to a question from the bench she said she "must have" kissed Bethea back. She also testified that on that occasion she had promised him intimacies later on, but she said this was just to put him off that night and that she didn't mean it.

Was It Revenge?--

The factors were not the same as in the Tallahassee case where four young white men raped a Negro coed, were tried and sentenced to life imprisonment. But the Tallahassee case nevertheless made its influence felt in the hearing room.

A Mixed Neighborhood

The school the white girl attends and was attacked in, is in a neighborhood where people are neither terribly rich nor terribly poor. It's a mixed neighborhood. The school population is nine per cent Negro, 54.4 per cent Puerto Rican, and 36.6 per cent white.

Three of the alleged attackers once went to school there and now attend an automotive trade school from which they have been suspended. A fourth is a messenger.

The school isn't considered a problem school. The neighborhood isn't considered having more than a normal number of broken homes and wayward youngsters. If it did, the school would have been put on a list of 200 problem schools, George Lent, of the department of education, said.

There is a night recreation program at the school for adults and children. But the schoolyard strictly speaking, is an extension of the street and anyone can get in. The gates are not locked at night between March 15 and Dec. 1.

Police, discounting racial tension in the case, said the boys parents were "shocked and disheartened" by the crime and have cooperated fully with the authorities.

The boys live in modest apartments or in parts of big houses that have been made into apartments. In some of the families both parents work.

Parents Want Justice

The girl lives in a modest one family dwelling that has a small yard, a luxury in the neighborhood. Her parents are "sick and hysterical" over the incident. "They are Italian and don't understand our courts; they want justice," Investigating Detective Matthew Birmingham said.

The Tallahassee coed rape case got into the official court record when the lawyers argued for the exclusion of reporters from the hearing.

Attorney Bernard Fintz, defending John Rich, 16, said one New York paper, in an editorial, already has called this a "Tallahassee Case"— in reverse. The other boys in court were Henry Stokes, 16, Bethea, and Edward Jacobs, 17. The younger boys were not named.

A sociologist, Dr. David Abrahamsen, was asked about the possibility that the Tallahassee affair had given the boys ideas.

At an unconscious level, he said, it could have been one of the motivating forces. In such a case, he explained, the boys would act out of revenge, doing to a white girl what white men did to a Negro girl.

Fintz said he didn't know whether the defendants were aware of the Tallahassee case. But Abrahamsen said that some types of crimes are like contagious diseases and spread from one part of the country to another.

There are many, many other factors in mass sexual attacks, said Dr. Abrahamsen. He is a professor at the new school for social Research and a consultant for the New York Mental Hygiene department.

He has written a number of books, including one called "who are the guilty" and "A Study of Sex Offenders at Sing Sing." In cases such as this, he said, boys go after a girl in an impulse to act out frustrations.

A Disturbed Makeup

Such waiting out, he said, usually is symptomatic of psychological make-up, a disturbed make-up.

Normal children, according to Dr. Abrahamsen, find other outlets— like recreation, track, baseball, and football.

"But sometimes," he said, the body is stronger than the mind and the mind gives in to the body's drive. It's a terrible thing, sex crimes. If these people can't release their emotions in a normal way they do it in an irregular way.

300 Picketing Parents Fight N.Y. Pupil Shift

NEW YORK (AP) — Three hundred parents from Queens Borough picketed City Hall Thursday in protest against a proposed transfer of almost 400 pupils, mostly Negro and Puerto Rican, from Brooklyn to Queens schools.

They contended their opposition was not based on racial grounds. They said the proposed transfer would be costly and would run counter to the "neighborhood concept" of schools.

The pickets, parading in a steady rain, carried placards with slogans such as "Don't Tread on Us."

Six small Negro children counter - picketed a few feet away. Signs carried by the tots said "This Is New York City, Not Little Rock" and "Are We The JD's (juvenile delinquents) That Glendale Fears?"

Glendale is a part of Queens.

Mrs. Naomi Clark, of Brooklyn, mother of one of the young pickets, said she wanted her boy to go to a Glendale school because Glendale schools had more capacity and a higher achievement level and because Glendale itself is "inviting."

"It's the democratic way of life," she said.

Superintendent of Schools John J. Theobald announced earlier this week the proposed transfer of pupils next fall.

Housewives To Support New York Integration

Dispatch Chicago Ill. Sat 2-11-59

NEW YORK — A group of Queens housewives pledged "wholehearted cooperation" to the Board of Education in the transfer of 1,000 pupils — most of them Negro or Puerto Rican — from Brooklyn to Queens public schools.

In a letter to Dr. John T. Theobald, superintendent of schools, Mrs. Beverly Spiegel of Flushing, president of the Queens Women's Division of the American Jewish congress, hailed the transfer plan as a "giant step forward in the effort to provide equal educational facilities for all of the city's children."

The American Jewish Congress leader wrote that "the more than 1,000 mothers and housewives of the Queens Women's Division welcome the Board of Education's action. We wish to assure the Board and local school authorities of our wholehearted coperation in helping to make the transfer a smooth and uneventful one."

In her letter, Mrs. Spiegel expressed "shock" at what she called the "narrow, selfish attitude of certain segments of the population of Queens that oppose the transfer plan."

Such opposition, she said, "does no credit to the majority of our borough's citizens who are deeply committed to the principle of equality of education for all children, regardless of their race or religion."

Mrs. Spiegel said the American Jewish Congress women's group in Queens supports the transfer plan for three reasons,

1) It will permit children from overcrowded, split-session schools to enjoy the advantages of a full day in schools with normal-size class enrollments.

2) It will permit utilization of scores of classrooms in the public schools of Ridgewood and Glendale which are now empty.

3) It will provide an opportunity for Negro and Puerto Rican children from the Bedford-Stuyvesant area to attend racially integrated classes.

"Many of the inadequate schools in our city — such as those in the Bedford-Stuyvesant area of Brooklyn — are in fact segregated schools," Mrs. Spiegel declared. "The Board of Education decision to transfer students from these schools thus represents an affirmation of the city's commitment to a program of public school integration.

"We congratulate the Board for resisting pressure based on prejudice and bigotry and we pledge our enthusiastic support of this and all similar efforts to provide better schools and to end de facto segregation in our borough and our city."

PROTEST NEW YORK RACIAL SHIFT

300 White Parents Picket City Hall

Advertiser Montgomery Ala. Fri 6-26-57

NEW YORK (AP)—Three hundred white parents picketed City Hall Thursday in protest against forced transfer of Negro and Puerto Rican slum children into their schools.

"Don't tread on us," read signs which pickets carried in a steady march.

Later, a delegation talked with Mayor Robert F. Wagner, who promised to discuss their protests with school officials.

The demonstrators insisted they are not fighting integration as such and are not anti-Negro. But they claimed the importation of youngsters into Queens schools from Brooklyn slums will lower property values and teaching standards, and increase juvenile delinquency.

New York permits no legal segregation. But in neighborhoods where one race predominates, schools follow a pattern that is equivalent to segregation.

Nearly three years ago, the Board of Education outlined a bold plan to force integration on such schools by transporting small groups of Negroes into white school areas.

This aroused considerable protest from teachers, parents and others. The board backed down to a degree and offered assurances that its limited integration plan would not cross borough lines.

However, this week the board announced plans to transport 1,000 Negroes and Puerto Ricans from the tough, teeming Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn to schools in the adjoining borough of Queens.

Some 390 of them were scheduled to enter four public schools in the Glendale section of Queens next term.

The board contended Bedford-Stuyvesant schools are overcrowded while Glendale schools are not before used to maximum capacity.

Glendale residents raised a storm of protest, climaxed by Thursday's demonstration. They demanded that the board reopen closed schools in Brooklyn rather than transport Bedford-Stuyvesant students some three miles to predominantly white schools.

Six Negro children counterpicketed the Glendale demonstrators outside City Hall. Their placards read:

"This is New York City, not Little Rock."

"Are we the JD's that Glendale fears?"

The mother of one of the Negro youngsters, Naomi Clark, said she wanted her boy in Glendale schools because they have a higher achievement level.

"It's the democratic way of life," she declared.

Attitude Offers Scant Hope That Any Integration Is Workable

Those who labor under the delusion that "token integration" would really satisfy anti - segregation forces should consider latest developments in New York, where three hundred white parents have been picketing City Hall in protest against the forced transfer of Negro and Puerto Rican slum children into their public schools.

The white demonstrators insist they are not fighting integration as such and are not anti - Negro. Their position is that the unjustified importation of colored Brooklyn students into heretofore white schools of the Queens borough will lower property values and increase juvenile delinquency.

Although New York permits no legal segregation, there are neighborhoods where one race predominates. Thus, schools in these areas follow an all-white or an all-colored pattern which is equivalent to segregation. Negro pressure groups bitterly resent this and have demanded an unrealistic program to force a radical change.

Ever meek and servile in the fac of Negro demands, the Board of Education has drawn up a weird, un - American plan to force integration upon white neighborhoods, by transporting small groups of colored children to white schools across town via buses.

According to an Associated Press summary, this plan has aroused much protest from teachers, parents and others. Nevertheless, the politically - minded Board has gone ahead with announced plans for transporting 1,000 Negroes and Puerto Ricans (mostly colored) from "the tough, teeming Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn to the schools in the adjoining section of Queens.

Queens residents, with considerable logic, demand that the board reopen schools which have been closed in Brooklyn, rather than haul colored youngsters some three miles to be mixed in "predominately white schools." Parents of Negro students insist that their children have a right to attend school with whites as "the democratic way of life."

Long before the Board dreamed up its blueprint for mass mixing, public schools in Queens had already practiced "token integration", enrolling a number of colored children without protest or pressure. Even so, "token integration" was not enough to satisfy ruthless advocates of compulsion in New York.

Nor would "token integration" permanently satisfy pressure groups in the South, once they got a foot in the door of a public school system. The truth is that "token integration" is merely an entering wedge and forerunner to indiscriminate mixing.

"Token integration" is a glib catch-phrase, bandied about speciously to coax the naive and unwary into a mood of defeatism. "Token integration" really means appeasement and eventual surrender wherever such an untenable theory is accepted in good faith as an instrument of compromise.

NYC board asks textbook change

NEW YORK — The nine-member Board of Superintendents of the Board of Education last week called on textbook publishers to include a "representation of non - white individuals in illustrations in textbooks."

As desegregation in the schools becomes more common in compliance with federal law, the board said, there will be a rising national market for texts "that reflect a more fully integrated community."

"WE FEEL that more publishers should be ready and willing to include such illustrations at this time," declared Miss Ethel F. Huggard, associate superintendent in charge of curriculum development.

She pointed out that "there are not very many such textbooks available now," explaining that only "one per cent or less" of the textbooks include such illustrations.

The recommendation by the board to the publishers, as Dr. John J. Theobald, superintendent of schools, states, is only a request "for a factually adequate representation of the realities of social life in America today."

AMERICAN TEXTBOOK Publishers Institute of 432 Fourth Ave., which has 80 member companies was not exactly happy over the recommendation.

Austin J. McCaffrey, executive secretary and spokesman for the group, said:

"Any decision to alter the content of books themselves must remain within the framework of individual company policy."

He added, however, that the Institute would urge "serious consideration of the request."

Two Accused In Rape Case Face Hearing

NEW YORK (AP) — Two of six Negro boys accused of raping a 14-year-old white girl face a hearing in Children's Court Tuesday.

The pair, aged 14 and 15 are charged with juvenile delinquency. Their names were not released because of their ages.

The youngsters were released in their parents' custody because of their age.

However, the other four, aged 16 and 17, are being held under 25,000 bail each at the Brooklyn Youth House. They face a hearing Wednesday.

The six are accused of dragging the girl into an alley near her school last Thursday night and raping her three times.

The victim and several girl friends were walking home from a junior high school after a recreation program.

The older boys are identified as John Rich, Jacob Bethea, and Henry Stokes, all 16, and Edward Jacobs, 17.

The victim was not identified because of her age.

Police said Bethea was the ringleader and that he and Rich admitted raping the girl, but that Jacobs denied it.

There have been at least five cases in New York in which Negroes have been involved in rape cases concerning white women. There have been arrests in two cases.

Last year, there were 1,115 rape cases reported in New York and 872 were solved. The race of the persons involved is not specified in police records.

There is no death penalty in New York for rape.

N.Y. School Shift Rapped

NEW YORK (AP) — Mayor Robert F. Wagner has promised picketing white parents that he will get in touch with the city school superintendent about the planned transfer of 1,000 pupils—mostly Negroes and Puerto Ricans.

Supt. John J. Theobald recently announced plans to shift the 1,000 pupils out of crowded schools in the Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn, which is populated mostly by Negroes, to less crowded areas of the city.

About half the 1,000 would be reassigned in the fall to five schools in Queens, a borough adjoining Brooklyn. The other half would be shifted to six schools in Brooklyn.

About 300 parents and other persons from the Glendale section of Queens picketed outside City Hall in the rain Thursday in protest.

Spokesmen for the pickets said they were not anti-Negro and were not protesting school integration as such. They contended that the shift of children from Brooklyn slums would increase juvenile delinquency in their neighborhood, impair teaching standards, and lower property values.

Eight Negro children and two Negro mothers counter picketed at City Hall. They carried signs reading "This is N.Y.C., not Little Rock."

There is no legal or intended segregation in New York City public schools. In some instances, however, neighborhood racial patterns cause school enrollments that are almost all-white or all-Negro.

Representatives of the white pickets and Queens Borough President John Clancy conferred with the mayor for half an hour. It was at this conference that Wagner said he would get in touch with Theobald about the transfer plans.

N.Y. Negroes Said Sending Children South

NEW YORK (AP)—Some New York Negro families, protesting the spread of juvenile delinquency and racial tension in the nation's largest city, are choosing to send their children to segregated schools in the South, the New York Times reported Saturday.

Overcrowded conditions in public schools as well as overcrowded neighborhoods, where youngsters are subjected to undesirable living and recreational conditions, are other factors influencing parents to send their children out of the state, the newspaper said.

Wide disagreement was reported, however, among Negro leaders on the number of children leaving the city to attend southern schools.

One Negro leader placed the number at 2,000.

Another Negro leader estimated the number at 50 and added that the trend actually was in the opposite direction—that more Southern children are being sent here to school away from segregated institutions in the South.

The newspaper's report was based on interviews with parents and school and church leaders. Those quoted included the following:

TOTAL IS 1,000

The Rev. J. Archie Hargraves of the Congregational Church of the Nazarene in Brooklyn. He said 10 of the 475 families in his congregation are sending children out of town this fall, seven of them to Virginia and North Carolina. He said he knew of 20 other families taking similar action and he estimated the total number of children involved at 1,000.

The Rev. George E. Calvert, minister of the Church of the Son of Man, in Manhattan, said families sending their children to Southern schools found it "simpler to educate children in the old culture than to make the new, confusing city culture relevant to the lives of their children."

Roy Wilkins, national executive secretary of the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), disagreed with the large numbers estimated by some and said he "would be astonished if as many as 50 Negro children from New York were sent back South."

"It's the other way," Wilkins added. "Hundreds of Southern children are sent up here. They live catch-as-catch-can here with relatives, to enjoy better education here."

One Negro father, unidentified by name, has a son who has just been graduated from a high school in Pensacola, Fla. The father said he sent his son to school there because New York has "just too much juvenile delinquency and racial tension."

Dr. Ofelia Mendoza, education director of the Urban League of Greater New York, said the league had received from 25 to 30 calls daily last fall from Negro parents asking how to transfer children from overcrowded schools.

Of all the inquiries she said, only two parents decided to sent their children to schools in the South.

N. Y. Whites Protest Plan For Schools

Daily News Griffin, Ga. Thurs. 8-27-59

NEW YORK (UPI)—A plan to transfer 400 Negro pupils from Brooklyn to predominantly white schools in the borough of Queens faced a new challenge today from a group of white parents.

Five mothers from the affected section filed an appeal with State Education Commissioner Dr. James E. Allen Jr. to block the transfer.

The city board of education has said the action was planned because of overcrowded conditions in the Brooklyn schools and vacancies in Queens.

The mothers' group charged that the move was arbitrary and unnecessary because there were other schools closer to the homes of the Brooklyn pupils to which they could be transferred. The appeal also said bus transportation for the transferred students would involve illegal spending.

The protesting group denied that race was any factor in their dissatisfaction with the board's plan.

Earlier attempts to block the plan had been based on the "neighborhood school" concept. The Queens residents charged the transfers would destroy the individual qualities of the affected schools in the Glendale-Ridgewood section of Queens.

Negro Children Said Sent South

Sun. 8-30-59

NEW YORK (AP)—Some New York Negro families, protesting the spread of juvenile delinquency and racial tension in the nation's largest city, are choosing to send their children to segregated schools in the south, the New York Times reported Saturday.

Overcrowded conditions in public schools as well as overcrowded neighborhoods, where youngsters are subjected to undesirable living and recreational conditions, are other factors influencing parents to send their children out of the state, the newspaper said.

Wide disagreement was reported, however, among Negro leaders on the number of children leaving the city to attend southern schools.

One Negro leader placed the number at 2,000.

Another Negro leader estimated the number at 50 and added that the trend actually was in the opposite direction--that more southern children are being sent here to school away from segregated institutions in the south.

One Negro father, unidentified by name, has a son who has just been graduated from a high school in Pensacola, Fla. The father said he sent his son to school there because New York has "just too much juvenile delinquency and racial tension."

"New York city is not a place to bring Negro kids up," the father added.

Negro Pupil Shift to N. Y. White School Stirs Issue

Protesting Group Aims at Court Test

Editor's note—The problems resulting from seating Negro and white children in the same classrooms are not restricted to the South. White New York parents recently made headlines picketing a formerly all - white school. Here's the story behind the headlines.

BY BERNARD GAVZER

NEW YORK (AP) — Awkward youngsters on Monday, by Thursday they were fast enough friends that Ronald could put his black arm on Stanley's white one and grin with unalloyed affection: "This one, he's mine!"

Soon, gray-haired Marie Donnelly tapped for silence among her fifth-graders with some uneasiness. For the first time in her 15 years at P.S. 77, she had a class with almost half the pupils Negro.

Outside the school, there was anxiety and apprehension. Some mothers carried placards of protest, reflecting a fear that the presence of Negro youngsters marked the first step in an invasion of their all-white neighborhood.

How did these Negro youngsters from a Brooklyn slum area find themselves in all-white, middle-class Glendale?

It is simply a question of utilizing school space," says the Board of Education. "This is the most immediate way of solving the problem."

The problem: Ronald's neighborhood grade school in Brooklyn's Bedford - Stuyvesant section is overcrowded it runs on three shifts. Stanley's school, built in 1930 when the Glendale section of Queens was dominated by young, growing families, was scheduled to enroll only 368. The building can comfortably accommodate 1,000.

Bedford - Stuyvesant is almost all Negro. Glendale is white. There is no legal segregation in New York City schools, but because the vast majority of the children in the New York City school system are assigned to schools in their own neighborhood, the degree of racial mixture in the schools has followed the pattern of the neighborhood.

300 TRANSFERRED

To relieve pressure on overcrowded P.S. 129 in Brooklyn, the School Board decided to transfer 75 Negro third, fourth and fifth graders to below-capacity P.S. 77 in Glendale. In all, some 300 pupils from six predominantly Negro schools were transferred to five schools in Glendale and Brentwood.

"Actually, there are 39,000 transfer students," explains the School Board. "This has been going on since horse and buggy days. But this is the first time that pupils have been transferred from one borough (Brooklyn) to another (Queens) and transported in private school buses."

Each school morning, the Negro transfer pupils gather at designated collection points and are driven two or three miles to white schools.

"Letters were sent to parents of 2,000 pupils in the Bedford-Stuyvesant area asking them whether they would agree to transfers because of the short - schedule program," says the Board of Education, "and 972 said yes."

HIRE LAWYER FOR FIGHT

But residents in the Queens neighborhoods started talking about taking some action to stop the transfers. They hired a lawyer.

"They were afraid that pretty soon these people would begin moving into the neighborhood and right away their property values would drop," says the owner of a school store near P.S. 77.

The lawyer representing protesting groups is Roy Cohn, one-time special counsel for the late Sen. Joseph R. McCarthy and one of the principals in the famed Army - McCarthy hearings.

His law office says: "We are going to test in court the right of the Board of Education to transfer a select group of students from one school to another. We do not believe the board has the right to send students from one neighborhood to another."

NEVER IN 40 YEARS of teaching has Miss Marie Donnelly had so many Negro pupils in a class. Parents in the Queens neighborhood objected when it was announced the Negroes would be brought by bus to P. S. 77 from Brooklyn. But the children adjusted to one another without incident. P. S. 77, which had an enrollment of 368 — all white — can handle 1000 pupils comfortably. For this reason, the Negro students were transferred from another neighborhood.

'THEY,' TO MOST PUPILS

At P.S. 77, the Negro pupils are referred to as "they" by most white pupils and their parents, and as the "bus children" by the teachers and Principal Brant Mecklenburg.

Before entering the school auditorium where 40 mothers had gathered for their first PTA meeting, Mecklenburg told a reporter that "So far, no one has directly raised a race issue; they've been confining themselves to arguing against bringing pupils by bus into a different neighborhood."

The next morning when the school bus arrived with its load of Negro youngsters, 15 women were picketing. They carried signs reading "Bussing creates fussing," "More education, less transportation," "We don't oppose true integration."

One mother, concern etched on her freckled face, argued that "We are not against Negroes. If somehow they lived in this neighborhood, we could see why they would be in this school. But it's not fair to those kids to put them on buses and take the risk of bringing them over here. What if the bus has an accident or if one of those kids gets sick? How would they get home?"

SLUM AREA UNWORRIED

In the Bedford - Stuyvesant slum area, the Negro parents have no such worries.

The father of 6-year-old Buddy says "My boy, he gets sick, he going to get sick anywhere. I ain't worried about that. The school people and the police, they going to see nothing going to happen to him."

Unless there is some unusual development—such as a court order halting the bus transfers—the prospect is that Stanley and Ronald will graduate together, in 1962.

"That's the soonest we would be able to construct a new school in the Bedford - Stuyvesant area, assuming we get the money for it. Then we could return to the neighborhood school concept, with which the School Board fully agrees," says a Board of Education spokesman.

While the adults debated the situation, the children went about the orderly business of learning their three Rs. In the first week of the fall semester at P.S. 77, the introduction of Negro pupils went without incident among the children.

'EVERYBODY'S NICER'

A Negro girl named Marion, 8, nicely dressed as were all the Negro and white children, pleaded, "Mister, you put my name in the paper, hear? You say I like P.S. 77 and didn't like P.S. 129 'cause the teachers were mean. I like to come to school on the bus. I can learn more here 'cause everybody's nicer."

"They're certainly nice children," says Miss Donnelly. "I find no difference between them. But I do feel it is unfair to the neighborhood to bus them here. If a neighborhood changes, that's one thing, but to force them on a neighborhood is quite another. It's also unfair to the children — it makes it such a long and tiring day for them."

By the end of the day, piling into the bus for the ride home, the Negro pupils were ready to let off steam. They bounced on seats and jabbered excitedly. Even during the lunch hour, they remain on school premises.

Two policemen stood near the bus, in front of the school, and four others were posted at the corners of the school block. Some eighth grade boys called out a few insults as the bus moved away.

The bus halted at a traffic light, near a candy store where two teen-age boys leaned against a window. One youth called out, "Why don't you stay in your own neighborhood!"

Then traveling through Bedford-Stuyvesant, some Negro boys took pictures of the bus, adults waved or called out to the children, as though they were welcoming home a team that had won the state basketball title.

Integration Smooth At Former All-White School

By JOHN A. CAVANAUGH

NEW YORK. — (UPI) — Four weeks ago two buses carried 86 Negro children from their homes in a predominantly Negro neighborhood in Brooklyn into what was for them virtually a new world — a previously all-white school in a quiet, residential all-white neighborhood in Queens.

Their new classmates, for the most part, were children who had come in contact with few Negroes in their young lives, let alone sat alongside any in all-white P. S. 68.

Alighting from their buses, the Negro youngsters, ranging in age from 8 to 10, had to pass through a picket line of white parents opposing the transfer of the pupils from their overcrowded Brooklyn school to the below-capacity P. S. 68.

No Violence

As they entered the school, the children could see a crudely-painted "Blacks Go Home" sign, which janitors had tried to erase from an outside wall before classes began.

There was no violence.

Inside, the Negro pupils found that almost half of their 520 new classmates were absent — kept home by their parents, many of whom made up the one-day picket line.

How has the "experiment" that many opponents charged was "forced integration" worked out in previously all-white public school 68?

Call

Today, one month after the opening day of classes, Negro and white children sit side by side in their classrooms and cafeteria and play together in the school yard.

Kansas City Mo.

The transition has worked remarkably smooth," the school principal, Dr. Harry Riftin, said. "From the start, the Negro and white children have mixed freely, studying and playing together as if they had been doing so since kindergarten."

Fri 10-16-59

It is Riftin's belief that the relative youth of the children — only the third, fourth and fifth grades were integrated — has made the transition easy. With older children, he concedes, the transition probably would have proceeded at a slower pace.

No Trouble At All

"We have had no trouble, nor had we anticipated any," the principal said. "Certainly there have been no overt acts of bias."

Outside the school, Riftin said, there have been no demonstrations since the opening day picketing, aside from a few isolated incidents wherein students from a nearby junior high school had cast racial derision at Negro children leaving P. S. 68.

Older children in the school have caused no trouble, according to the principal.

The Negro children, Riftin said, are delighted with their "new school" and new classmates. Actually, the core of the building is 51 years old. The addition of several wings in recent years, coupled with a renovation project in 1951, make it appear considerably newer, however.

The Negro children previously attended an overcrowded school in the teeming Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn, some three miles away.

To School Only

Riftin noted that, aside from the school, the Negro pupils have no contact at all with the plain, conservative middle-class all-white neighborhood where they now attend classes. They are transported to and from school by bus, and during lunch periods eat in the school cafeteria. Like their white classmates, some bring their own lunches, while others take advantage of the cafeteria fare.

While the transition has been smooth in so far as the pupils are concerned, the same cannot be said of the parents. None of the Negro parents has visited the school.

Nor have any been invited to join the "Mothers' Club," an organization of mothers of children who attend the school.

Many of the white parents are continuing to fight the transfer through law suits and in appeals to the state commissioner of education.

Many concede privately, that they believe the integration of P.S. 68 will, in short time, be followed by housing integration in the neighborhood, which in turn they feel will be followed by decreasing real estate values and juvenile delinquency.

Despite the parental opposition and resentment against the board of education, no white children have been withdrawn from P. S. 58 and placed in a private school.

'Segregated' Schools Reported Rising Here

By TERRY FERRER

Education Editor

New York public schools are still providing "inferior and inadequate education" for many Negro and Puerto Rican children, and the actual number of "segregated" schools is on the increase, the American Jewish Congress reported yesterday.

The city has made a "historic attempt" to solve its de facto segregation in schools and is the only Northern city to outline a specific blueprint on the problem, the A. J. C. said. But actual progress, the report added, has been "spotty and slow."

Ferrer

In its fifty-seven-page analysis of the Board of Education's integration efforts in the last five years, the A. J. C. as of last June there were 21 "special service" schools in the city. These are elementary and junior high schools where there is an especially high percentage of Negro and Puerto Rican pupils. The figure of 221 was eight higher than last year and 134 more than in 1950-'51, the study said.

"Poorest Facilities"

Moreover, the report continued, the "segregated" schools have "the poorest physical facilities and the lowest perecntage of regularly licensed teachers." The study was prepared by Mrs. Naomi Levine and Will Maslow of the A. J. C. and released from its offices at 15 E. 84th St.

The study called the transfer of 357 Negro and Puerto Rican students to five Queens schools from overcrowded Brooklyn schools this fall "an important beginning" in mixed racial enrollments.

But Dr. John J. Theobald, superintendent of schools, said yesterday that the transportation by buses of the students to the Glendale-Ridgewood section was "merely to relieve congestion. We had a part-time school day in one place and empty seats in the other. I simply brought the two together."

Appeal Pending

Queens parents have an appeal before State Commissioner of Education James E. Allen jr. to avoid the transfers, which is scheduled to be heard Oct. 20. The parents also have obtained a show-cause order in Queens County Supreme Court requiring the board to answer Monday. Parents in this case are maintaining that the children were selected for transfer because of their color, and that this is unconstitutional.

The A. J. C. report urged that "teachers be compulsorily assigned to teach in the schools where they are mose needed," as recommended by the board's Commission on Integration. This is not board policy at present. Commenting on policy yesterday, Dr. Theobald said that "it is not wise to force teachers into situations which they may or may not like. A teacher's morale is as important as his ability."

Dr. Theobald added that "we have increased the number of regular teachers in special-service schools by sound professional methods—not by edict. Thus we have teachers who are eager and interested in their work. We have made a lot of progress, and there have been vast improvements."

A. J. C. Proposes 7 Points

To speed integration in the schools, the A. J. C. proposed seven points on which the city should act. They are:

1.—Re-evaluate the neighborhood school concept in the light of the problem of segregation.

2.—Begin to rezone school districts where necessary.

3.—Begin to use permissive transfers and permissive bus transport with the consent of parents to achieve integration.

4.—Begin to transfer teachers where needed in order to staff all of the schools in the city with more experienced and competent teachers.

5.—Begin to campaign more vigorously for more funds, for more school construction and for support of a more extensive program of psychiatric help, guidance and social-service assistance.

6. Make a real effort to build new schools in genuine fringe areas.

7. Seek personnel able and willing to implement the principles to which it is committed.

Segregation Charged

The report said that while the board claimed in March that eighty-eight new projects had been completed or advanced in "fringe areas" to further racial integration, in actuality "this conclusion is unwarranted and indeed misleading. Many of the schools built in so-called fringe areas," the A. J. C. said, "are in fact segregated." Of sixteen new elementary schools built in the Bronx, Brooklyn and Manhattan between 1954 and 1958, the study declared, seven were "segregated"—with Negro and Puerto Rican enrollments ranging from 90.8 to 97.5 per cent.

The report, entitled "From Color Blind to Color Conscious," praised the board for the five-year work of its Commission on Integration, and said that commission plans were drawn up out of "moral concern" rather than under court order, a "praiseworthy" effort.

The A. J. C. pointed out that almost 69 per cent of Manhattan's school population in 1957 were Negroes and Puerto Ricans, a total of 94,689 pupils. For the whole city that year, 256,768 Negroes and Puerto Ricans were in public schools, more than 35 per cent of the enrollment.

2500 Rowdies Still Disrupting City's Schools

By JOHN J. McCUEN,
World-Telegram Staff Writer.

There are still some 2500 hard-core rowdies disrupting regular classes in the New York City schools, according to the head of the educational system's Division of Child Welfare.

These, like some 1500 seriously maladjusted pupils already enrolled in the nine special "600" day schools should be sent to schools of this type, in the opinion of Associate Superintendent William A. Hamm.

However, they can't get the special treatment they need because additional "600" school facilities are presently nonexistent. So the regular schools continue to put up with them.

Nine More Needed.

According to Dr. Hamm, at least nine more "600" day schools must be organized as soon as locations and professional personnel can be found.

"The '600' schools," Dr. Hamm said, "have strengthened the educational program in the regular schools by the removal of disruptive pupils. They also are accomplishing much for the rehabilitation of the children who attend them."

Board's Crackdown.

Last February, the Board of Education cracked down on hard-core rowdies by authorizing their immediate suspension from school. Principals have responded by suspending more than 1700 since that time.

However, Dr. Hamm said that preliminary reports from the schools indicate that they retain 2500 more boys and girls who are chronic trouble makers.

He based the figure on early reports from principals, whom he has asked to notify him of the number of pupils in their schools who should be in "600" institutions. Complete figures will be compiled later.

Dr. Hamm noted that plans are afoot to establish two more "600" day schools, effective Feb. 1.

CITY PLANS APPEAL IN SCHOOL BOYCOTT

Board Splits but Votes to Act in Dismissal of Case Against Negro Parents

A rift on the Board of Education came into the open yesterday after the board voted to appeal a dismissal of charges against two Negro mothers who had been boycotting Harlem public schools.

The board's decision to appeal, taken at a special, closed meeting, was later sharply criticized by the Rev. Dr. Gardner C. Taylor, who is the only Negro on the nine-member board.

Dr. Taylor, who is pastor of the Concord Baptist Church of Christ in Brooklyn, said, "Wittingly or unwittingly, the board has erased the last line of difference between Little Rock and New York."

The board's decision was disclosed by a spokesman for the school system at the end of a news conference on the board's tentative budget for 1959-60.

The spokesman said that the board had decided to appeal at the request of the Corporation Counsel. He added:

"The board instructed the Corporation Counsel to expedite the appeal as soon as possible. For ehtical and legal reasons, no official board comment on the appeal will be made so as not to prejudice the courts."

Not Unanimous

The official said that the board's action had not been unanimous.

Later, it was reported that of the seven members present, four voted to appeal, one—Dr. Taylor—voted against it, and two abstained. However, Dr. Taylor said that it had been his impresion at the time that the vote was 4 to 3 in favor of appealing.

The court ruling in question made Dec. 15 by Justice Justine Wise Polier of the Domestic Relations Court.

In dismissing the charges brought by the city school system, Justice Polier upheld the parents' contention that pupils at the two Harlem junior high schools in dispute were receiving "inferior educational opportunities by reasons of racial discrimination."

Among other conditions she note, Justice Polier said that the Harlem schools had a much higher percentage of substitute teachers than schools with white pupils.

Cites Constitution

The parents in the case, Justice Polier said, "have the constitutionally guaranteed right to elect no education for their children rather than to subject them to discriminatorily inferior education."

The parents—Mrs. Bernice Skipwith of 2120 Madison Avenue and Mrs. Shirley Rector of 2175 Fifth Avenue—had been charged with violating the state compulsory school-attendance law. They have been keeping their children home from public school since September. Four other Harlem parents had been found guilty of similar charges previously by another judge.

Dr. Taylor yesterday charged that the Board of Education was resorting to "litigation to evade its responsibility to New York's school children." Instead of going into court, he said, the board should acknowledge the "disparity" in the education of white and Negro children and work to "eradicate the inequities."

TO RESTORE DISCIPLINE

Brooklyn Grand Jurors Urge Paddling of Pupils

NEW YORK, Jan. 21 (AP) — A Brooklyn grand jury today advocated that public school teachers be allowed to paddle students who misbehave.

Winding up an investigation of classroom violence in the city's schools, the jury said in a statement of findings presented to County Judge Samuel S. Leibowitz: "There is a direct connection between the laxity-pamby attitude of the educational hierarchy and the collapse of discipline in our schools."

The present state penal law permits teachers to use reasonable force or restraint in correcting pupils—if local school boards agree.

Legislation has been proposed to prevent school boards from barring the use of reasonable force in classrooms. Such a bill passed the Legislature in Albany last year but was vetoed by former Gov. Averell Harriman.

Leibowitz said he is in accord with the grand jury presentment and added: "We who deal with the problem of crime in the public schools know through bitter experience that, unless we return our teachers to the position of authority which they held in former years, we might as well throw up our hands."

The 26-member grand jury, after more than a year of investigation into school lawlessness, said:

"Respect for the teacher's authority has been tossed out of the window by the starry-eyed educational leaders who encourage freedom while at the same time deemphasizing the equally important element of responsibility for one's actions.

"Our classrooms with their atmosphere of permissiveness are turning out far too many delinquents. It can be expected that matters will get worse until teachers are again placed in command of the situation in the classroom."

Negro Group Raps School Rule Attack

NEW YORK, Jan. 17 (UPI)—The Empire State Baptist Convention charged today that there is little difference between segregated and closed schools in Little Rock, Ark., and "segregated, inferior schools in New York City."

The convention, representing more than 340 Negro Baptist churches in New York State, made the statement in attacking the action of the city's board of education, which is appealing a ruling by domestic relations Justice Justine Wise Polier.

Justice Polier last December supported the stand of three Negro families who had removed their children from Harlem schools after charging the schools were segregated and inferior to those elsewhere in the city.

The board is seeking to force the children to attend school under the state's compulsory attendance law.

The convention said that Justice Polier's ruling is, in effect, a challenge to the board of education to do something about the "horrible conditions" in Harlem schools.

"After thorough investigation, we find Harlem schools to be definitely both segregated and inferior," the group said. "As taxpayers and parents, Harlem citizens have every right to reject inferior and discriminatory public education."

Warns Feds Won't Bow To Threats

NEW YORK (AP)—Atty. Gen. Rogers expressed belief today that resistance to public school integration is beginning to soften and that "reason and wisdom are coming to the fore."

"There is a much wider acceptance of the realities — a growing recognition that intransigent resistance can lead but ultimately to the destruction of public schooling in the area concerned," Rogers said.

At the same time, however, Rogers served notice that the Justice Department won't tolerate defiance of federal court integration rulings.

In a talk prepared for a meeting of Fordham University law alumni, the attorney general said:

"If a federal court enters a decree and there should thereafter be defiance of that decree or a substantial interference with its execution, it does, in our view, become the duty of the Department of Justice to act. In such circumstances we shall take all appropriate steps to vindicate the court's authority — for example, through the institution of contempt proceedings."

Rogers expressed hope, however, that state and local authorities will maintain order themselves without need of federal action.

In this respect, he voiced warm praise for this week's peaceful integration of 21 Negro children in schools at Norfolk and Arlington, Va.

Looking ahead, Rogers said "there is cause for encouragement." He added:

"Voices of moderation are being heard in many quarters, and with greater frequency and clarity. Many people who have been adamant up to this point are beginning to listen. These are signs that more thoughtful and reasoned progress is in prospect."

NEGRO PARENTS ACT TO SUE CITY SCHOOLS

Eight Negro parents who have kept their nine children home from Harlem public schools took steps Monday toward filing charges against the city school system.

The parents tried yesterday to register their children in schools other than the ones to which they had been assigned by the Board of Education. The parents of seven children, who had been assigned to Public Schools 136 and 139, tried to register them at P. S. 52. The parents of two children, assigned to Public School 157, tried to register them at P. S. 125. All were refused.

Paul B. Zuber, attorney for the parents, said that a decision last month by Justice Justine Wise Polier had been the basis for the move. Justice Polier held that pupils in P. S. 136 and 139 were receiving inferior education.

Mr. Zuber said the parents would call tomorrow on Associate Superintendents Marion Clark and Charles M. Shapp to let the children enter P. S. 52 and 123. If they refuse, Mr. Zuber said, charges of incompetency will be brought against John J. Theobold, Superintendent of Schools, and the Board of Superintendents. He said charges would be brought on the ground that the school officials had not moved to correct wrongs pointed out by the court decision.

APPEAL IS OPPOSED IN SCHOOL BOYCOTT

Urban League Calls on Board to Accept Polier Ruling and End Inequities'

By GENE CURRIVAN

The Urban League of Greater New York called on the Board of Education yesterday to reconsider its decision to appeal a cour ruling that some of the city's schools were inferior.

The league asked the board to accept the ruling and to take steps to correct the alleged inequities attributed to the Harlem schools that were involved in the case rather than ignore them and press the fight in the

The decision was made Dec. 15 by Justice Justine Wise Polier of the Domestic Relations Court. She upheld the contention of two Negro mothers that they could withhold their children from two Harlem schools because the facilities were inadequate. The ruling cited racial discrimination.

At yesterday's meeting called by the city-wide education committee of the league at the Willkie Memorial Building, 20 West Fortieth Street, more than 100 representatives of civic, church, labor and parent groups supported the league's stand.

The Rev. Gardner C. Taylor, vice president of the league and the only Negro member of the Board of Education, declared that if the board won its appeal "there would be bitterness and resentment that will last for a generation."

Settlement Hint Given

An indication that the matter might be resolved out of court came after the meeting from Edward S. Lewis, executive director of the league, and Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, a member of the Education Board's Commission on Integration.

Both said they were hopeful that negotiations being carried on with the board might take the matter away from the courts and into the field of education.

The resolution, which was adopted unanimously, said the board had acted with "less than deliberate speed" to remove inferior and segregated schools.

It asked the board immediately to implement the recommendations of its Commission on Integration and reconsider its decision to appeal the Polier ruling.

The resolution commended Dr. Taylor, who was the only member of the board to vote against appeal, for his "courageous fight."

The board's plan for appeal was also assailed by Dr. Frank S. Thorne, director of the City Commission on Intergroup Relations, which opposed the move at the outset; former Domestic Relations Justice Hubert T. Delany, and Algernon Black, leader of the Ethical Culture Society.

Harlem Talks Seek a Formula To End Boycott of Four Schools

Negro Parents and Board of Education Officials Meet—Improvement of Institutions Under Consideration

By LEONA

An attempt is being made by the Board of Education and a group of Negro parents to resolve the Harlem school controversy.

The objective of the new move is to end the parents' boycott of four Harlem schools and to make further court action unnecessary. As a condition to this, it is understood, efforts would be made to strengthen the schools.

Aside from admitting that discussions were under way to end the controversy, which has produced charges of racial discrimination against the school board, neither side yesterday would offer extensive comments.

Dr. John J. Theobald, the Superintendent of Schools, said that "every attempt is being made to work out an equitable and constructive solution consistent with good educational policy and procedure." He added:

"The Board of Education, the Board of Superintendents, the parents and leaders of the community are all searching for a satisfactory solution. As soon as one is found we will announce it."

Paul B. Zuber, the attorney for the Negro parent group, said that "it is true that we had a meeting," but he added: "There are still some areas that must be clarified."

Although preliminary discussions have been held during the last two weeks, the first meeting between the two sides was held Wednesday. Another session will be held early next week.

Background of Controversy

The long-simmering Harlem school controversy developed major proportions last Sept. 8, the opening day of the current school year, when the Negro parents started their boycott. They charged at the time that the predominantly Negro schools to which their youngsters were assigned provided "inferior educational opportunities." They asuccessfully to have the youngsters transferred.

Some weeks later the school system brought action against the parents in Children's Court, charging them with violating the state's compulsory school attendance law. On Dec. 3, Justice Nathaniel Kaplan found four mothers guilty.

However, on Dec. 15, Justice Justine Wise Polier dismissed similar charges against two other parents who took part in the boycott. Mrs. Polier declared in her decision that the two Harlem schools in the cases were inferior to predominantly white schools, and said that parents had the right to refuse to subject their children to "discriminatorily inferior education."

Then on Jan. 14 the school board by a split vote decided to appeal Mrs. Polier's ruling. This touched off bitter protests from the Rev. Dr. Gardner C. Taylor, the only Negro on the school board, and from other Negro leaders. Dr. Taylor charged that instead of going into court the school system should acknowledge the "disparity" in the education of white and Negro pupils and work to "eradicate the inequalities."

If the current attempt to end the boycott is successful, one source indicated yesterday, the board would drop its appeal of the Polier decision. No action would be taken against the four mothers found guilty by Justice Kaplan, it was said.

The affected schools are Junior High Schools 120, 136 and 139 and Public School 157.

9 Gotham Negroes Return To School

They Had Quit, Charging Segregation Policies

NEW YORK, Feb. 11. —(AP) — Nine Negro children kept out of schools their parents charged were segregated and inferior will resume their education Monday.

The parents and the Board of Education reached a temporary agreement Tuesday to have the students attend classes at schools designated by the superintendent of schools.

The agreement is in effect pending the outcome of litigation.

Supt. John J. Theobald said the youngsters will not be assigned to Harlem schools they formerly attended nor to those requested by the parents.

The schools will be selected strictly on the basis of "the educational and emotional development of the children," Theobald said.

The Board of Education has been seeking means of transfers to overcome the heavy concentration of students from a particular racial group in some schools.

Although segregation policies are not in effect here, such concentrations result from patterns of settlement in the city.

Appeals on two conflicting court rulings on neglect charges brought against the parents are pending.

One justice of the Domestic Relations Court dismissed the charges against two parents, and the Board of Education appealed.

Another justice of the same court found some of the other parents guilty of violating the education law, and the parents appealed.

Also pending is the parents' million-dollar civil suit against the city. They are asking damages for the alleged injustice suffered by the children in "segregated" schools.

NEGRO IS CHOSEN TOP SCHOOL AIDE

Dr. John King to Be Named Associate Superintendent First of Race in Job

A Negro educator is slated to be the first of his race to be nominated for the the post of associate superintendent of city schools.

The educator is Dr. John B. King, who was born in New York. He is 50 years old and has been in the school system for thirty years.

In 1951, Dr King was the first Negro to be appointed an assistant superintendent of schools. Since then, one other Negro—Francis A. Turner—has been appointed to that rank.

Unofficial reports at school headquarters yesterday said yesterday that Dr. King would be named to fill the vacancy caused last March by the death of William A. Hamm, who was in charge of the child-welfare division of the school system. There are normally nine associate superintendents. Starting this fall, the post will pay $19,750 a year.

The nomination of Dr. King is expected to be made Thursday by Dr. John J. Theobald, Superintendent of Schools. It must be approved by the Board of Education.

The selection of Dr. King was originally recommended by the present associate superintendents, who serve on the Board of Superintendents, an advisory body to the Superintent of Schools. The superintendents are reported to have screened more than thirty candidates.

Dr. King was graduated from Boys High School in Brooklyn when he was 15 years old. After attending the old Maxwell Training School for Teachers, he became a substitute teacher at the age of 20. Three years later he received a regular teaching status in the school system and earned a Bachelor of Science degree from New York University. He later received his master's and doctor's degrees there.

In 1940, Dr. King was appointed to the rank of assistant-to-principal and six years later became an elementary school principal. Since 1951, he has been in charge of Districts 26 and 28 in Brooklyn.

Integration Troubles in the North

The racial problem is not confined to the South, nor is it peculiar to Negroes, and the same anxieties that prey upon the consciences of North Carolinians are known in Brooklyn and in Queens. Oddly, though, geography seems to make a difference. A parade of white mothers on a picket line outside a newly-integrated school in Cary would be prime news for the metropolitan dailies, TV and the national magazines. The same situation in New York City is so discreetly reported as to suggest that the fact the children involved were Negroes was at most an unfortunate coincidence.

A Mixed Class in Queens: Never Before So Many Negro Children

By Bernard Gavzer

NEW YORK (AP)—Awkward strangers on Monday, by Thursday they were fast enough friends that Ronald could put his black hand on Stanley's white one and cry out with unalloyed affection: "This one, he's mine."

Plump, gray-haired Marie Donnelly tapped for silence among her fifth-graders with some uneasiness. For the first time in her 40 years at P. S. 77, she had a class with almost half the pupils Negro.

Outside the school, there was anxiety and apprehension.

White mothers carried placards of protest, reflecting a fear that the presence of Negro youngsters signaled the first step in an invasion of their all-white neighborhood.

How did these Negro youngsters from a Brooklyn slum area find themselves in all-white, middle-class Glendale?

"It is simply a question of utilizing school space," says the Board of Education. "This is the only immediate way of solving our problem."

The problem: Ronald's neighborhood grade school in Brooklyn's Bedford-Stuyvesant section is so overcrowded it runs on three shifts. Stanley's school, built in 1912 when the Glendale section of Queens was dominated by young, growing families, was scheduled to enroll only 368. The building can comfortably accommodate 1,000.

Bedford-Stuyvesant is almost solidly Negro. Glendale is white. There is no legal segregation in New York City schools, but because the vast majority of the 985,820 children in the New York City school system are assigned to schools in their own neighborhood, the degree of racial mixture in the schools has followed the pattern of the neighborhood.

To relieve pressure on overcrowed P.S. 129 in Brooklyn, the School Board decided to transfer 75 Negro third, fourth and fifth graders to below-capacity P.S. 77 in Glendale. In all, some 300 pupils from six predominantly Negro schools were transferred to five schools in Glendale and Brentwood.

First in Such Numbers.

"Actually, there are 39,000 transfer students," explains the School Board. "This has been going on since horse and buggy days. But this is the first time that pupils have been transferred from one borough, Brooklyn, to another, Queens, and transported in private school buses."

Each school morning, the Negro transfer pupils gather at designated collection points and are driven two or three miles to white schools.

"Letters were sent to parents of 2,000 pupils in the Bedford-Stuyvesant area asking them whether they would agree to transfers because of the short-schedule program," says the Board of Education, "and 972 said yes."

But residents in the Queens neighborhoods started talking about taking some action to stop the transfers. They hired a lawyer.

"They were afraid that pretty soon these people would begin moving into the neighborhood and right away their property values would drop," says the owner of a school store near P.S. 77.

Roy Cohn Again.

The lawyer representing protesting groups is Roy Cohn, one-time special counsel for the late Sen. Joseph R. McCarthy and one of the principals in the famed Army-McCarthy hearings.

His law office says: "We are going to test in court the right of the Board of Education to transfer a select group of students from one school to another. We do not believe the board has the right to send students from one neighborhood to another."

At P.S. 77, the Negro pupils are referred to as "they" by most white pupils and their parents, and as the "bus children" by the teachers and the Principal Brant Mecklenburg.

Before entering the school auditorium where 40 mothers had gathered for their first PTA meeting, Mecklenburg told a reporter that "so far, no one has directly raised a race issue; they've been confining themselves to arguing against bringing pupils by bus into a different neighborhood."

Never Say Race.

The next morning when the school bus arrived with its load of Negro youngsters, 15 women were picketing. They carried signs reading "Bussing creates fussing," "More education, less transportation," "We don't oppose true integration."

One mother, concern etched on her freckled face, argued that "We are not against Negroes. If somehow they lived in this neighborhood, we could see why they would be in this school. But it's not fair to those kids to put them on busses and take the risk of bringing them over here. What if the bus has an accident or if one of those kids gets sick? How would they get home?"

In the Bedford-Stuyvesant slum area, the Negro parents have no such worries.

The father of 6-year-old Buddy says "My boy, he gets sick, he going to get sick anywhere. I ain't worried about that. The school people and the police, they going to see nothing going to happen to him."

They'll Probably Stay In.

Unless there is some unusual development—such as a court order halting the bus transfers — the prospect is that Stanley and Ronald will graduate together, in 1962.

"That's the soonest we would be able to construct a new school in the Bedford-Stuyvesant area, assuming we get the money for it. Then we could return to the neighborhood school concept, with which the school Board fully agrees," says a Board of Education spokesman.

While the adults debated the situation, the children went about the orderly business of learning their three Rs. In the first week of the fall semester at P.S. 77, the introduction of Negro pupils went without incident among the children.

A Negro girl named Marion, 8, nicely dressed as were all the Negro and white children, pleaded, "Mister, you put my name in the paper, hear? You say I like P.S. 77 and didn't like P.S. 129 'cause the teachers were mean. I like to come to school on the bus. I can learn more here 'cause everybody's nicer."

"They're certainly nice children," says Miss Donnelly. "I find no difference between them. But I do feel it is unfair to the neighborhood to bus them here. If a neighborhood changes, that's one thing, but to force them on a neighborhood is quite another. It's also unfair to the children—it makes it such a long and tiring day for them."

By the end of the day, piling into the bus for the ride home, the Negro pupils were ready to let off steam. They bounced on seats and jabbered excitedly. Even during the lunch hour, they remain on school premises.

Police Stand Ready.

Two policemen stood near the bus, in front of the school, and four others were posted at the corners of the school block. Some eighth grade boys called out a few insults as the bus moved away.

The bus halted at a traffic light, near a candy store where two teen-aged boys leaned aganist a window. One youth called out, "Why don't you stay in your own neighborhood."

Then traveling through Bedford-Stuyvesant, some Negro boys took pictures of the bus, adults waved or called out to the children, as though they were welcoming home a team that had won the state basketball title.

4 Gotham Schools Boycotted In Protest Over Integration

Mothers Picket As Six Busloads Of Negroes, Puerto Ricans Are Brought To Previously All-White Institutions

By CHARLES OHI
United Press International Staff

NEW YORK, Sept. 14.—More than 1,100 white students staged a one-day boycott of four New York public schools Monday in protest against the transfer of Negro and Puerto Rican children into a predominantly-white area.

White parents picketed outside the schools.

About 300 transfer students were brought to five elementary schools in Queens in six special buses from the Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn, an area of slums with a high rate of juvenile delinquency.

Only one of the schools in the Ridgewood - Glendale section of Queens reported a normal attendance on the first day of school.

Half Are Absent

The number of white absentees was nearly 50 per cent of the total enrollment of all of the five schools.

School officials and police, assigned to maintain order, said there had been no incidents. None of the transfer children was molested while entering the schools.

School officials said the transfer students would have to commute an average of three and one-half miles on the buses.

The boycott climaxed a dispute that began during the summer when the Board of Education announced that the transfers were to be made because of overcrowding in Brooklyn schools.

Enforced Integration

Parents in the quiet, residential section of Queens charged that the transfer amounted to "enforced integration." They claimed that there were empty schools in Brooklyn that could be repaired and used to ease the overcrowding.

The School Board stood firm despite protest meetings in Queens and picket lines of white mothers who marched in front of City Hall.

Dr. Alfred Marrow, chairman of the New York City Commission on Intergroup Relations, said the "integrations" were responsible for the mass absence of white students.

Marrow said, however, that the transfer was progressing "smoothly and we find a distinct improvement in community attitude since the time when hundreds of residents of the area picketed City Hall."

Second Boycott Off

Meanwhile, a threatened mass boycott of schools in Harlem that would have involved about 40,000 Negro children failed to materialize.

Negro parents had charged that white children received transfers to schools in the exclusive Riverdale section of the Bronx from overcrowded Harlem schools, but the Negro children had been turned down. They also charged that Harlem schools had "inferior" equipment and "second-rate" teachers.

Although the boycott did not occur, the parents of about 200 Negro children said they would take them en masse to a junior high school in Riverdale Wednesday to demand that they be registered.

The disputes occurred as about 1,500,000 youngsters went back to classes for the start of the new school year.

SCHOOLS IN QUEENS

N.Y. Parents, Pupils Protest Integration

NEW YORK, Sept. 14 (AP)—Picketing and a student boycott today marked the racial integration of five white Queens schools by Negroes and Puerto Ricans from Brooklyn slums.

More than 1900 of 2,300 white pupils stayed away from schools in the Glendale and Ridgewood sections of Queens. White parents picketed three of the schools.

During the night, large signs reading "blacks go home" appeared in front of one school. However, they were painted out before the influx of 363 slum children from Brooklyn on the opening day of school.

Actual entry of the Brooklyn pupils into the schools was without incident.

The new children came from one of the toughest sections of New York City, the Negro and Puerto Rican slums of Bedford-Stuyvesant in Brooklyn. The board of education decreed their transfer across borough lines because of overcrowding in their own schools.

White parents in Queens charge this is a violation of a long-standing pledge that the board's gradual integration program would not be carried across borough lines. They protested in vain against the transfers since they were originally scheduled last spring.

Opponents of the transfers insisted that they were less concerned with the race of the Brooklyn children than they were with the slum backgrounds which they feared would affect their own children.

New York has no legal segregation in its schools. But neighborhood racial patterns in some areas create almost totally segregated school enrollments.

SCHOOL RULING DUE ON NEGRO TRANSFER

The State Education Commissioner said yesterday he expected to rule this week on the transfer of 400 Negro pupils from Brooklyn schools to predominantly white ones in Queens. Dr. James E. Allen Jr., the Commissioner, declined to discuss the issue until then, because it was before him in a judicial form.

On Aug. 26 five mothers from the Glendale-Ridgewood section of Queens appealed to him to reverse the action of the New York City Board of Education, which had approved the transfer.

Dr. Allen was questioned in a television interview on the "Searchlight" program presented on WRCA-TV in cooperation with the Citizens Union. Other participants were Milton M. Bergerman, chairman of the Citizens Union; Terry Ferrer of The New York Herald Tribune, Fred M. Hechinger of The New York Times and Gabe Pressman of the news department of the National Broadcasting Company, who was moderator.

Dr. Allen said the school population in the state would continue to increase at the rate of about 100,000 boys and girls a year. He called for more teachers and 4,000 to 5,000 new classrooms a year.

Integration Disputes May Intensify Here

By James J. Morisseau

Integration problems, which last year brought boycotts and other, minor, disputes to the city's schools, threaten to take a more serious turn when the schools reopen next month.

A check yesterday of possible trouble spots turned up these signs of threatened racial discord:

1. A large-scale version of last years Harlem school boycott, in which eight Negro families refused to send their children to schools they said were "segregated and inferior," has been threatened for Sept. 13, the day school reopens.

200 May Join Boycott

As many as 200 children may be involved in the new boycott. Children and parents alike are expected to stage a sit-down strike on the steps of a predominantly-white school in the Bronx, unless their applications for admission are accepted.

2. A dispute over the transfer of 400 Negro and Puerto Rican pupils from overcrowded schools in the Bedford - Stuyvesant area of Brooklyn to underutilized buildings in the Ridgewood and Glendale sections of Queens was still unresolved.

Teachers Transferred

3. Elsewhere in Queens, Negro parents were reported to be increasingly disturbed over the transfer of experienced white teachers out of some schools in St. Albans and Hollis as a growing Negro population brought larger Negro enrollments.

On the other hand, there appeared to be little outward support for the recent proposal by Rep. Adam Clayton Powell, D., N. Y., that all Negro and Puerto Rican parents keep their children out of school for a week in September, thus depriving the city of an estimated $2,000,000 in state aid.

City Hall Rally Set

The Leadership Council of Greater New York, of which Mr. Powell is a founder, has called a mass demonstration for Sept. 9 at City Hall to protest what it calls "segregation" in the city's schools.

At the same time, Dr. John J. Theobald, Superintendent of Schools, indicated he was not overly concerned and expressed confidence these and other problems would be settled amicably. He explained this optimistic outlook:

"I'm finding some very solid leadership in Harlem among people who know that if we take an extreme position, we won't make progress. In a situation like this, every step we take must be sound and logical."

Petition Readied

Plans for the new Harlem boycott were revealed by Paul B. Zuber, who was attorney for the parents involved in last year's boycott.

Mr. Zuber said that nearly 300 parents of children who were graduated last June from Public Schools 133, 197, and 175 in Harlem, have signed a petition asking that the youngsters—or at least a "token" group of thirty—be assigned to Junior High School 141, Independence Ave. and W. 237th St., in the Riverdale section of the Bronx.

Request Rejected

The request, filed last spring with the office of Dr. Theobald, at 110 Livingston St., Brooklyn, was turned down in mid-May.

The parents contended that Junior High Schools 136 and 139 in Harlem, to which the pupils have been assigned in September, offered an "inferior" educational program. They made the charge, Mr. Zuber said, after touring both schools.

The same junior high schools were involved in last year's boycott and were labeled by parents as "segregated and inferior." But under an agreement in February that ended the boycott, Board of Education officials had assured the parents that J. H. S. 136 and 139 would be included in the expansion of the "Talent Demonstration Project" for the salvage of the academic talents of economically and culturally-deprived youngsters.

Delay Explained

Mr. Zuber contended, however, that the parents found no evidence during their visit that progress had been made toward implementing the program at either school or that promised additional teachers had been assigned.

Dr. Theobald pointed out, in reply, that an additional $500,000 appropriation for expansion of the so-called "Project 43," did not become available until July 1, delaying any full-scale implementation until September.

The suggestion that the pupils be transferred to the Bronx school apparently followed the precedent-setting order by Dr. Theobald transferring 400 Negro and Puerto Rican pupils from crowded Brooklyn schools to others in Queens that had empty seats.

Court Action Threatened

Attorneys for residents in the Ridgewood and Glendale sections of Queens have appealed the order to the Board of Education, challenging its legality and advisability.

An informal poll of board members, who have no direct authority in what is considered a purely administrative matter, is tentatively scheduled for this week. The Queens attorneys have threatened to take the case to the courts if the board does not act to reverse Dr. Theobald's decision.

1100 N. Y. Pupils Stage Desegregation Boycott

NEW YORK, Sept. 14 (UPI) More than 1100 white students staged a 1-day boycott of four New York public schools today in protest against the transfer of Negro and Puerto Rican children in to a predominately white area.

White parents picketed outside the schools.

About 300 transfer students were taken to five elementary schools in Queens in special buses from the Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn, an area of slums and a high rate of juvenile delinquency.

Only one of the schools in the Ridgewood-Glendale section of Queens reported a normal attendance on the first day of school. The number of white absentees was nearly 50 per cent of the total enrollment of all of the five schools. School officials and police said there had been no incidents.

Parents in the quiet, residential section of Queens charged that the transfers amounted to "enforced integration." They claimed there were empty schools in Brooklyn that could be repaired and used.

The picketing parents said their children would return to school Tuesday—carrying their own lunches. The Board of Education had ruled that the transfer children would be provided with lunches because of the distance they have to travel.

Meanwhile, a threatened mass boycott of schools in Harlem that would have involved about 40,000 Negro children failed to materialize.

Negro parents had charged that white children received transfers to schools in the exclusive Riverdale section of Bronx from overcrowded Harlem schools, but that Negro children had been turned down. They also charged that Harlem schools had "inferior" equipment and "second-rate" teachers.

CITY BOARD BACKS NEGRO-PUPIL SHIFT

Theobald Upheld as Queens Group Loses Request to Keep 'Strangers' Out

By LEONARD BUDER

The Board of Education backed the Superintendent of Schools yesterday in the controversy over pupil transfers.

The board turned down a request that it rescind the decision of the Superintendent, John J. Theobald, to transfer 400 Negro pupils from overcrowded schools in the Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn to under-populated schools in the Glendale-Ridgewood section of Queens. The Queens area is predominantly white.

The appeal from the plan was made last month by the Glendale Taxpayers Association. A spokesman told the board then that the area's residents "just don't like the idea of strangers coming into their neighborhood."

Charles H. Silver, the president of the school board, said yesterday:

"The purpose of these transfers is not based on the integration program but on the policy of providing full and equal educational opportunities for all children."

Curtailment Cited

In their original schools, Mr. Silver said, the Negro youngsters received curtailed class programs. In the new schools, he went on, they will receive a full day of school.

The shifts, which are at the option of the youngsters and their parents, will go into effect in September. In addition to those transferred to Queens, several hundred Bedford-Stuyvesant pupils are being sent to schools elsewhere in Brooklyn.

Mr. Silver said that the transfers were regarded as a temporary emergency measure. He said that the system believed in the concept of neighborhood schools. He said:

"Every elementary school pupils in so far as possible should be afforded a full educational opportunity in a school near his home."

Not Contrary to Policy

Four new schools are expected to be completed in Bedford-Stuyvesant next year and four others are scheduled to be built by 1965.

"We want to assure the parents of this city," he went on, "that the Board of Education is making every effort to construct enough modern facilities in every area of the city to reduce bus transportation of elementary school children to a minimum."

Last year, 39,000 pupils were driven by bus to schools beyond walking distance.

In rejecting the Glendale appeal, the board denied the association's contention that carrying children from one borough to another was contrary to the board's policy.

Mr. Silver said that the board considered the city's school districting as an entity and did not see it as divided into boroughs.

The board's move was commended yesterday by the Commission on Intergroup Relations. However, the commission said that it would seek clarification of the statement that the move was only "temporary and emergency."

Dr. Frank S. Horne, executive director of the city commission, expressed "concern about this statement in view of the board's clearly stated policy and program to prevent further development of segregated schools and to improve ethnic balance in all schools wherever possible."

The Queens schools to receive the Negro pupils are Public Schools 68, 77, 81, 88 and 91. The pupils involved in the shift are in the third, fourth and fifth grades.

BOARD RESTUDIES NEGRO PUPIL SHIFT

To Rule on Glendale Group's Appeal to Drop Transfer From Brooklyn Schools

$25,000 POST IS VOTED

City Asked to Approve New Job of Buildings Chief— Dr. King Is Promoted

By LEONARD BUDER

The Board of Education reserved decision yesterday on an appeal to rescind the scheduled transfer of 400 Negro pupils from the Bedford-Stuyvesant area of Brooklyn to schools in a white community in Queens.

The appeal was made by the lawyer for the Glendale Taxpayers Association, who appeared before a meeting of the board. The lawyer told the members that the residents of the Glendale-Ridgewood area "just don't like the idea of strangers coming into their neighborhood."

Earlier in his presnetation, the lawyer, Edward D. Burns of the firm of Saxe, Bacon & O'Shea, declared that the school officials' action was contrary to statements made in 1957 by the board and by Dr. William Jansen, who was then Superintendent of Schools. Mr. Burns charged that the transfer would upset the traditional concept of neighborhood schools.

In another action taken at the meeting, the board requested city permission to establish a $25,000-a-year position of Superintendent of Design, Construction and Physical Plant. As forecast on Wednesday, Dr. John J. Theobald, Superintendent of Schools, nominated Joseph R. Weiss, a consulting engineer and Professor of Engineering at Hunter College, to the new post.

Dr. King Is Promoted

The board elected Dr. John B. King to the position of Associate Superintendent of Schools. Dr. King, a Negro, is the first of his race to hold that rank. He has been an assistant superintendent for the last eight years.

The plan to give Negro pupils in crowded schools in the Bedford-Stuyvesant district the option of transferring to underutilized schools in Glendale-Ridgewood in the fall was announced on June 1 by Dr. Theobald. The Queens schools affected by the shift are P. S. 68, 77, 81, 88 and 91.

Late last month the protesting Queens residents demonstrated at City Hall in an effort to halt the transfers. Many protest meetings have also been held in the community.

Mr. Burns told the board yesterday that two years ago it had said that there would not be any long bus trips for pupils for the purposes of integration and that the neighborhood school concept would be maintained.

The lawyer said he had "serious doubts" about the legality of the board's plan, including the use of public funds to finance bus transportation for the purpose of integration.

When Mr. Burns ended his appeal, the Rev. Dr. Gardner C. Taylor, the only Negro on the school board, asked the lawyer why the residents of Glendale objected to the transfer.

Br. Burns replied that the people of that area were a "concise, tight-fitting little group." The residents pay taxes for the support of the schools and they feel that the schools in that neighborhood are their schools, he declared.

Charles H. Silver, the president of the board, said that the appeal would be considered and a decision announced soon.

PICKETING "NOT AN INTEGRATION ISSUE"
But They Don't Want Negroes In White School

N.Y. Parents Protest Forced Integration

Pickets Deplore Transfer Plan For Negroes, Puerto Ricans

NEW YORK (AP) — Three hundred white parents picketed City Hall Thursday in protest against forced transfer of Negro and Puerto Rican slum children into their schools. "Don't tread on us," read signs which pickets carried in a steady rain.

Later, a delegation talked with Mayor Robert F. Wagner, who promised to discuss their protests with school officials.

The demonstrators insisted they are not fighting integration as such and are not anti-Negro. But they claimed the importation of youngsters into Queens schools from Brooklyn slums will lower property values and teaching standards, and increase juvenile delinquency.

New York permits no legal segregation. But in neighborhoods where one race predominates, schools follow a pattern that is equivalent to segregation.

Nearly three years ago, the Board of Education outlined a bold plan to force integration on such schools by transporting small groups of Negroes into white school areas.

This aroused considerable protest from teachers, parents and others. The board backed down to a degree and offered assurances that its limited integration plan would not cross borough lines.

However, this week the board announced plans to transport 1,000 Negroes and Puerto Ricans from the tough, teeming Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn to schools in the adjoining borough of Queens.

Some 390 of them were scheduled to enter four public schools in the Glendale section of Queens next term.

The board contended Bedford-Stuyvesant schools are overcrowded while Glendale schools are not being used to maximum capacity.

Glendale residents raised a storm of protest, climaxed by Thursday's demonstration. They demanded that the board reopen closed schools in Brooklyn, rather than transport Bedford-Stuyvesant students some three miles to predominantly white schools.

Six Negro children counterpicketed the Glendale demonstrators outside City Hall. Their placards read:

"This is New York City, not Little Rock."

"Are we the JD's that Glendale fears?"

The mother of one of the Negro youngsters, Naomi Clark, said she wanted her boy in Glendale schools because they have a higher achievement level.

Mayor Cocks Ear As Whites Picket Mixing

Promises Parents He'll Investigate Negro Importation

NEW YORK (AP)—Mayor Robert F. Wagner has promised picketing white parents that he will get in touch with the city school superintendent about the planned transfer of 1,000 pupils — mostly Negroes and Puerto Ricans.

Supt. John J. Theobald recently announced plans to shift the 1,000 pupils out of crowded schools in the Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn, which is populated mostly by Negroes, to less crowded areas of the city.

About half the 1,000 would be reassigned in the fall to five schools in Queens, a borough adjoining Brooklyn. The other half would be shifted to six schools in Brooklyn.

About 300 parents and other persons from the Glendale section of Queens picketed outside City Hall in the rain Thursday in protest.

Spokesmen for the pickets said they were not anti-Negro and were not protesting school integration as such. They contended that the shift of children from Brooklyn slums would increase juvenile delinquency in their neighborhood, impair teaching standards and lower property values.

Eight Negro children and two Negro mothers counter picketed at City Hall. They carried signs reading "This is N.Y.C., not Little Rock."

There is no legal or intended segregation in New York City public schools. In some instances, however, neighborhood racial patterns cause school enrollments that are almost all-white or all-Negro.

Protest mixing—

Students boycott Queens schools

NEW YORK, Sept. 14—(AP)—Picketing and a stay-at-home boycott by at least a fourth of the white pupils in the Glendale-Ridgewood area of Queens greeted the arrival today of Negro and Puerto Rican pupils transferred from Brooklyn.

In addition, large signs saying "Blacks go home" appeared in front of one school during the night. They were painted out before the students from Brooklyn's poverty-stricken Bedford-Stuyvesant area arrived in the school for opening day.

Most of the 363 pupils scheduled for transfer showed up and entered the five schools involved without difficulty. White parents picketed in front of three of the schools, however.

The schools are in an almost entirely white area of Queens, and had a total registration of about 2300 excluding the transfers from Brooklyn. More than 900 pupils stayed at home, authorities estimated.

SOME WHITE parents in the Glendale-Ridgewood areas have held angry meetings and parades in recent months to protest the transfer of the Negro and Puerto Rican children.

They contended the transfers were an illegal use of public funds to force integration.

In denying the charge, the city said the transfers were made to move pupils from overcrowded schools in Brooklyn to under-used schools.

Before the transfers, the five schools involved were almost entirely white. There is no segregation by law in New York City, but sometimes neighborhood patterns create school populations almost totally white or Negro.

Many of the protesting Queens residents said they were not anti-Negro, but only wanted to maintain high standards and the tradition of neighborhood schools.

250 NEGROES PLAN SCHOOL MOVE IN HARLEM PROTEST

New York, Sept. 11 (UPI)—Approximately 250 Negro students from Harlem will attempt to register at a junior high school in the exclusive Riverdale section of the Bronx next Monday in protest to the transfer of 100 white students to the school.

The move to "integrate" the school in predominantly white Riverdale will be made by an association of Harlem parents who have contended for several years that Harlem schools are "segregated and inferior." Their protests have had the support of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Several independent groups of Harlem parents have called for a boycott of Harlem schools next Monday and Tuesday to protest inferior school conditions. The action could involve as many as 40,000 Negro pupils.

White Pupils Stage Boycott In New York

Negro, Puerto Rican Transfers Protested

From Wire Dispatches

New York, Sept. 14.—More than 1,100 white students staged a one-day boycott of four New York public schools Monday in protest against the transfer of Negro and Puerto Rican children into a predominantly white area.

White parents picketed outside the schools.

During the night, large signs reading, "Blacks go home," appeared in front of one school. However, they were painted out before the influx of 363 slum children from Brooklyn on the opening day of school.

Only one of the schools in the Ridgewood-Glendale section of Queens reported a normal attendance on the first day of school.

The number of white absentees was nearly 50 per cent of the total enrollment of all of the five schools.

School officials and police, assigned to maintain order, said there had been no incidents. None of the transfer children were molested.

School officials said the transfer students would have to commute an average of 3½ miles on the buses.

The boycott climaxed a dispute that began during the summer when the Board of Education announced that the transfers were to be made because of overcrowding in Brooklyn schools.

School Board Stood Firm

The School Board stood firm despite protest meetings in Queens and picket lines of white mothers who marched in front of City Hall.

Opponents of the transfers insisted they were less concerned with the race of the Brooklyn children than they were with the slum backgrounds which they feared would affect their own children.

New York has no legal segregation in its schools. But neighborhood racial patterns in some areas create almost totally segregated school enrollments.

School Board Meeting Harlem Parent Groups

Board of Education officials were meeting today with Harlem parent groups and the National Assn. for the Advancement of the Colored People in an attempt to avert a threatened boycott of Harlem schools set for Monday and Tuesday.

At the same time Schools Superintendent John J. Theobald announced he was going ahead with his controversial plan to shift 364 students from the Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn to schools in Queens on Monday.

Referring to the proposed Harlem boycott, Dr. Theobald said yesterday he would explain the school system's position to the parents and show what was being done to improve schooling.

Parents who keep their children out of school without valid reason, he indicated, will be dealt with under the provisions of the state's compulsory school attendance law.

Some Negro parents have also said that an attempt will be made on Monday, the first day of the term, to enroll 25 Harlem pupils in Junior High School 141 in Riverdale.

Dr. Theobald said the Harlem pupils would not be admitted to the Riverdale school and that officials would not permit any interference with school activities.

"If anyone interferes with the education of children in our schools," he said, "I will call the police. I don't care whether there are 200 or 2000 persons there. I will not permit anyone to make a circus of our schools."

pupils stayed away Monday when schools opened in the Glendale and Ridgewood sections of Queens. Attendance Tuesday was near normal.

White Queens mothers picketed Monday in opposition to what they termed artificial integration of their schools. They carried signs reading, "We Don't Oppose True Integration."

Transfer of the Brooklyn children was ordered by the Board of Education, ostensibly to ease crowding in schools in the Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn, one of the city's worst Negro slums. It also was in line with board policy to integrate certain city schools where feasible.

New York has no legal segregation in its schools. But some schools, following the pattern of the neighborhoods they serve, are virtually all white or all Negro.

Queens Schools Are Integrated; Boycott Is Over

Picketing, Pupil Boycotts Mark New York Schools' Integration

NEW YORK (AP)—Picketing and a student boycott Monday marked the racial integration of five white Queens schools by Negroes and Puerto Ricans from Brooklyn slums.

More than 900 of 2300 white pupils stayed away from schools in the Glendale and Ridgewood sections of Queens. White parents picketed three of the schools.

During the night, large signs reading "blacks go home" appeared in front of one school. However, they were painted out before the influx of 363 slum children from Brooklyn on the opening day of school.

Actual entry of the Brooklyn pupils into the schools was without incident.

The new children came from one of the toughest sections of New York City, the Negro and Puerto Rican slums of Bedford-Stuyvesant in Brooklyn. The Board of Education decreed their transfer across borough lines because of overcrowding in their own schools.

White parents in Queens charged this was a violation of a long-standing pledge that the board's gradual integration program would not be carried across borough lines. They protested in vain against the transfers since they were originally scheduled last spring.

Opponents of the transfers insisted they were less concerned with the race of the Brooklyn children than they were with the slum backgrounds which they feared would affect their own children.

Negroes Reach Accord On Segregation Charge

NEW YORK (AP)—Nine Negro children kept out of schools their parents charged were segregated and inferior will resume their education Monday.

The parents and the Board of Education reached a temporary agreement Tuesday to have the students attend classes at schools designated by the superintendent of schools pending the outcome of litigation.

Supt. John J. Theobald said the youngsters will not be assigned to Harlem schools they formerly attended nor to those requested by the parents.

The schools will be selected strictly on the basis of "the educational and emotional development of the children," Theobald said.

The Board of Education has been seeking by means of transfers to overcome the heavy concentration of students from a particular racial group in some schools.

Appeals on two conflicting court rulings on neglect charges brought against the parents are pending.

One justice of the Domestic Relations Court dismissed the charges against two parents, and the Board of Education appealed.

Another justice of the same court found some of the other parents guilty of violating the education law, and the parents appealed.

Also pending is the parents' million-dollar civil suit against the city. They ask damages for the alleged injustice suffered by the children in "segregated" schools.

Placards at Hearing Urge 'Jim Crow' End

The Board of Education heard arguments yesterday that two Harlem mothers were justified in keeping their children from attending two junior high schools because of inferior educational facilities.

Demands that the Board of Education speed up racial integration in the city's public schools by a variety of means —including the teaching of Negro and Puerto Rican history—also were lodged at the board's regular monthly meeting at 110 Livingston St., Brooklyn.

Prior to the hearing, some fifty persons carrying placards bearing such messages as "No More Jim Crow Schools," staged a half-hour sidewalk demonstration in support of the Emergency Committee on the New York Education Crisis, a newly formed organization seeking better educatoinal facilities for minority groups.

Its leader, the Rev. George Lawrence, executive director of the 340-congregation Empire State Baptist Convention, urged that the board reverse its decision to appeal a ruling by Childrens Court Justice Justine Wise Polier last Dec. 15. The justice upheld the two mothers' refusal to send their children to Harlem's Public Schools 136 and 139. Subsequently, the board requested the City Corporation Counsel to file an appeal with the Appelate Division, and it is expected that the case will be argued during the next six weeks.

Also heard yesterday were spokesmen for the Urban League of Greater New York, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and th eAmerican Jewish Congress. They demanded that the board drop the appeal and take faster action on 135 specific recommendations advanced in 1956 and 1957 by the board's own Commission on Integration.

By a unanimous vote, the seven board members attending the session resolved "that such action as the Board of Education may decide to take in the matter of the Polier decision be taken with due consideration" to the views that had been expressed. The motion was introduced by the Rev. Dr. Gardner C. Taylor, the board's sole Negro member.

Rockefeller Vetoes Pupil-Spanking Bill

ALBANY, N. Y., April 22 (AP)—Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller, who says he has spanked his own children on occasion, today vetoed a bill which would have permitted school teachers to use force on unruly pupils.

The measure would have taken the decision on use of corporal punishment away from school boards and given it to individual teachers.

"I am convinced that such an interference with the discretion exercised by local school boards in the establishing of rules of discipline is neither warranted nor desirable," the Governor wrote in his veto message.

State penal law now authorizes teachers to use "reasonable force" to restrain or correct a pupil, but school boards may bar teachers from doing so.

The measure was aimed primarily at New York City. There, an 89-year-old rule of the Board of Education bars teachers from using corporal punishment.

During a hearing on the bill, supporters said it was needed to allow New York City teachers to combat hoodlum elements in their classrooms. Opponents said it would be "a return to the whipping post."

MOVE TO BAR TRANSFER

Queens Area Up In Arms Over Negro Pupil Shift

NEW YORK (AP)—A big-scale protest movement was under way in Glendale, Queens, Wednesday to prevent the transfer to that section of 390 Brooklyn school children, most of them Negroes and Puerto Ricans.

A mass meeting, of nearly 2,000 Glendale residents, last night planned steps to resist the transfer, including a demonstration Thursday at City Hall.

They also demanded an investigation of the Board of Education and discussed possible legal action to block the projected transfer, ordered this fall to relieve overcrowded classrooms in Brooklyn's mostly colored Bedford-Stuyvesant area.

The Glendale schools have predominantly white pupils.

"I want to make clear our opposition is not on an integration basis," said Henry Reickert, head of the Glendale Taxpayers Assn. and chairman of the protest meeting.

Participants claimed the transfers would be costly, inconvenient, and could be handled better by reopening a closed school closer to the overcrowded schools.

"Integration has never been brought up here . . ." Reickert said.

Speakers assailed former baseball star Jackie Robinson, a Negro, now a business executive and columnist, who had written an article implying the Queens protests were based on racial prejudice.

WOULDN'T STOOP

"We wouldn't stoop to that level," the Rev. Fred Reiter, of Glendale's redeemer Lutheran Church, told the meeting.

New York has no segregated schools as such, but residential concentrations of racial groups lead to heavy proportions of either colored or white pupils in some schools.

The meeting also demands the return of Capt. Adrian P. Donohue as commander of their local police precinct.

Donohue recently was reassigned to Manhattan because he spoke at a protest meeting of parents in Glendale, June 4, opposing the projected transfer.

He reportedly said the area had the lowest juvenile delinquency rate in the city, and expressed concern over the future situation if the transfer takes place.

POLICE STAND

Police Commissioner Stephen D. Kennedy, questioned about the reassignment, said "the police have the duty of serving all the people — not a segment of the population," and shouldn't take partisan stands.

This policy, he said, "transcends local considerations, pressures or hysteria."

School Superintendent John J. Theobald Tuesday announced plans for transfer of about 1,000 students from overcrowded Bedford-Stuyvesant schools, including the 390 to partially unused schools in Glendale and Ridgewood, Queens.

American Jewish Congress Charges Segregation in New York Schools; Urges Action to End Discrimination

NEW YORK.—The New York Metropolitan Council of the American Jewish Congress, Sunday, February 1, offered a five-point program to halt what it termed "de facto segregation in the city's schools."

In issuing its proposals, the local AJCongress unit charged that a statement by Dr. John T. Theobald, superintendent of the schools, denying such discrimination existed, was contradicted by five separate reports of the Board of Education's own Commission on Integration.

These reports, the AJCongress said, found that segregation and discrimination did exist in New York City schools and recommended improvements in curriculum, staff and facilities to meet the problem.

Although the reports and recommendations of the Commission on Integration were submitted more than two years ago and adopted by the Board of Education, it was stated, "no real action has yet been taken to meet the situation in which tens of thousands of Negro and Puerto Rican school children in New York receive inferior schooling in segregated schools."

The AJCongress proposals were contained in a letter to the Board of Education signed by Howard M. Squadron, chairman of the Commission on Law and Social Action of the American Jewish Congress New York Metropolitan Council.

The letter called on the Board of Education to take "positive steps" to implement the reports of the Commission on Integration and to undertake the following actions immediately:

(1) Change the method of teacher assignment so that the needs of the school—rathen than the preferences of the teacher—take priority. Compulsory assignment of teachers should be adopted if necessary, the AJCongress unit proposed.

(2) Inaugurate a broad program of expanded child guidance services, particularly in schools wioth large pupils enrollments from under-privileged groups. Such a program would include psychiatric and social services, special classes and other techniques to raise educational levels.

(3) Work out a plan of "permissive transfers" under which children attending segregated schools would be allowed to transfer to schools with more racially-balanced enrollments.

(4) Set up a comprehensive school zoning plan to achieve more racially-balanced schools. New schools should be built in "border areas" to prevent de facto segregation, the AJCongress urged.

(5) Give special priority to such programs in the 1960 school budgetary request.

Senator Seymour Explains Unreadiness for Sudden Shift From Brooklyn

State Senator Seymour R. Thaler said yesterday that "most" Ridgewood and Glendale residents "welcome the opportunity to afford all children, whatever their color, a full, equal and integrated education."

These Queens areas have been involved in a controversy over a Board of Education plan to transfer 400 Brooklyn pupils—mainly Negroes—from two overcrowded Bedford-Stuyvesant elementary schools to five under-used schools in their section.

Henry Reichert, president of the Glendale Taxpayers Association, said his group was studying possible legal action in opposition. But he added that it was awaiting results from Mayor Wagner's promise last Thursday to confer with Dr. John J. Theobald, Superintendent of Schools.

Mr. Reichert insisted that the opposition was "not built on a racial basis," but was concerned over Bedford-Stuyvesant's juvenile delinquency record. His group, he said, had proposed alternative use of Public School 151 in Brooklyn, otherwise slated for closing.

This school, he said, has "better facilities and a modern lunchroom—our school has no lunchroom."

Senator Thaler, a Democrat-Liberal from Forest Hills, complained that the Board of Education had "made no effort to prepare the community for a decision which is both laudable and progressive." Asserting that "the responsible community leaders were caught off base," he added:

Optimism on Transfer

"It would be unconscionable to permit schoolrooms to remain vacant in the Glendale-Ridgewood area while children in a near-by community are deprived of a full school day's education by reason of overcrowding."

Over the week-end, the City of New York Commission on Intergroup Relations said it had been working with Brooklyn and Queens groups and was confident that the transfer "will be accomplished in an orderly manner" without disturbances.

Dr. Frank S. Horne, executive director, called the shift "a sound move to equalize educational opportunity and improve ethnic balance in our public schools."

Principals of the five Queens schools, he said, "will do all possible to achieve successful integration."

In a taped broadcast over radio station WNEW, Dr. Theobald said last night:

"I cannot, as Superintendent of Schools, sit by and have youngsters on part time and have extra seats easily accessible and not use them. I'm going to use my facilities to the maximum of my ability to give every kid a chance for the best education I can give him, and I'm not going to be pushed around on it. * * * When they don't like it, they can get somebody else to do it."

Asked White Parents March In New York

Protest Plan To Transfer Negroes To Schools

NEW YORK, June 25.—(AP)—Three hundred white parents picketed City Hall Thursday in protest against forced transfer of Negro and Puerto Rican slum children into their schools.

"Don't Tread On Us," read signs which pickets carried in a steady rain.

Later, a delegation talked with Mayor Robert F. Wagner, who promised to discuss their protests with school officials.

Demonstrators insisted they are not fighting integration as such and are not anti-Negro. But they claimed importation of youngsters into Queens schools from Brooklyn slums will lower property values and teaching standards, and increase juvenile delinquency.

New York permits no legal segregation. But in neighborhoods where one race predominates, schools follow a pattern that is equivalent to segregation.

Nearly three years ago, the Board of Education outlined a bold plan to force integration on such schools by transporting small groups of Negroes into white school areas.

This aroused considerable protest from teachers, parents and others. The board backed down and offered assurances its limited integration plan would not cross borough lines.

However, this week the board announced plans to transport 1,000 Negroes and Puerto Ricans from tough, teeming Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn to schools in the adjoining borough of Queens.

Glendale residents demanded the board reopen closed schools in Brooklyn, rather than transport students three mile[illegible].

PROGRAM ALTERED

Nearly three years ago, the Board of Education outlined a bold plan to force integration on such schools by transporting small groups of Negroes into white school areas.

This aroused considerable protest from teachers, parents and others. The board backed down to a degree and offered assurances that its limited integration plan would not cross borough lines.

However, this week the board announced plans to transport 1,000 Negroes and Puerto Ricans from the tough, teeming Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn to schools in the adjoining borough of Queens.

PROTEST RAGES

Some 390 of them were scheduled to enter four public schools in the Glendale section of Queens next term.

The board contended Bedford Stuyvesant schools are overcrowded while Glendale schools are not being used to maximum capacity.

Glendale residents raised a storm of protest, climaxed by Thursday's demonstration. They demanded that the board reopen closed schools in Brooklyn, rather than transport Bedford Stuyvesant students some three miles to predominantly white schools.

Six Negro children counterpicketed the Glendale demonstrators outside City Hall. Their placards read:

"This is New York City, not Little Rock."

"Are we the JD's that Glendale fears?"

The mother of one of the Negro youngsters, Naomi Clark, said she wanted her boy in Glendale schools because they have a higher achievement level.

"It's the democratic way of life," she declared.

Boycotting, Picketing End At 5 Schools In New York

NEW YORK (AP)—Boycotting and picketing ended Tuesday at five Queens Schools, racially integrated with more than 300 Brooklyn Negroes.

More than 300 of 2,300 white pupils stayed away Monday when the schools opened in the Glendale and Ridgewood sections of Queens. Attendance Tuesday was near normal.

White Queens mothers picketed Monday in opposition to what they termed artificial integration of their schools. They carried signs reading "we don't oppose true integration."

The transfer of the Brooklyn children was ordered by the board of education, ostensibly to ease crowding in schools in the Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn, one of the city's worst Negro slums. It also was in line with board policy to integrate certain city schools where feasible.

New York has no legal segregation in its schools. But some schools, folowing the pattern of the neighborhoods they serve, are virtually all white or all Negro.

Queens residents protested that the board violated an announced policy of not crossing borough lines with its integration program. They insisted they were less concerned with the race of the Brooklyn children than they were with their tough slum backgrounds.

However, the Brooklyn youngsters taking part in the transfer came to school neatly dressed and appeared quiet and even timid in the face of Monday's demonstration.

Queens Pupils Boycott Forced Integration

NEW YORK, Sept. 15 (AP).—More than 40 per cent of the white pupils in five Queens schools, a total of about 970, stayed home yesterday as mothers demonstrated against what amounted to the schools' first racial integration.

The 300-odd children from Brooklyn whose transfer caused the protest—a majority of them Negroes and Puerto Ricans—came and went and spent their first school day without any real trouble.

The Board of Education and the protesting parents claim racial integration is not the issue. Some are virtually segregated in the city because of housing patterns.

The board says it moved the children from schools in the slum area of Bedford-Stuyvesant in Brooklyn because the Brooklyn schools were overcrowded.

Race Hate signs Go Up

Most demonstrators against the transfer said it was not the fact that the children were mainly Negro or Puerto Rican that bothered them, but the mass movement from poorer—and admittedly tougher—neighborhoods, across borough lines into the quiet Queens communities of Ridgewood and Glendale.

At one school officials had to paint out signs that had been scrawled on the building and playground during the night.

The signs, erased before the children showed up, read: "Blacks go home."

Signs carried by picketing mothers outside the schools were more temperate.

They read "Stop transplanting neighborhoods," "Our vote counts, too," and "We don't oppose true integration."

Slow Buses Bring Tension

One of the tensest moments came when buses were slow arriving at one school to pick up the Brooklyn children and take them home.

A crowd of teen-agers swelled the ranks of the picketing mothers to about 50 persons, who suddenly became silent as 59 children, none over 11 years old, came out of the school and entered the buses.

The Negro children clung to each other, but there were no tears and some even smiled at the spectators.

"Aw, what a shame, such little kids," said a woman holding two of her own by the hand. "All this fuss over 10-year-old kids."

PUPIL SHIFT NEAR, TENSIONS QUIETED

Anti-Bias Group Active in Queens Compaigning for Acceptance of 364

By HOMER BIGART

Six busloads of Negro and Puerto Rican children from Brooklyn will be entered tomorrow in five predominantly white schools in Queens.

The 364 children will be gathered up in the Bedford-Stuyvesant slums and carried three miles across the county line to elementary schools in the Queens communities of Ridgewood and Glendale.

The operation — to relieve over-crowded schools — has aroused bitter opposition among the predominantly German-American population of Ridgewood and Glendale. The two communities are intensely conservative, isolated from the main currents of urban traffic by a belt of cemeteries. The people live in neat frame houses on remarkably clean streets: it is commonplace to see housewives scrubbing the front walk.

The decision announced in June was preceded by no community preparation whatsoever.

It was only after angry parents picketed City Hall in protest against the transfer that the Wagner administration realized that the pressures building up in Ridgewood and Glendale could produce another Little Rock.

Today, on the eve of integration, the two communities are much calmer, thanks to intensive field work by the Commission on Intergroup Relations.

Local Residents Enlised

The commission, a municipal agency that fights racial tensions, attacked the problem late in June. Aware that no amount of outside pressure would be effective, the agency sought neighborhood leadership to counter the agitation of the local "Taxpayers' Associations."

First, the clergy was enlisted. By midsummer virtually all priests, ministers and rabbis were counseling peaceful acceptance of the plan.

Last week the Protestant clergy issued a statement calling on residents of the area to welcome the Negro and Puerto Rican children "in the spirit of Christian love." Today, in twenty churches, ministers will preach on this theme.

The Ridgewood-Glendale Ministers' Association will station members outside the five schools tomorrow morning. These ministers will mingle with any crowds that may gather, discouraging with calm words any attempts to incite trouble.

The commission was unable to arrange a meeting between Queens parents and Dr. John J. Theobald, superintendent of schools.

But Dr. Theobald went to the Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn Wednesday night and spoke to 500 parents of Negro and Puerto Rican children.

The parents were apprehensive. They wanted assurance that their children would be under continuous supervision. Why couldn't they escort their children to school tomorrow, as they had always done, and pick them up?

Dr. Theobald said he did not want parents coming to the school, at least not for two or three weeks. Their presence would only contribute to tension, he said.

"Help me out," he pleaded. "This is not a normal situation. Stay away."

The parents agreed. But it was arranged that one of them would ride in each of the six buses tomorrow.

Dr. Theobald told them that the children would be supervised, even during playtime, and could not wander about the community.

One final anxiety had to be allayed. The parents recalled that Dr. Charles H. Silver, president of the Board of Education, had described the transfers as a temporary emergency measure. Did this mean that the children would be shifted back to Bedford-Stuyvesant in six months, a year?

No, said Dr. Theobold. The children will complete their elementary education in Ridgewood and Glendale. But no future classes would be sent to Queens because four new schools are due to be completed in Bedford-Stuyvesant next year.

In Ridgewood Thursday night, 300 members of the Ridgewood Taxpayers Association met in a Myrtle Avenue hall for a final protest rally.

William J. Cedzich, an independent candidate for Queens Borough President, called the student transfer part of a "diabolical and senseless plan" to create ethnic balance in the schools. (The Board of Education has denied that integration was the aim of the transfer.)

"You're being used as hamsters and guinea pigs," Mr. Cedzich cried. He said the plan could result in "untold strife."

State Senator Seymour R. Thaler, Democrat of Forest Hills, tried to defend the plan, but was hooted down.

THEOBALD WARNS HARLEM PARENTS

Again Denies a Boycott but Tells Negro Families He Can Take Legal Steps

By LEONARD BUDER

Dr. John J. Theobald, the Superintendent of Schools, warned Harlem parents yesterday that he would take "appropriate legal steps" if they kept their children out of school.

At the same time, he insisted, despite the claim of a Negro parents' group, that there was no boycott of Harlem schools.

Earlier in the day Justice Owen McGicvern of the Supreme Court in Manhattan gave school officials until Oct. 13 to show cause why Harlem pupils should not be transferred to junior high schools in Riverdale, the Bronx, or the Inwood section of Manhattan.

The order was obtained by the the Negro parents' group that contends there is a boycott.

Peter Flanagan, assistant corporation counsel who represented Dr. Theobald, requested the adjournment to Oct. 13 because, he said, school officials needed more time. Paul B. Zuber, lawyer for the Negro parents, argued against the postponement.

Zuber Sees Boycott

Commenting later on Dr. Theobald's denial of a boycott, Mr. Zuber said:

"He can say what he likes, I know what I've got. There are 200 children out."

School officials say that attendance at the two schools involved—Junior High Schools 136 and 139—has been about normal since the term began Monday. An absence rate of 10 per cent is considered normal for the opening week.

M. Zuber said that arrangements would be made over the week-end to start tutoring for youngsters being kept out of school.

Last fall nine Negro children who were kept out of the same schools were tutored privately. The youngsters were later admitted to another city school, although also in Harlem.

Negro Student Transferals Tripled In New York Area

NEW YORK (AP) — School authorities Friday tripled the number of Negro students who will be transferred from crowded Brooklyn schools to other institutions. Classes begin next Monday.

Plans were announced for the transfer by bus of 608 Bedford-Stuyvesant area pupils to six schools in the Flatbush, Bushwick and Brownsville areas of Brooklyn.

Last spring, plans also were drawn up for transfer of 364 Bedford-Stuyvesant students to all-white Glendale and Ridgewood schools in the adjoining Borough of Queens.

Glendale parents vainly protested the importation of the Brooklyn students into their schools. They contended they were less concerned with the racial integration involved than they were with the slum backgrounds of the Bedford-Stuyvesant children.

New York schools have no legal segregation. But in predominantly Negro or white areas schools tend to have a similar racial composition.

in the Riverdale section of the Bronx.

The parents announced their decision after obtaining a court order requiring the Board of Education to show why the Harlem children should not be admitted to the Riverdale school or to one in a predominantly white neighborhood in the northern part of Manhattan.

The school board was required to give its explanation tomorrow morning before Justice Henry Clay Greenberg in Supreme Court in Manhattan.

Paul B. Zuber, attorney for the Negro parents, asserted that his group—said to consist of about 200 parents and an equal number of children—did not want to engage in the kind of demonstration employed by the Queens residents. The Harlem parents have charged that their children are receiving inferior schools.

Mr. Zuber said that the 200 children involved had not attended the Harlem school so far this week and did not plan to. School officials said that they were unaware of any mass boycott.

In the Ridgewood-Glendale section of Queens, the situation was quiet yesterday morning.

On Monday, the transferred pupils from the Bedford Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn were greeted by crowds protesting "forced integration" of their neighborhood schools. The school system has denied the charge, saying that the shift was intended solely to relieve overcrowding in Bedford-Stuyvesant schools.

Yesterday, there were few persons on hand when the Brooklyn pupils got off the school buses. The youngsters, 9 to 11 years old, were neatly dressed and in good spirits. They did not appear to be as self-conscious as they had been on Monday.

Ten minutes after sixty Negro pupils had entered Public School 91 in Glendale, two young men who said they were colege students showed up carrying signs.

One placard read: "Dr. Theobald Go Back To Queens College And Take Sociology." (Dr. John J. Theobald, Superintendent of Schools, was once president of Queens College.) Another read: "Don't Let Politics Lower Our Children's Education."

Policemen told the young men that they could picket but that they had to keep moving. After several turns around the school, during which time they attracted little attention, the two ended their demonstration.

The bomb scare was received at P. S. 68 in Glendale. The school, with 561 pupils, was evacuated. The police searched the building but found nothing.

Attendance at the five schools was nearly normal yesterday, school officials said. On Monday, 1,380 white pupils of a total white enrollment of 2,332 attended. Yesterday, there were 2,171 white students present, and the white enrollment had risen to 2,375.

There were 307 Brooklyn students, five more than Monday, but fifty less than were expected. There was no explanation for the absences.

On Monday, some of the white parents had said that their children would demand lunch facilities yesterday. The parents expressed anger that such provisions were made for the Brooklyn pupils, while their youngsters had to go home to eat. However, there was no large-scale demand for hot lunches.

In addition to P. S. 91 and 68, the other Queens schools affected by the transfers were P. S. 77, 81 and 88.

WHITE PUPILS END QUEENS BOYCOTT

5 Schools Quiet in Transfer Dispute—Demonstration in Riverdale Called Off

By LEONARD BUDER

White children returned to classes yesterday at five Queens public schools, ending a one-day boycott protesting the transfer of Negro and Puerto Rican pupils from Brooklyn.

With the exception of an unfounded bomb scare at one school and the brief appearance of two pickets at another, there were no demonstrations yesterday.

In another school development, a group of Negro parents from Harlem called off a demonstration scheduled for this morning at a junior high school in the Riverdale section of the Bronx. The parents had planned to picket the school in protest against the transfer of Negro children to it from Harlem.

HARLEM SCHOOLS DISPUTE BOYCOTT

No Evidence of Organized Absences at 3 Facilities, Education Aides Say

TEACHER STAFF UPHELD

Attendance Is Maintained in Ridgewood Section—39,500 Shifted in City

By LEONARD BUDER

City school officials yesterday disputed a claim by a Negro parents group that about 200 children were boycotting Harlem schools.

They said they had not seen any evidence of a widespread boycott in the first three days of the new school term.

Paul B. Zuber, the lawyer for the Negro parents, has said that the children have been kept out of three Harlem schools since the term began on Monday to protest school conditions in the area.

He asserted that most of the children involved would normally attend Junior High Schools 136 and 139 and that a few were enrolled in J. H. S. 120.

Charles M. Shapp, assistant superintendent of schools in Harlem and the North Manhattan area, said that schools in his districts were reporting attendance that was normal or near normal for this time of the year. An absence rate of 10 per cent is considered normal for the opening week.

Alfred Nussbaum, principal of J. H. S. 136, said that he had been informed by one parent that she was keeping her child out of school "to cooperate in the community's effort to protest inferior and substandard education in Harlem schools." This was the only such mention made of a protest by parents.

Issue in Court Today

The Negro parents in the dispute have sought to have their children transferred to Junior High School 141, in the predominantly white Riverdale section of the Bronx.

On Tuesday, the parents obtained a court order requiring the Board of Education to show cause why the Harlem pupils should not be admitted to the Riverdale school. The board is scheduled to answer the order this morning in New York Supreme Court.

Both Mr. Nussbaum and Abraham Wilner, principal of J. H. S. 140, also challenged the parents' assertion that their schools provided inferior educational opportunities. The principals said their schools had excellent programs and dedicated and competent teachers.

Meanwhile in the Ridgewood-Glendale section of Queens where white children boycotted five schools on Monday to protest the transfer of Negro pupils from Brooklyn, the attendance rate was 88 per cent yesterday. This was a 2 per cent drop from Tuesday's figures, when the white pupils returned to class following the one-day protest. On Monday, the day of the boycott, the attendance rate at the five schools was 82 per cent.

At school headquarters, Francis A. Turner, assistant superintent in charge of school zoning, disclosed that 39,500 pupils were being shifted from crowded neighborhoods to attend underutilized schools in other sections.

Harlem Pupil Boycott May Be Averted

N. A. A. C. P. Official Sees Progress Made

The threat of a two-day Harlem-wide boycott of public schools on the opening day of school tomorrow appeared to have subsided somewhat yesterday. A total of 1,400,000 youngsters is expected to return to public, parochial and private schools. A Harlem boycott, however, might diminish this number by as many as 40,000.

An official of the New York branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which had indorsed the boycott, expressed himself as "pleased" yesterday with progress made toward averting the walkout at an emergency six-hour conference called by the city's Commission on Intergroup Relations (C. O. I. R.) at its offices, 80 Lafayette St.

L. Joseph Overton, the N. A. A. C. P. official and chairman of the Harlem parents' group attending the conference, said afterward that the parents would meet today to decide whether to go through with the boycott. The meeting will be held at the N. A. A. C. P. offices at 165 W. 131st St.

May Ask Cancellation

Mr. Overton declined to say what his recommendation to the parents' meeting would be, but it was considered likely that he would ask that the boycott be canceled. The boycott threat arose from the parents' contention that Harlem schools are educationally inferior.

Meeting with the Negro groups yesterday were Dr. John J. Theobald, Superintendent of Schools and several members of his staff. Dr. Alfred J. Marrow, chairman of C. O. I. R. presided. The two dozen Negro parents present heard Dr. Theobald and other school administrators outline improvements that would be put into effect in many Harlem schools when schools opens tomorrow.

Among the improvements they mentioned were the addition of new classes affording more individual guidance and cultural activities to the pupils; more remedial teachers in reading in arithmetic; more full-time guidance counsellors and the assurance that efforts will be made to achieve classroom performance in Harlem as high as anywhere else in the city.

Other Improvements

Other improvements to be made tomorrowfi it was said, were the reduction by 700 of the number of pupils on short-time and double-shift sessions by reassignment to other schools and the transfer to full time of the 2,000 remaining short-time and over-time pupils when a new elementary school opens in the former New York Vocational High School at 139th St. and Fifth Ave.

Mr. Overton said that representatives of 200 Harlem parents who have threatened to try to enroll their children in an all-white school in Riverdale, the Bronx, tomorrow would meet with the other parents today at the N. A. A. C. P. office. Presumably they will call off this scheme if the larger Harlem-wide plan is dropped.

Rejected Transfer

The 200 parents, who were represented at the conference by Paul B. Zuber, a lawyer, have demanded that their children be transferred to Junior High School 141 in Riverdale which, they say, is educationally superior to Harlem schools. Dr. Theobald rejected yesterday Dr. Zuber's demand for a transfer, as he had previously.

A statemet by Dr. Thobald, Mr. Overton and Dr. Marrow was handed to reporters at the end of the conference. It declared that progress had been made.

Harlem leaders at the conference associating themselves with this sentiment were the Rev. Dr. Thomas Kilgore jr., pastor of the Friendship Baptist Church, at 144 W. 131st St., and Mrs. Leolive Tucker, chairman of the education committee of the New York branch of the N. A. A. C. P. The national N. A. A. C. P. has taken no position on the boycott plan.

PRIVATE TUTORING SESSIONS IN HARLEM CHURCH: Paul B. Zuber instructing on city government yesterday [illegible] in community center of Abyssinia Baptist Church

BOYCOTT CLASSES BEGUN IN HARLEM

Pupils Kept Out of Public Schools in Protest Are Tutored in Church

By LEONARD BUDER

Twenty-five Negro pupils who have been kept out of public schools by their parents started attending tutoring sessions yesterday at 132 West 138th Street. Negro parents, who called the sessions, protest allegedly inferior school conditions in Harlem.

The parents' boycott was called last Monday, the first day of the new public school term, to protest what they contend are inferior school conditions. They are seeking to have their children transferred to white schools in other areas.

The tutoring sessions are being held in the community center of the Abyssinian Baptist Church, 132 West 138th Street, in Harlem. Adam Clayton Powell Jr., the Democratic representative who is pastor of the church, has made classrooms, an auditorium and lounges available.

Paul B. Zuber, attorney for the Negro parents, said he expected a total of 200 children who have been kept out of school to attend the sessions as soon as more voluntary teachers are obtained.

School officials have repeatedly said that they have seen no evidence of a wide boycott. Charles M. Shapp, assistant superintendent of schools in the area, said yesterday that the schools were reporting normal attendance rates. He said he had heard of only one pupil kept home in protest.

Mr. Shapp disclosed, however, that a special attendance teacher—the term "truant officer" has not been used here for many years—was being sent into the area specifically to check absences at the two schools that Mr. Zuber said were involved in the boycott. These are Junior High Schools 136 and 139.

Yesterday's tutoring session started at 9:30 A. M. and lasted until 3:30 P. M. Many of the children were accompanied in the morning by their mothers, a few of whom brought younger children along. The group assembled in a room used by the center as an auditorium, and was addressed by Mr. Zuber.

The lawyer, who also doubled as a teacher, told the pupils that they were not "going on a picnic" and that they would be expected to do serious work.

Classes were held in social studies, English, mathematics, French and science. The Rev. O. D. Dempsey, assistant pastor of the church, lectured on Negro history. Most of the pupils are seventh-grades; a few are in the eighth grade.

Mr. Zuber said later that the tutoring sessions would be continued until Dr. John J. Theobald, the Superintendent of Schools, answered a court order explaining why he would not transfer the pupils elsewhere. The reply is scheduled to be given Oct. 13.

Also serving as teachers at the sessions are Mr. Zuber's wife Barbara, a graduate of the Yale University Art School and Theodore Kelly, who holds a Doctor of Philosophy degree from New York University.

Mr. Zuber has used the term "tutoring sessions" to distinguish the project from a private school, which must meet state standards.

Mothers Picket In Queens—

White Students Boycott 'Mixed' School In N. Y.

NEW YORK, Sept. 14 (UPI)—More than 1100 white students staged a one-day boycott of four New York public schools today in protest against the transfer of Negro and Puerto Rican children into a pre-dominately-white area.

White parents picketed outside the schools.

About 300 transfer students were brought to five elementary schools in Queens in six special buses from the Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn, an area of slums and a high rate of juvenile delinquency.

Only one of the schools in the Ridgewood-Glendale section of Queens reported a normal attendance on the first day of school.

The number of white absentees was nearly 50 per cent of the total enrollment of all of the five schools.

School officials and police, assigned to maintain order, said there had been no incidents. None of the transfer children was molested while entering the schools.

School officials said the transfer students would have to commute an average of three and one-half miles on the buses.

The boycott climaxed a dispute that began during the Summer when the Board of Education announced that the transfers were to be made because of overcrowding in Brooklyn schools.

Parents in the quiet, residential section of Queens charged that the transfer amounted to "enforced integration." They claimed that there were empty schools in Brooklyn that could be repaired and used to ease the overcrowding.

The school board stood firm despite protest meetings in Queens and picket lines of white mothers who marched in front of City Hall.

Dr. Alfred J. Marrow, chairman of the New York City Commission on Intergroup Relations, said the "integrations" were responsible for the mass absence of white students.

Marrow said, however, that the transfer was progressing "smoothly and we find a distinct improvement in Community attitude since the time when hundreds of residents of the area picketed City Hall."

Meanwhile, a threatened mass boycott of schools in Harlem that would have involved about 40,000 Negro children failed to materialize.

Negro parents had charged that white children received transfers to schools in the exclusive Riverdale section of The Bronx from overcrowded Harlem schools, but that Negro children had been turned down. They also charged that Harlem schools had "inferior" equipment and "second-rate" teachers.

Harlem Pupils Seek Shift to Riverdale; Boycott Is Planned

By LEONARD BUDER

A new school integration controversy erupted here yesterday. Along with it came a warning of a possible boycott of Harlem public schools next week.

The controversy stems from the desire of a group of Negro parents in Harlem to have their children transferred to a junior high school in the Riverdale section of the Bronx.

The parents are irate because 400 students, most of them white, from the northern part of Manhattan, will be transferred to the Bronx school, situated in one of the most fashionable residential areas of the city.

A spokesman for the parents' group, whose request has been turned down by school officials—said that about 250 Negro mothers, accompanied by their children, would go to Junior High School 141 in Riverdale on Monday and apply for admission of the youngsters. The new school term will begin that day.

The announcement of the planned action was made by Paul Zuber, a lawyer who represented a group of Negro parents in Harlem during the last year. Mr. Zuber then [illegible] public schools from last September through the end of January in a protest over educational conditions.

Boycotting, Picketing End At 5 Schools In New York

Monday Morning

NEW YORK (AP)—Boycotting and picketing ended Tuesday at five Queens Schools, racially integrated with more than 300 Brooklyn slum Negroes.

More than 300 of 2,300 white pupils stayed away Monday when the schools opened in the Glendale and Ridgewood sections of Queens. Attendance Tuesday was near normal.

White Queens mothers picketed Monday in opposition to what they termed artificial integration of their schools. They carried signs reading "we don't oppose true integration."

The transfer of the Brooklyn children was ordered by the board of education, ostensibly to ease crowding in schools in the Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn, one of the city's worst Negro slums. It also was in line with board policy to integrate certain city schools where feasible.

New York has no legal segregation in its schools. But some schools, folowing the pattern of the neighborhoods they serve, are virtually all white or all Negro.

Queens residents protested that the board violated an announced policy of not crossing borough lines with its integration program. They insisted they were less concerned with the race of the Brooklyn children than they were with their tough slum backgrounds.

However, the Brooklyn youngsters taking part in the transfer came to school neatly dressed and appeared quiet and even timid in the face of Monday's demonstration.

N.Y. Integration Program Draws Praise From AJC

New York City — Despite ally high percentage of Negro and Puerto Rican pupils. This integration experiment "an historic attempt that may well serve as a guide to other northern cities."

Entitled "From Color Blind to Color Conscious," the study pointed out that in formulating its integration program, the Board of Education undertook to make a "fundamental change in educational theory." According to the report, the city's approach to integration "overturned the classic legal concept that government must be 'color blind' and announced instead that so far as public education is concerned, government must become 'color conscious'."

GOTHAM NEGRO PARENTS SEND CHILDREN SOUTH, TIMES SAYS

NEW YORK (AP) — Some New York Negro families, protesting the spread of juvenile delinquency and racial tension in the nation's largest city, are choosing to send their children to segregated schools in the South, the New York Times reported Saturday.

Overcrowded conditions in public schools as well as overcrowded neighborhoods, where youngsters are subjected to undesirable living and recreational conditions, are other factors influencing parents to send their children out of the state, the newspaper said.

Wide disagreement was reported, however, among Negro leaders on the number of children leaving the city to attend Southern schools.

One Negro leader placed the number at 3,000.

Another Negro leader estimated the number at 50 and added that the trend actually was in the opposite—that more Southern children are being sent to school away from segregated institutions in the South.

THE NEWSPAPER'S report was based on interviews with parents and school and church leaders. Those quoted included the following:

The Rev. J. Archie Hargraves of the Congregational Church of the Nazarene in Brooklyn. He said 10 of the 475 families in his congregation are sending children out of town this fall, seven of them to Virginia and North Carolina. He said he knew of 20 other families taking similar action and he estimated the total number of children involved at 1,000.

"Basically," the Rev. Hargroves said, "this is because of dissatisfaction that the children are not progressing rapidly in the schools here. Then there is a fear that they may get into trouble because they are not doing well in school. The families have ties in the South. Perhaps they remember basic education in the South."

The Rev. Hargraves added: "It just turns out that overcrowded neighborhoods are usually your racial ghettoes."

The Rev. George E. Calvert, minister of the Church of the Son of Man, in Manhattan, said families sending their children to Southern schools found it "simpler to educate children in the old culture than to make the new, confusing city culture relevant to the lives of their children."

ROY WILKINS, national executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), disagreed with the large numbers estimated by some and said he "would be astonished if as many as 50 Negro children from New York were sent back South."

"It's the other way," Wilkins added. "Hundreds of Southern children are sent up here. They live catch-as-catch-can here with relatives, to enjoy better education here."

One Negro father, unidentified by name, has a son who has just been graduated from a high school in Pensacola, Fla. The father said he sent his son to school there because New York has "just too much juvenile delinquency and racial tension."

"New York City is not a place to bring Negro kids up," the father added.

A different point was made by Dr. Ofelia Mendoza, education director of the Urban League of Greater New York. She said the league had received from 25 to 50 calls daily last fall from Negro parents asking how to transfer children from overcrowded schools.

Of all the inquiries, Dr. Mendoza said, only two parents decided to send their children to schools in the South. She said there was "a growing anxiety among parents who have children in segregated schools" and added:

"Many parents prefer to sacrifice themselves and send their children to private schools because of the psychological damage they receive in segregated schools, plus the fact that they don't get proper preparation to go ahead in life."

Firm Stand On Transfer Of Pupils Urged

NEW YORK, July 30—The New York City Board of Education was this week urged by NAACP Executive Secretary Roy Wilkins to proceed with plans to transfer a group of 400 youngsters, predominately Negro and Puerto Rican, to less crowded schools.

The children currently attend the overcrowded schools in the Bedford-Stuyvesant area of Brooklyn. Plans call for their transfer to, "certain schools in the Glendale-Ridgewood area," in Queens which have 2,600 vacant seats.

Mr. Wilkins wrote [illegible] of Education President Charles H. Silver following publication of a report that the Board was considering a petition on July 24 to reverse the decision to transfer the pupils. He urged the Board "not to alter Superintendent John Theobald's sound decision," to transfer the youngsters.

The NAACP Executive pointed out that there are, "more than six times as many empty seats as there are pupils to be transferred."

He then called for the Board to proceed with its plan, "on the simple and irrefutable grounds that the Board of Education is obligated to utilize the public school plants and facilities of the city to offer every child as nearly as equal an education as possible."

Mr. Wilkins added that opponents of the plan, "have unveiled some curious ideas of neighborhood anatomy in a great municipal complex." He then cited remarks attributed to Edward D. Burns, attorney for the Glendale Taxpayers Association.

A newspaper report quoted Mr. Burns on July 23 as saying that people of the Glendale area are a, "concise, tight-fitting little group," who "just don't like the idea of strangers coming into their neighborhood."

The people of Glendale, Mr. Wilkins told the Board President, "do not own the city schools which happen to be located in that area. These are not private schools, but public ones, built and maintained by taxes of all citizens of New York.

"The people of Harlem and Bedford-Stuyvesant also pay taxes and they have a right to demand that their children not be crowded into three-session days while closely adjacent schools have 2,600 empty seats," Mr. Wilkins asserted.

"Since classroom space is the basic item in the transfer," he continued, "the argument against the Board's right to send pupils by bus for the purpose of integration is beside the point.

"We believe that the Supreme Court opinion ordering non-segregated public education under the equal protection clause covers completely the Glendale transfer case, involving as its does glaring inequality in opportunity to learn."

Mr. Wilkins concluded by referring to the "ugly slanders that have been voiced by certain elements in Glendale.

"It is unthinkable in the world of 1959," he said, "that the Board of Education of the City of New York, would bow to demands based upon libels against a whole race of people.

"These demands spring from the arrogant theory that in a democratic municipality, a group of citizens may be denied common municipal services on the basis of their race, religion or ethnic origin" Mr. Wilkins asserted.

N.Y. Integration Program Draws Praise From AJC

New York City — Despite [illegible] slow implementation, New York City's school integration program offers a [illegible] for major cities throughout the North to follow in eliminating "de facto" school segregation, the American Jewish Congress said recently.

In a 57-page analysis of the Board of Education's integration effort, the AJCongress reported that New York is the only city in the nation that has accepted the goal of eliminating school segregation "as an integral part of the theory and practice of public education," and developed a plan to create racially heterogeneous schools.

But the study said the program is being put into effect too slowly, with the result that the number of segregated schools in the city is actually on the rise. As of June of this year the Board of Education listed 221 "Special service schools — elementary and junior high schools with an unusually high percentage of Negro and Puerto Rican pupils. This is an increase of eight from last year and 134 since 1950-51, it was noted.

Moreover, out of 16 new elementary schools built in The Bronx, Brooklyn and Manhattan from 1954 through 1958, seven can be considered segregated, with enrollments of Negro and Puerto Rican pupils ranging from 90.8 per cent to 97.5 per cent, the study showed.

'Fundamental Change'

"Both in its achevements and shortcomings, the New York experience is a crucial pilot project that should be studied carefully by the boards of education of other metropolitan centers confronted by similar problems," Isaac Toubin, executive director of the American Jewish Congress, declared in a foreword to the study. He called the city's integration experiment "an historic attempt that may well serve as a guide to other northern cities."

Entitled "From Color Blind to Color Conscious," the study pointed out that in formulating its integration program, the Board of Education undertook to make a "fundamental change in educational theory." According to the report, the city's approach to integration "overturned the classic legal concept that government must be 'color blind' and announced instead that so far as public education is concerned, government must become 'color conscious'."

New Yorkers Practice Segregation By Class

Courier Charleston W. Va.

By SAM POPE BREWER

(Editor's Note: The following article is by a staff writer of The New York Times and recently appeared in the columns of that newspaper.)

EDUCATING their children has come to be a nightmarish problem to middle-class New York families.

As the school year opens, thousands of parents are distressed because they could not get their children into schools of their choice or because they are wondering how to raise the money to keep them there.

Mothers trek from school to school, submit their children to elaborate tests and interviews and use every kind of influence that they can exert to have the children accepted. If they succeed, they often have to trim the whole family budget to fit the school bills.

IN MOST PLACES in the United States, including New York's suburbs, middle-class white parents find the public schools acceptable. In the city, however, the private school has come to be more of a necessity than a luxury in the minds of a great many of these parents.

Those who cannot get their children into a private school or who cannot afford the cost are leaving the city.

THE BIGGEST FACTOR in the situation is the recent influx of Negro and Puerto Rican pupils in the public schools. Without any prejudice based on race or color, many middle-class white parents object to having their children plunged into an atmosphere of slum children who, through no fault of their own, start out from a completely different and much lower level of manners and conduct.

An expert on the situation is Dr. Dan W. Dodson, director of the Center for Human Relations and Community Studies at New York University. In a study prepared last spring, he said:

"Between 1950 and 1957 New York City lost a white population about the size of Washington, i.e., about 750,000, and gained an ethnically identifiable Negro and Puerto Rican population about the size of Pittsburgh, i. e., about 650,000."

HE DESCRIBED the "newcomers" as "Puerto Rican or Negro in ethnic background, of heavily lower-socio-economic status and not accustomed to large-city ways of life.".

IN SIMPLER LANGUAGE, they have the manners and habits of underprivileged slum dwellers. Without blaming the newcomers, most parents with a different background fear for the manners, the morals and even the bodily safety of their children if they are exposed to that atmosphere.

Dr. Dodson cited figures on the public school pupils of Manhattan in 1957-58, as reported by their teachers. There were 30.7 per cent white and Oriental children, 33.6 per cent Puerto Ricans and 35.7 per cent Negroes. For the city as a whole, the figures were 18.2 per cent Negroes, 13.5 per cent Puerto Ricans and 68.3 per cent "others."

The "heavily lower socio-economic status" and unfamiliarity with "large-city ways of life" are the points that weigh most with parents who take their children out of those schools.

City school authorities say the shortcomings of the public schools are exaggerated. They say that parents who read of isolated cases of inefficiency or of violence in schools tend too easily to assume that such conditions are general.

They say there is only a tiny hard core of disorderly elements in the public schools.

STILL, IT IS THERE and it sometimes makes trouble.

The Police Department reported last year that 1,848 crimes had been committed in public schools during school hours in the first eleven months of 1957. Later statistics have not been compiled.

Heads of private schools canvassed by The New York Times have put the competition for college entry first among the reasons for increased interest in private schools.

Parents, however, put more stress on a fear of "bad contacts" in public schools. Whichever comes first, these are the two compelling factors.

Once they have decided that they want a private school for their children, parents have the problem of finding one. Only a small fraction of the city's school population can be accommodated in the private schools.

At the beginning of the last school year, there were 967,957 pupils in 798 public schools. The city's 137 private schools can handle only about 42,000.

A large number of those private schools are Roman Catholic and some are Jewish. In both those cases, enrollment is based largely on religious considerations and has not been greatly affected by the increasing trend to private schools.

There remain about fifty schools that are directly affected. They have a total capacity of only 14,500 students, and there is intense competition for those relatively few places. Some of the better-known schools have to turn away nine times as many qualified applicants as they accept.

These are schools defined by a school directory as "independent, private, nonpublic secondary institutions."

For those who are accepted, the cost of twelve years' schooling, leading to college, runs on the average to more than $12,000.

A few case histories can help to show the diversity of situations faced by parents and of their solutions.

ONE TYPICAL CASE is the family of a professional man with a moderate income, living on Morningside Heights, near Columbia University. The mother is an active community worker, who believes in public schools and works for their improvement.

Even when their income was at a level that made the fees a real burden, they kept their two boys in private schools "reluctantly, but of necessity" as the mother said.

SHE EXPLAINED that in their local public school only 10 per cent of the children were white, and many of the others were Puerto Ricans who spoke little English.

WITHOUT ANY PREJUDICE based on race or color, she said, she and her husband refused to let their boys be members of a small minority among children from a much lower cultural and economic level.

Another case is that of a Professor of Education who has done extensive studies in social relations and school problems. He said he believed firmly in the virtues of public schools, but that he had moved his daughter this year to a private school.

HE EXPLAINED that classes in her public school were so large and so "heterogeneous" that both instruction and discipline were below reasonable standards.

In another situation, a couple who moved to Peter Cooper Village considered the local public school inadequate and overcrowded. They put their young son into a private school "temporarily," while waiting for an improvement.

Both are literary workers, political liberals and believers in public schools. They said that after waiting three years they decided the wise thing was to keep their son in the private school pattern he was used to, in spite of the cost.

Another family joined the "flight to the suburbs." They left a comfortable Greenwich Village apartment and their circle of friends to settle in Westchester. They said they "hated the commuter's life," but could not afford to put their daughter through private school and had found their suburban public school satisfactory.

ANOTHER FAMILY that did not wish to leave the city did pull up its roots and moved to a distant neighborhood to solve the school problem. The father said he had to pay double the rent, but found it cheaper than paying private school fees.

He noted that he had no guarantee that the public school in their new district would not deteriorate and that he might be faced again with the problem of choosing between a private school or life in the suburbs.

THOSE ARE A FEW typical samples among the thousands of families that are affected. The reasons for objecting to public schools are varied. First comes the fear of bad influences and possible involvement in teen-aged violence.

Next there is the question of actual instruction. Parents complain in some cases of the quality of teaching and in many more cases of the high ratio of pupils to teachers.

THE PRIVATE SCHOOL problem affects a relatively small part of the city's population, but this group is keenly interested in the education of its children and it can be expected to provide a high proportion of valuable citizens once they are educated.

Those who are hit hardest are intellectual and professional families with high standards of education and relatively low income. Among them are the university teachers, artists, writers, editors, newspaper men and the less prosperous among doctors and lawyers.

Persons outside these circles and outside the education field are inclined to attribute the private school ambition to snobbery or "status - seeking." Investigation shows, however, that the causes and motives are far more complex.

THE GROUP most involved is largely liberal in its thinking and favorable to public school education as democratic. But when these parents come up against the problems of the city's public schools, they are likely to avoid them for their own children, whether through private schools or through flight to the suburbs.

One school worker remarked wryly: "It is easier for a liberal to live up to his ideals in Teaneck than it is in Manhattan these days."

Boycotting, Picketing Ends At Integrated Queens School

NEW YORK (AP)—Boycotting and picketing ended Tuesday at five Queens schools racially integrated with more than 300 Brooklyn slum Negroes.

More than 900 of 2,300 white pupils stayed away Monday when the schools opened in the Glendale and Ridgewood sections of Queens. Attendance was near normal Tuesday.

White Queens mothers picketed Monday in opposition to what they termed artificial integration of their schools. They carried signs reading, "We don't oppose true integration."

The transfer of the Brooklyn children was ordered by the Board of Education, ostensibly to ease crowding in schools in the Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn, one of the city's worst Negro slums.

It also was in line with board policy to integrate certain city schools where feasible.

New York has no legal segregation in its schools. But some schools, following the pattern of the neighborhoods they serve, are virtually all white or all Negro.

New York 'Liberals' Avoid Mixing In Flight To Private Education

Elsewhere on this page today appear excerpts from an article by Sam Pope Brewer in The New York Times. The Times reporter tells how middle class New Yorkers, including large numbers of educated persons with strong "liberal" sympathies, are attempting to segregate their children in private schools.

Though these New Yorkers assert they are without race prejudice, they say they do not want their children to associate with slum children. It happens that the slum children are Negroes and Puerto Ricans and that the middle class "liberal" New Yorkers are deliberately seeking an all-white environment.

We do not blame these New Yorkers for seeking recent environment for their youngsters. Like Southerners, they want their children to have good associations in school. We deplore the hypocrisy which causes New Yorkers to condemn racial separation in the South while seeking more of the same in the North.

If the New Yorkers base their actions on class rather than racial considerations, are they prepared to publicly support segregation by class instead of by race? That is not "democracy."

What of the Supreme Court's assertion that segregation is an evil because it has an adverse psychological effect on the colored children who are segregated? If this is true, New Yorkers who withdraw their youngsters from schools with large numbers of colored children are damaging the personalities of Negroes and Puerto Ricans. In the "liberal" view, this is inexcusable—for Southerners, at any rate.

The Times buried Mr. Brewer's lengthy account of the "liberal" dilemma on page 126 under a single column headline. But the facts are there. New Yorkers can put their high-powered consciences to work considering whether they are guilty, or whether they and Southerners are simply acting realistically.

While Mr. Brewer's article admits to the contradictions in the "liberal" position, the light has not penetrated The Times' ivory tower. In the same issue that told of efforts at segregation made by educated New Yorkers, a Times editorial lambasted the South for not having taken "the voluntary road to planning for desegregated schools."

We hope the editorial writers of The Times will start reading their own newspaper.

SCHOOL IN DISPUTE MAY BE REPLACED

Negroes' Reaction Mixed on New Rochelle Plan for Lincoln Structure

By MERRILL FOLSOM

Special to The New York Times.

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y., Dec. 1—The Board of Education here decided today to replace the outmoded Lincoln School with a spacious modern structure. Some Negroes objected to the plan and others endorsed it.

The school is on the edge of the business district in a neighborhood of Negroes, and 92 per cent of the Lincoln children are Negroes.

The objectors to the school said it had de facto segregation in violation of the 1954 decision of the United States Supreme Court. They wanted the school razed and the children transferred to schools elsewhere that are attended chiefly by white children.

In September the Lincoln School was picketed by the objectors. Many of the children were kept from classes and given private tutoring, but the boycott ended after two days.

On Sunday 400 persons at a meeting here of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People opposed a new Lincoln School. Roy Wilkins, national executive secretary of the organization, said rebuilding would perpetuate segregation.

Dr. Herbert C. Clish, Superintendent of Schools, asserted today that the school board wanted a fine structure for classes through the sixth grade. He noted that the present school, built in 1898 and enlarged in 1910, accommodated 500 children. The new building, he said, will be for only 400, with the district rearranged to send 100 to the Mayflower, Webster, Washington and Columbus Schools.

Lincoln School now has four acres and the school board will acquire additional property, Dr. Clish said.

He noted that the high schools here are fully integrated but that the lower schools are on a neighborhood plan, which the board wants to continue.

Dr. Clish and the board asserted that the 1954 Supreme Court decision was misunderstood by many residents. Although it banned enforced segregation, it did not require enforced integration by abnormal Procedures, the Superintendent declared.

A new Lincoln school is wanted by most of the Negro parents of Lincoln children, Dr. Clish added. The Parent-Teacher Association and its individual officers have repeatedly endorsed the plan, he said.

The vote of the school board today was 7 to 2. In the minority was Mrs. Frederick W. Pierce, the only Negro member.

Two years ago the voters defeated several school proposals including the spending of $1,516,000 for a new Lincoln School. The board's new plan must go to the voters if long-term bonds are to be issued.

The dispute over further integration of the city's schools flared again yesterday with picketing at City Hall and at Board of Education headquarters in Brooklyn.

At City Hall, 250 pickets marched in the rain, protesting the decision by Dr. John J. Theobald, Superintendent of Schools, to transfer 1,000 students, mostly Negroes and Puerto Ricans, out of the crowded schools in the Bedford-Stuyvesant section to less crowded areas of the city.

The pickets in Brooklyn were protesting a board plan that they said would foster segregation in the Crown Heights section.

Confer With Mayor

The pickets, carrying placards that read, "Don't Tread on Us," were from the Glendale-Ridgewood section of Queens. About 500 of the pupils who are being reassigned will attend five schools in this area. The remainder will be sent to six schools in Brooklyn.

Those shifted to Queens schools will attend Public Schools 68, 77, 81, 88 and 91. They will be transferred from Public Schools 26 and 129 in Bedford-Stuyvesant.

Representatives of the pickets and Queens Borough President John Clancy and Councilman George Schneider conferred with Mayor Wagner for thirty minutes on the transfer. The Mayor said he would get in touch with Dr. Theobald about the matter.

Eight Negro children and two Negro mothers counter-picketed at City Hall. They carried signs reading, "This Is New York, Not Little Rock." One of the mothers said, "We want to show our children and the Glendale mothers to let them see if they have anything to fear."

The Board of Education said yesterday that even after the transfers the Glendale section would have sixty-two unused classrooms. In the Bedford-Stuyvesant section there will be 337 classes in 237 rooms. The transferred pupils will be transported daily to their newly assigned schools by bus.

Another point at issue with the Glendale pickets was the transfer of Police Capt. Adrian P. Donohue out of the 104th Precinct in Glendale after he was reported to have taken part in a meeting protesting the school transfers. One of the placards the pickets carried read, "Don't Move Donohue, Move Theobald."

Representatives of the pickets said that Captain Donohue had not known the purpose of their meeting when he attended it.

Other groups in the city rallied to the support of Dr Theobald's decision to transfe the pupils.

Thirty-four social, civic, labo and religious agencies, affiliate with the Intergroup Committe on New York's Public Schools praised school officials f "standing firm despite racist community pressures."

They warned, however, "that potentially tense intergroup situation exists in Ridgewood and Glendale."

Mrs. Beverly Spiegel, presi-dent of the Queens Women's Di-vision of the American Jewish Congress, in a letter to Dr. Theobald, praised the transfer plan as a "giant step forward in the effort to provide equal educational facilities for all of the city's children."

Mrs. Spiegel said she repre-sented more than 1,000 house-wives of her organization and expressed "shock" at what she called the "narow, selfish atti-tude of certain segments of the population of Queens that op-pose the transfer plan."

Crown Heights Plan Scored

Meanwhile at the Board of Education offices at 110 Living-ston Street, Brooklyn, forty pickets marched before the en-trance, protesting a plan for the assignment of pupils in the Crown Heights section of Brooklyn.

The pickets, Negro and white, said that under the board plan a new school, P. S. 289, would become a segregated school and that P. S. 138, another school in the area, would be further seg-regated.

They said that under a zoning plan they had drawn up P. S. 289 would be opened as an inte-grated school and that over-crowding would be eliminated at P. S. 83, a predominantly Negro school in the area.

The pickets walked in on an open meeting of the Board of Education. They were told, how-ever, that their protest was not on the agenda and that they would be heard at the next reg-ular meeting of the board on July 23.

Another dispute in the educa-tional field appeared to be shap-ing up yesterday between the Board of Estimate and the Board of Education.

The school board had recom-mended that a new school in Harlem be situated at 131st Street and Seventh Avenue. A representative of the board told the Board of Estimate yester-day morning that the selection of any other site by them would be "illegal."

However at the urging of Manhattan Borough President Hulan E. Jack the Board of Es-timate selected a site at 126th Street and Seventh Avenue. The Board of Education said later that it would issue a statement tod[illegible] on its position in the [illegible]

N. Y. school picture is mixed"

NEW YORK — The gap be-tween theory and practice has put this city in the paradoxi-cal position of having a school integration program that could be a model for the nation — and also having more segrega-ed schools this year than last.

This contrast was spotlighted last week in a 57-page analysis of the system by the American Jewish Congress.

THE REPORT pointed out that in New York as in other northern cities where there is no segregation by law, there is "de facto" segregation.

This is caused primarily by restricted living areas where, as in the case of New York, colored and Puerto Rican fami-lies live in ghettoes.

Other factors causing such segregation are: gerrymander-ing of school district lines to ex-clude non-white pupils from certain schools; permitting par-ents to choose their childrens' schools; poor enforcement of school zoning regulations; loose transfer policies and locating schools in colored or white-only neighborhoods.

THE congress reported that "New York is the only city in the nation that has accepted the goal of eliminating school segregation as an integral part of the theory and practice of public schools" and developed a plan to create a system of mixed schools.

The only drawback is, the re-port said, is that the plan is being put into effect too slowly. This year there were 221 "spec-ial service schools" — those with an abnormally high per-centage of colored or Puerto Rican pupils.

Last year there were 213 and 8 years ago, there were only 134.

The report said that the chil-dren in these minority groups are "still receiving inferior and inadequate education be-cause the schools they attend are segregated in fact, with the poorest physical facilities and the lowest percentage of regularly licensed teachers."

THE STUDY urged a seven-point program to make the in-tegration plan effective. The program was first outlined by the board of educations com-mission on integration. The pro-gram is:

1. Re-evaluate the neighbor-hood school concept in light of the problem of segregation; 2. Re-zone districts where neces-sary; 3. Use the permissive transfer practice as an integra-tion means;

4. Transfer most experienced teachers to school where they are most needed; 5. Campaign for more funds, more construc-tion, more psychiatric, guid-ance and social services; 6. Build new schools in fringe areas; 7. Seek personnel able and willing to implement basic integration principles.

Shift of Harlem Pupils To Yorkville Weighed

Negroes, Puerto Ricans Involved; 'Boycott' Parents Lose in Court

By James J. Morisseau

The Board of Education an-nounced yesterday that it was considering the transfer of an undetermined number of Negro and Puerto Rican pupils into schools in the Yorkville section of Manhattan to relieve over-crowding in Harlem and East Harlem schools.

A similar decision last June resulted in a one-day boycott and other protests by white parents in the Ridgewood and Glendale sections of Queens over the transfer into their schools of 400 Negro and Puerto Rican children from over-crowded schools in the Bed-ford - Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn.

Court Decision

The board announcement said that the new transfers were being contemplated because some 5,000 Harlem and East Harlem elementary school pupils were on double sessions and receiving only four hours rather than the normal five hours of instruction a day.

Ironically, the announcement almost coincided with the hand-ing down of a decision in Su-preme Court, Manhattan, deny-ing the request of a group of Harlem parents to have their children transferred to pre-dominantly-white schools in the Inwood section of Manhattan or Riverdale in the Bronx.

Paul B. Zuber, attorney for the parents, had attempted to prove that the board was arbi-trary and capricious in refusing to permit the transfers while allowing a special class from Public School 129, in Harlem, to enroll at Junior High School 52, in Inwood.

Mr. Zuber also contended that his clients' children were refused permission to transfer because they were Negroes.

In denying the petition yes-terday for a show cause order, Justice Samuel M. Gold ruled that Mr. Zuber had proved neither of his contentions and that he was satisfied that the special class was unique, that it included more Negro than white children, and thus that it did not set a precedent for other transfers outside normal at-tendance zones.

Outside the courtroom, Jus-tice Gold commented that the case, subject to an all-day trial yesterday, was "much ado about nothing and should never have been brought to court."

He said he had heard the testimony of a series of board officials called by Mr. Zuber and that one of them, Dr. Francis A. Turner, assistant superintendent in charge of the board's Central Zoning Unit, was a Negro.

"I am sure," the judge com-mented, "that it would be only over his dead body that he (Dr. Turner) would permit any Negro child to be discriminated against."

Mr. Zuber announced that he would appeal the decision and the parents angrily pro-claimed that their children, who have been kept out of classes since school opened Sept. 14, would continue to boycott Junior High Schools 136 and 139 in Harlem—schools the parents contend are "seg-regated and inferior."

One mother said she had seven children in other Harlem schools and that she was going to take them all out of class. A father warned a board offi-cial not to send a truant officer to his home.

New Schools Opening

"If you're going to send any-one, make it a policeman."

Superintendant of Schools John J. Theobald said, in yesterday's announcement, that the severe loverorowding in the Harlem schools would be partly alleviated by the opening in February of the new P. S. 100 at 21 W. 138th St., and P. S. 198, at 96th St. and Lexington Ave.

The new schools, Dr. Theo-bald said, would accommodate 1,300 pupils and a survey was being conducted to determine how many other pupils could be transferred to under-utilized schools in the Yorkville area, which have about fifty empty classrooms.

A court action brought by the Queens residents seeking to set aside the transfer order is still pending.

NATIONAL GOVERNORS CONFERENCE

Collins Says Eisenhower Invites a Racial 'Catastrophe'

White House Is Accused of Failing to Act Positively in Desegregation Clash

By CLAUDE SITTON
Special to The New York Times

BILOXI, Miss., Feb. 23—Gov. LeRoy Collins declared in an interview today that President Eisenhower had failed to take positive action in the school desegregation controversy and that failure could lead to a national catastrophe.

The Florida Democrat, a moderate on the racial question, is here for a two-day meeting of the executive committee of the National Governors Conference. He is chairman of the group.

He is to discuss before the committee tomorrow a plan he offered in September for solving the desegregation issue. The committee is meeting in the Buena Vista Hotel primarily to lay the groundwork for the annual session of the conference, to be held in San Juan, P. R., Aug. 2-5. At today's committee session the highlights of the conference agenda were agreed upon.

Nine Governors Gathered

In the interview Governor Collins said that he did not intend to press the Governors here to take a stand on his plan, which calls for Congressional establishment of commissions in each to implement the 1954 Supreme Court ruling on desegregation. There are eight other Governors at the meeting.

Governor Collins declared that no period since he made public his plan "there's been no interest expressed by the Executive Branch of the Government."

"The whole plan presupposed participation by the Executive Branch, Congress and the Governors," he went on.

"The present Administration has indicated a willingness to let this problem take its natural course. I think this is dangerous. In fact, I think it would surely result in crises that well could develop into a catastrophe."

The other Governors here were hesitant to comment on the Collins program until they had heard his full explanation of it.

However, some of their aides expressed privately the view that, because of political realities peculiar to their states, they would avoid a stand on it. Northern Governors were represented as being reluctant to endorse even a temporary slowdown of desegregation and Southern Governors to feel that they could not openly advocate even token compliance.

Bill Ready for Congress

The announcement of his plan was made by Governor Collins at the Southern Governors Conference in Lexington, Ky. He has since prepared a bill for introduction in Congress.

The commissions he proposes would replace the Federal district courts in implementing desegregation. The commission members would be named by the President with the advice and concurrance of the Governors. Commission action would be subject to review by the courts, but primarily on legal questions.

Governor Collins said today that such bodies could consider social and psychological factors in determining the speed at which desegregation should proceed in any community. He added that they could ease the fear of massive integration in areas with heavy Negro populations. He ascribed to such a fear much of the South's opposition.

Gov. Robert B. Meyner, Democrat of New Jersey, offered this comment today on the Collins plan:

"I think he's got a pretty good thought in trying to set up conciliatory machinery. I would be for any method by which we could eliminate the conflict and present a more united front."

To come up at the committee meeting tomorrow is a proposal to have it make a tour of the Soviet Union. The majority appears to favor such a tour.

Tax Problems to Fore

A conference aide reported that there was virtual unanimity at today's executive session for making state tax and revenue problems the chief item of discussion at the San Juan conference.

All of the Governors here appeared concerned over the need for additional sources of revenue created by increasing demands for new and expanded state services.

"The problem of taxes," said Gov. William G. Stratton of Illinois, a Republican, "is the key to whether these services are performed at all or whether they are performed at the state or Federal level."

The San Juan conference will also have as subjects interstate highway needs, law enforcement problems and public welfare and relief.

One report to be made will deal with residence requirements for relief and the possibility of arranging reciprocity in the field among the states. Another will deal with highway safety.

President Eisenhower will be invited to make the principal dinner address at the San Juan conference.

'White Pupils Could Be Assigned to Negro Schools'

CHAPEL HILL—Citizens advocating integration in Chapel Hill public schools were warned here by a school board member, Henry L. Brandis Jr., who is also dean of the University of N. C. Law School, that integration could mean the assignment of white children to formerly all-Negro schools.

Dean Brandis made his remarks at a meeting of the Chapel Hill Fellowship on school integration at the United Congregational Christian Church to which the school board members had been invited to participate on a panel program.

The Fellowship had previously sent a list of 20 questions to each school board member as a basis for a "brief statement by each member of the panel." The questions implied that the law of the land had not been upheld because the school board had not taken the initiative in integrating the schools.

Instead of replying to the questions one by one, Dean Brandis submitted a statement defining his own position. He also invited the Fellowship members to "make concrete proposals for consideration of the school board and for discussion by the community."

Dan A. Okun, a member of the faculty of the University's School of Public Health, presided at the meeting. Those present were UNC faculty and townspeople, and about half Negro and half white.

In answer to a pointed question from the floor as to why the school board did not have an Integration Committee when it had a Building Committee and a Finance Committee, Chairman of the Board Grey Culbreth replied, "We feel that we need more finances and we feel that we need more school buildings, but we don't feel that we need integration."

Dr. Kempton Jones, a practicing physician here and member of the school board pleaded with the people to prepare a climate in which free discussion can take place and in which brotherhood and understanding and Christian cohesiveness can be developed.

Dr. Frank Williams, member of the Fellowship suggested that the "climate of accepting integration be explored." Mr. Stewart Willis, another Fellowship member on the panel, said that "We should be thinking in terms of these issues. We want to help in preparing a proper climate."

Robert Mann, a third Fellowship member on the panel, after hearing Dean Brandis's talk said that "I see that the school board is sympathetic. Most parents are satisfied with the schools their children are in. The Negroes would also be satisfied if they felt they need not be afraid that they would lose their jobs if they made a request for a transfer."

Vivian Foushee, a social worker and the only Negro Fellowship member of the panel, questioned Dean Brandis as to why he's implied that having white people attend Negro schools was undesirable.

Dean Brandis made reference to figures that were made public last year to the effect that in the Chapel Hill white schools over 75 per cent of the children ranked in the top 25 per cent of the nation in ability and accomplishment. The courses in the white schools are geared to this highly accelerated group.

Dean Brandis said, "As a member of the board, I am quite prepared to vote favorably upon the application of a Negro parent to transfer a child from one school to another when I think the application is meritorious without regard to the question of race.

He stated that to deny the Negro application "for any reason grounded upon the applicant's race would be a clear violation of the law of the land."

He further said, "We have had no application from white parents —either members or non-members of your organization—to transfer their children to Negro schools. In your questions . . . you ask why Negro parents have not made application. Presumably you are not in doubt as to why there have been none from the white parents. From this I would assume that you would not favor board action resulting in the selection of a few white children—whether yours or not—to be assigned to Negro schools."

Dean Brandis asked the integrationists where they would propose to draw geographical lines for assignment. "Would you favor sending half the students of each race to each high school?" he asked.

Hodges Sees No Need To Change Law

Free Public Schools Facing New Dangers In North Carolina

By United Press International

RALEIGH — Gov. Luther H. Hodges took a stand this week against a constitutional committee recommendation to do away with the requirement to operate a general and uniform public school system.

Hodges said he advised against such a recommendation last month when the committee was drafting its report. The recommendation was interpreted as a move to bolster the state's recent school laws passed in the face of the integration issue.

THE COMMITTEE'S recommendation has already drawn a protest from Dr. Charles Carroll, superintendent of public instruction.

"I have to look at it from a policy point of view rather than a legal," Hodges said. He told newsmen the attorney general had advised him there "is no overriding legal reason why this provision should be deleted from the Constitution."

HODGES SAID, "We should definitely retain the present constitutional provision for a general and uniform system of public schools" subject only to our present constitutional provision for local option whereby citizens at the local level can, in a popular election, make their choice with respect to the operation of the local public schools." That "present constitutional provision" was enacted shortly after the U. S. Supreme Court segregation decision.

Negroes' Boycott Continues

Parents Object To Separate Indian School

HALIFAX, N.C. (AP) — Negro parents, fearful that the shift of Indian pupils to a separate, state-supported school will block plans for a new Negro school, were asked Friday to end their boycott of the old school and help officials decide how much new classroom space is needed.

The Halifax County School Board, declaring that it is the people's duty to cooperate, asked that parents sign statements promising they'd send their children to the new school at Hollister.

Since Wednesday, total attendance at the Elementary School for Negroes in Hollister, about 20 miles of the county seat, has been less than a dozen. There are 337 pupils enrolled.

Vernon Lynch, president of the school's Parent-Teacher Assn., declared: "We accomplished nothing at Friday's meeting." He said he didn't know what other Negro parents would do, but that he would continue to keep his child home until something definite is decided on a new school.

75 PRESENT

About 75 Negro parents attended. Some 10 said they'd help circulate the petitions before Monday's regular school board meeting.

Negro leaders have made it plain they don't like the fact that people of the area who call themselves Haliwa Indians have persuaded the state to support their own school, just across the line in Warren County.

The Haliwas, who had operated their school privately, are getting state help under segregation laws because they object to going to school with Negroes. The Haliwa School enrollment is 269.

FEAR AID LOSS

The Negro leaders fear that loss of the Haliwa enrollment will cost them the new school—to be paid for with funds approved in a 3 million dollar bond issue in 1957.

"If the school board bases assignments on skin color," declares Principal D. D. Thorn of the Hollister school, "three-fourths of the Hollister student body could pass as Haliwas."

One old Negro man asked the board Friday, "If we called ourselves Highlanders or Eskimos, would you give us a private school?" The board chuckled at this sally, but made no reply.

Haliwa Indians Win School Fight

RALEIGH, (N.C.) (AP) — North Carolina's Haliwa Indians, outspokenly opposed to sending their children to school with Negroes, Wednesday won a two-year fight for their own segregated school.

The school, built by the Haliwas and operated with private funds, was made part of the Warren County public school system. The action makes it eligible for state support.

The school was constructed after the tribe objected to sending its children to classes with Negroes.

The Indians sought to have the school approved as a private institution. They asked for state grants. The state, however, ruled last year that the building failed to meet minimum requirements. The state gave the Indians time to bring the school up to par.

State aid was assured Wednesday when the Warren County Education Board designated the school as part of the county's public school system.

Caroll For Free Public Instruction

Group Would Drop State Provision For Education

RALEIGH — (UPI) — State Supt. of Public Instruction Charles F. Carroll opposes elimination of the constitutional provision for the operation of a "general and uniform" system of public schools.

A study group has recommended that the "general and uniform" provision be deleted in a move to peg constitutional requirements along lines of the Pearsall Plan.

THE PEARSALL Plan provides for state tuition grants and local option elections on school closing in the "face of intolerable situations" such as racial integration.

Carroll said that when and if the local option provisions become operative it is "obvious" that some of the uniformity will have to be reduced.

HOWEVER, Carroll felt the clause provides "something of a guarantee of educational opportunity for all children and youth—something symbolic of our noblest aspirations as a people."

Two Charlotte Negroes To Go to White School

CHARLOTTE (UPI)—The Charlotte School Board met in a special session Thursday to assign a second Negro pupil to a predominantly white school here.

The meeting, which lasted six minutes, came a few hours after the board had cut its "limited integration" program to the bone by assigning only one Negro to a mostly-white school. Four Negroes had attended such schools during the current school year.

Board Member Richard Brown said, following the day's second meeting, that the reassignment of Delores (Fanny) Watterman to the new Garinger High School was the result of new information handed to the board.

Expressed Preference.

He said that, at the time of the original assignments, which drew a blast from State NAACP President Kelly Alexander, the board did not know that the Watterman girl and other pupils at Central High School, which will close this year, had been allowed to express a preference as to the school they will attend next year.

The board originally had directed only one Negro, Nathaniel Abraham, to attend a white school next year. A third Negro who attended a white school this year, Girvaud Roberts, was reassigned from Piedmont School to the 10th grade at Second Ward. His brother, Gustavus, the fourth Negro attending a white school here this year, is scheduled to graduate from Central High next week.

Alexander said, "this is to the West Side. The current redevelopment program will, if the Negro citizenry is not cautious, in the next 10 years have all Negroes living long distances from white schools."

This would mean that "Again, the segregated school system will be on its way to perpetuation," said Alexander.

The Negro leader did not say what his organization's plans were, but he did say that "An expanded desegregation of the public schools rests squarely on the shoulders of Negro parents. The law is clear as to their rights, and they have the opportunity to exercise those rights under the Supreme Court decisions in public education and the North Carolina Pupil Assignment law."

At least one school board member indicated he believed the Negroes would go after more integration of schools here for the coming school year. Richard Brown predicted there would be "a number" of Negroes applying for reassignment to white and mostly-white schools before the next school year begins.

7 Negro Students To Be Admitted To N. C. School

CHARLOTTE, N. C. (ANP) — Two Negro students will be admitted to the white schools in North Carolina next year.

The Charlotte city school board assigned the students to the white schools during two special sessions May 28. One of the assignments rescinded action taken at the first session earlier in the day.

The students involved, Nathaniel Abraham, a seventh grader, was assigned to the same white junior high school he attended this year.

Fannie Waterman, a student at Central High this year, was assigned to a new white high school, Garinger High. Miss Waterman asked assignment to Garinger when she and other students at Central were given information forms on which to list the new school of their choice. Garinger is being built to replace the Central school.

During earlier sessions, school board members had assigned her to the Second Ward high, a Negro school, but at the second session, the board apparently took into consideration that students at Central were given assurance they would be allowed to attend the school of their choice when they filled out the assignment information.

Dr. Frank Graham Says N. C. Would Integrate Before Closing Its Schools

SAILSBURY (AP) — Dr. Frank P. Graham said here Wednesday if the choice is left to the people, North Carolina will vote to integrate its schools rather than close them over the race issue.

Dr. Graham, former president of the University of North Carolina and long-time Mideast mediator for the United Nations, spoke to a graduating class of 76 at Livingstone College here.

Honorary degrees were awarded the Rev. R. H. Collins Lee, pastor of the Metropolitan Wesley A. M. E. Zion Church in Washington; the Rev. Ben J. Robinson, pastor of the Mother A. M. E. Zion Church in New York City; and Dr. William L. Wall, of West Virginia College Institute.

Dr. Graham said that if there ever is a choice between ending public education or integrating the schools in North Carolina, "the people will vote to keep their public schools in obedience of the law of the land."

While his address was primarily on the role of the U. N. in the maintenance of world peace, Dr. Graham touched on the race issue several times.

At one point, he said the Rev. Martin Luther King, Negro leader of Montgomery, Ala., "had the answer of our time... not hate and violence, but love and non-violence. The cross which he holds high will in time triumph over the crosses lighted with the hot oil of privilege and preiddice."

N. C. Negroes Ask School Integration

SNOW HILL, N.C. (AP)—Five months ago, the Negro school children of agricultural Greene County went on strike for better schools. The leaders of the strike, which ended, apparently satisfactorily, after four days said racial integration was not an issue.

Now the county Board of Education has received five applications for transfer of Negro pupils to the all-white high school in Walstonburg. Each of the applications declares opposition to segregated schools. Parents of four of the children were leaders of the February boycott.

"Integration is the law of the land, according to the decision of the U.S. Supreme Court," declared Mrs. Dora Farmer, president of the Greene County Negro Parent-Teacher Assn., on Tuesday.

She asked the board in an application brought up Monday to transfer her sons, Jonathan David Farmer, 18, and Edgar Lee Farmer, 16, to the white school.

Other children who asked transfer were Moses Nathaniel Forbes, 14, and Demetrice Forbes, 18, sons of Moses and Beatrice Forbes; and John Moses Becton, 15, son of Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Edwards. All live on Rt. 2, Stantonsburg.

The board deferred action on the applications until its Aug. 3 meeting.

The elder Moses Forbes said he wanted the transfer even if Negro schools are improved. The applications said the children live closer to the Walstonburg school than to Negro schools and that educational facilities are better at the white school.

In February the county's 2,800 Negro students stayed away from classes four days in a quiet demonstration for better facilities. It ended when the board of education promised it would continue to press for an early bond vote for that purpose.

Pupils At Integrated School Seek Admissions Elsewhere

GREENSBORO, N. C. (AP) — More than half of the parents of children assigned next semester to the integrated Caldwell School here have applied for reassignments to other schools. A few Negro parents whose children were assigned to Caldwell School also have asked for reassignment.

Two Negro children assigned for the next term to Dudley High School, have applied for admittance to the currently all-white Greensboro Senior High School.

These disclosures were made Tuesday by city school Supt. P. J. Weaver, who said that additional applications were expected to arrive.

The Greensboro school board in May decided to merge the previously all-white Caldwell School and the previously all-negro Person Street School, situated on the same campus. Weaver estimated that about 250 white and 220 Negro children are now assigned to Caldwell School.

If even a few of the white pupils remain at Caldwell it will create a situation unique in this section—a predominantly Negro school attended by a handful of white children.

Token integration has been in force here since the 1957-58 school year when five Negro pupils were admitted to Gillespie Park School and one Negro girl was admitted to Greensboro Senior High School.

Monday was the deadline for applying for transfer within the Guilford County School System, but Asst. Supt. E. P. Pearce Jr., said no Negroes had applied to transfer to white schools.

Greensboro Board Gets Pupil Pleas

GREENSBORO (AP) — More than half of the parents of white children assigned next semester to the integrated Caldwell school have applied for reassignments to other schools. A few Negro parents whose children were assigned to Caldwell school also have asked for reassignment.

Two Negro children, assigned for the next term to Dudley High School, have applied for admittance to the currently all-white Greensboro Senior High School.

These disclosures were made Tuesday by Greensboro School Supt. P. J. Weaver, who said that additional applications were expected to arrive.

Merger Considered.

The Greensboro School Board in May decided to merge the previously all-white Caldwell school and the previously all-Negro Pearson Street building of Washington Schools, situated on the same campus. Weaver estimated that about 250 white and 220 Negro children are now assigned to Caldwell school.

If even a few of the white pupils remain at Caldwell it will create a situation unique in this section — a predominantly Negro school attended by a handful of white children.

North Carolina Board Won't Accept Transfers

Attorneys for 23 Negro children applying for admission to all-white schools in Yancey County, N. C., told the school board Wednesday they will not accept transfers to schools elsewhere nor a new Negro school in lieu of integration.

There are no Negro schools in mountainous Yancey County where the Negro population is relatively light. A small Negro school located at Burnsville, N. C., was condemned last year and its pupils attended a Negro school in Ashville, 40 miles away, riding back and forth on a school bus each day.

County officials said an offer to build a new Negro school last year was rejected.

Negro attorney Ruben Daley, representing 23 of 27 Negro pupils who have applied for admission to the white elementary and high schools at Burnsville, said Yancey County "had been promising for 10 years to build a Negro school." He said it would be impossible" to build a school to accommodate pupils in all secondary grades prior to school opening.

Yancey School Supt. H. P. Justice said "no decision" had been reached on the applications by the Negroes for admission to white schools. He said schools in the county "probably" will open Nov. 27.

In Nashville, Tenn., Southern School News reported Wednesday that six public school districts in the South will begin desegregation programs this fall and 12 others will expand existing desegregation plans.

The publication, published by the Southern Education Reporting Service, listed among districts beginning integration Dade County (Miami) Fla., Craven County, N. C., Charlottesville, Va., and Alluwe, Okla.

Supreme Court Rule Disappointing

NEW YORK — Action of the United States Supreme Court in refusing to review two North Carolina cases challenging the constitutionality of the state's pupil placement law is deplored by the National Association of the Advancement of Colored People.

The Association's Board of Directors adopted a resolution at its regular monthly meeting here on Oct. 13, expressing regret that the Court on Oct. 12 rejected petitions for review of the cases.

The North Carolina statutes, like those of other states," the resolution asserts, "is designed to impede and frustrate full implementation of the Supreme Court's decision outlawing racial segregation in public education."

In addition to North Carolina, such laws have been passed in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Louisiana, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

"In administering these laws, the school boards make no effort to desegregate the school system, but reluctantly approve the transfer of a few Negro pupils out of the segregated schools," the resolution points out. "This latest court action encourages this process and relieves school boards of their constitutional obligation to initiate steps to desegregate with 'all deliberate speed.'"

OBLIGATION IMPOSED

"However," the Board asserts, "it need not mean the end of the public school desegregation process, but to a significant degree the court's action shifts the burden from the school authorities to Negro parents. It imposes upon them the obligation to take positive steps to see that their children are enrolled in schools of their choice. The school boards are merely required to provide a means through which parents desiring to remove their children from inferior Jim Crow institutions may enroll them in non-segregated schools.

Further, the Supreme Court's refusal to review the cases imposes upon local branches of the NAACP the duty to encourage a large number of parents to request transfers. The advantages of non-segregated education must be made clear to parents through an intensive educational program. In areas where the segregated pattern still prevails this should be the primary task of the NAACP branch.

Race Suit Dismissal Is Sought

School Affected At Greensboro Now All-Negro

GREENSBORO (AP) — The Greensboro School Board moved Friday for dismissal of a federal court school integration suit and asked for a hearing of the motion Oct. 27.

The suit was filed earlier this year by the parents of four Negro children seeking to enter a then-white, now-Negro school.

In an affidavit accompanying the school board motion, Supt. of Schools P. J. Weaver said that the children have now been assigned to the school they wished to attend.

The suit for Valarie, Eric and Thetus McCoy and Michael A. Tonkins asked for transfers from the Pearson Street Annex of the Washington School (Negro) to the David Caldwell School (predominantly white) next door.

The school board, in May, assigned all but Thetus McCoy to Caldwell, but transferred all white children from that school. Thetus McCoy was assigned to Lincoln Junior High School (Negro) because Caldwell has no seventh grade.

Editor Lauds South For Mix Resistance

CHARLOTTE, N.C. (AP) — A South Carolina editor said here the South has been remarkably effective in its resistance to pressure for school integration.

And Thomas R. Waring, editor of the Charleston News & Courier, said "the pressures have been terrific."

Waring has long been a champion of separate schools for the races and is considered an authority on the South's anti-integration stand.

He said several southern states —notably North Carolina, Virginia and Arkansas—have started token integration of schools. But he said this is a serious mistake, "lest token integration turn into massive mixing."

The Charleston editor said pupil placement laws have given encouragement to many Southerners to believe that massive integration thus has been abated.

"But placement laws imply some degree of mixing. How long the courts will let integration be limited to the variety called token remains to be seen." Waring said in his prepared text for a civic club luncheon.

Waring lauded the rigid resistance of many southern states—including South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana—which have not admitted Negroes to white public schools.

He hit at what he called the paper curtain separating the North from the South where racial news is concerned.

He said he had made several trips into the North to explain the South's objections to compulsory integration, and had encountered misunderstanding and hostility.

"It is so difficult to get a hearing in the northern press that I have said repeatedly that a paper curtain hangs across the Mason-Dixon Line.

"Dangerous effects of mass integration are showing in the North. Through holes in the paper curtain, the country is beginning to get a peek at racial jungles that have grown up in the great cities of the nation. Carefully concealed race crime and other problems are coming to light in the North, Midwest and on the West Coast."

NEGRO STUDENTS SUE

27 Are Seeking Admission to Carolina White Schools

Special to The New York Times.

ASHEVILLE, N. C., Nov. 11— A suit to compel the admission of twenty-seven Negro students to all-white schools in Yancey County was filed in United States District Court here today.

The suit asks for a temporary order restraining the Yancey County Board of Education and School Superintendent Hubert D. Justice from denying the plaintiffs admission to the East Yancey, Cane River Schools and the Burnsville Elementary School.

There are no schools for Negroes in Yancey and the Board of Education has been assigning Negro secondary and elementary school students to Asheville Negro schools, forty miles away.

Since September, however, the Negro students have been attending private classes.

Chapel Hill Board Member Sees School Integration Next Sept.

The News and Observer
Raleigh, N. C.

CHAPEL HILL — A member of the Chapel Hill Board of Education this week said she thinks there will be integration in Chapel Hill schools next September.

"I'm just speaking for myself, not for the school board," Mrs. Marvin said during a panel discussion on school intergration sponsored by the League of Women Voters. Fri. 10-23-59.

The discussion was public and included on the panel Mrs. Allen, who is chairman of the School Board's Policy Committee; the Rev. Wesley Shrader, pastor of the University Baptist Church; Joseph Himes, professor at North Carolina College; Dr. George Taylor, a leader in the Chapel Hill PTA; and UNC Sociologist Ernest Campbell. P. 10

The panel discussed the School Board's plan to begin integration in Chapel Hill next year on the first grade level.

Speaking for herself and the School Board, Mrs. Allen said, "I think the outcome of an application to the School Board for pupil reassignment ought to be more predictable than it might be in other communities. I do not think such an application should become a matching of wits between the School Board and the applicant. . . . The decision to begin on the first grade level came because six-year-olds are not too aware of facial differences and that age level would lay a good groundwork for later years.

Prof. Himes said he thought the new integration policy was inadequat for three reasons. "I don't think it meets the needs of students who are already disadvantaged under the present policy," he said. "I do not think the new policy fulfills Chapel Hill's promise as a liberal community. The policy doesn't provide a constructive approach to the issue on the initiative of the School Board."

Dr. Campbell, the sociologist said differences in achievement and intelligence tests between white and Negro students do exist.

"Some people think the reason for the low performance of the Negroes is not a function of the school system, but the result of the Negro's realization that he is a Negro and the consequent feeling of inferiority," he said.

27 Students Seeking Relief Through US District Court

ASHEVILLE (UPI) — An attorney for a group of Yancey County colored pupils filed suit in U. S. Western District Court last week to force the County Board of Education to admit them to schools nearer their homes in Burnsville.

Ruben J. Dailey of Asheville filed the suit with the Clerk of Court here.

The children have been seeking transfer to the county's white schools since the lone colored school at Burnsville was condemned and closed last year.

THE COUNTY Board of Education last year assigned them to colored public schools here and made arrangements for them to attend the same schools this year.

The students and their parents, however, objected to the daily 80-mile round trip and asked for transfer to white schools under the state's Pupil Assignment Act. The board rejected their requests following a hearing last summer.

A BI-RACIAL group of citizens of Yancey and Buncombe counties formed an organization to arrange for private schooling for the children. The seven high school students now attend a private school here and live in Asheville during the school week. The 20 elementary school students attend classes in the basement of a Negro church at Burnsville.

DAILEY SAID all 27 pupils would be plaintiffs in the case and it would also serve as "a class action for any other pupils there."

Dailey said there was no other choice but to file the suit.

"I've done everything. I've exhausted all prayers," he said. "We're helpless and only the courts can help now."

14d(1) 1959 NORTH CAROLINA

Desegregation Suits Set For Trial In N. C.

DURHAM (AP) — Two Durham Negro mothers will go into open court next [illegible] attempt to blow the safety valves off North Carolina's policy of limited integration of public schools.

The two women, acting for their minor daughters, have already launched a direct assault on "the legislative and administrative design of the State of North Carolina. . . as expressed in legislative and administrative enactments. . .to maintain the public systems of Durham and the State of North Carolina on a racially segregated basis. . ."

The suit, filed in U. S. Middle District Court in Greensboro May 21, 1958, Mrs. Evelyn McKissick and Mrs. Rachel Richardson asked that the Durham and State boards of education "promptly present a plan for desegregation."

The suit, labeled a "master suit" aimed at the Pearsall Plan and the Pupil Assignment Act, will be tried before Judge Edwin M. Stanley of Greensboro.

Pre-trial skirmishing has been completed and both parties claim they have agreed to all points they can without hurting their chances of winning the case.

Segregation Issue In Greene

SNOW HILL (AP)—Five months ago the Negro school children of agricultural Greene County went on strike for better schools. The leaders of the strike, which ended, apparently satisfactorily, after four days said racial integregation was not an issue.

Now the county Board of Education has received five applications for transfer of Negro pupils to the all-white high school in Walstonburg. Each of the applications declares opposition to segregated schools. Parents of four of the children were leaders of the February boycott.

"Integration is the law of the land, according to the decision of the U.S. Supreme Court," declared Mrs. Dora Farmer, president of the Greene County Negro Parent-Teacher Assn., on Tuesday.

She asked the board in an application brought up Monday to transfer her sons, Jonathan David Farmer, 18, and Edgar Lee Farmer, 16, to the white school.

Other children who asked transfer were Moses Nathaniel Forbes 14, and Demetrice Forbes, 18, sons of Moses and Beatrice Forbes; and John Moses Becton, 15, son of Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Edwards. All live on Rt. 2, Stantonsburg.

The board deferred action on the applications until its Aug. 3 meeting.

The elder Moses Forbes said he wanted the transfer even if Negro schools are improved. The applications said the children live closer to the Walstonburg school than to Negro schools and that educational facilities are better at the white school.

In February the county's 2,800 Negro students stayed away from classes four days in a quiet demonstration for better facilities. It ended when the board of education promised it would continue to press for an early bond vote for that purpose.

The Legislature recently passed an act allowing the board to apply for a $250,000 loan from the State Literary Fund. Of that money, $170,000 would go for work on the Greene County Training School, a consolidated high school for Negroes, and $80,000 for the West Greene Negro Elementary School. The attorney general's office must approve the loan.

At the time of the boycott, Forbes was shouted down when he suggested at a meeting of Negro parents that they consult with officials of the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People. Mrs. Farmer said then that the NAACP had "nothing to do with this."

Two of the five transfer applications were handled by a Durham lawyer, C. O. Pearson, who is state counsel for the NAACP. He said he was asked to do so to make sure the applications conform with the law.

"The NAACP has not been asked to help," said Pearson. "But it would do so should the parents need financial assistance."

He added that he does not know if more reassignment applications will be submitted before the deadline July 14.

Durham Gets New Call For School Integration

DURHAM — (UPI) — The city board of education was asked for the second time within a month Wednesday night to integrate public schools in Durham.

A group of clergymen, educators and businessmen strongly protested to the board against the use of a white "hand-me-down" school to relieve crowded Negro enrollment.

THE BOARD has proposed to reopen the Old Morehead school in September as a colored elementary school.

The group said the proposal was objectionable because of its "psychological factors" and the "structural unsoundness" of the building. A final decision in the matter is expected at the board's regular monthly meeting Monday night.

SOME 70 colored citizens appeared at the April meeting of the board to protest use of the Morehead school and called for the city to voluntarily integrate its schools to avoid further court action. A suit seeking immediate integration of schools is pending in federal court.

Five Negro Pupils Seek Reassignment In Greene

SNOW HILL (UPI)—Five Negro youths asked Monday to be reassigned from Greene County Negro schools which were the scene of a week-long strike last winter to all-white schools closer to their homes.

The petitions were submitted at the County Board of Education meeting Monday, a week in advance of the July 14 deadline for reassignment requests. The board delayed action until its August meeting. There were indications that more applications would be submitted.

The requests were the first in this predominantly rural county. There have been only a few integration requests in the Eastern part of the State and only Goldsboro, site of Seymour Johnson Air Force Base, has cracked racial barriers in its classrooms. One Negro youth has been admitted to a school used exclusively for children of servicemen.

All Schools.

The five requests here also asked that segregation be discontinued in all schools in the county.

Included in the petitioning group were sons of Dora Mae Farmer, president of the county Negro Parent-Teacher Association who was a leader in the strike for better educational facilities last February.

Some 2,900 Greene County Negro students went on strike for a week, but returned to school after the PTA leaders and board members worked out a settlement. It was based on a board promise to continue efforts to improve Negro facilities.

Jonathan David Farmer, Edgar Lee Farmer and Demetrice Forbes asked for assignment to a white high school at Walstonburg instead of the county's only Negro high school, the Greene County Training School. Nathanial Forbes and John Becton requested reassignment from the North Greene Elementary School to the Walstonburg School.

Recently, the board has approved plans for a new gymnasium-auditorium at the training school. The county also received a $250,000 loan from the State literary fund to improve white and Negro schools.

Major complaints in the strike included lack of a gymnasium for the 495 Negro high school sudents and inadequate cafeteria. They also pressed the need for an auditorium.

County Negro leaders have met several times since the strike and emphasized they did not want integration. But they indicated they would seek to break down racial barriers if they were not able to get equal facilities.

50 VIRGINIA NEGROES IN CAROLINA SCHOOL

KITTRELL, N. C., Sept. 22 (UPI)—Fifty Negroes left without schools in Prince Edward County, Va., have enrolled in private classes here.

Officials of Kittrell Junior College for Negroes said the fifty are attending classes in the high school department.

The officials said they had applications from twenty-five to thirty more students from Prince Edward County, and these were expected to enroll next week. The college is operated by the African Methodist Church and has a 316-acre campus.

Prince Edward County abolished public schools this year in the face of court orders to integrate.

ST. LOUIS, Sept. 22 (AP)—A court ruling clearing the way for the immediate opening of schools in the Dollarway district near Pine Bluff, Ark., on a segregated basis went into effect Tuesday.

The Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals turned down a motion by three Negro pupils that the mandate be delaped until the Supreme Court could be asked to review the case.

Fire Damages School Here

Flames last night swept through one end of Oberlin Road School, causing thousands of dollars worth of damages before being extinguished by the Raleigh Fire Department.

Fire Chief Jack Keeter said the fire apparently began on a hall floor and spread between the ceilings and walls to two adjoining classrooms.

Keeter said he would investigate the possibility of arson in connection with the fire, which was reported at 7:12 p.m. He said there was evidence that workmen had been cleaning the floors in the fire area.

Three pumper trucks, two truck companies and the rescue unit rushed to the scene while telephone calls flooded the Fire Station switchboard as smoke blanketed the neighborhood.

Old School.

Oberlin, one of Raleigh's older Negro elementary schools, is located between Cameron Village and the Oberlin Road-Wade Avenue overpass.

Wall paper and paint peeled off the walls and ceilings over a big portion of the first floor area. Keeter said this was caused by extensive heat.

One fireman reported a can of opened cleaning fluid had been found near the origin of the fire.

Keeter said he had not made an estimate on damages. About 40 firemen extinguished the blaze in less than 30 minutes.

Hundreds of automobiles, loaded mostly with sight-seers, flocked to the area but were kept moving by fire and police officers assigned to the scene.

Gasoline Blaze.

It was the second trip of the day for Raleigh firemen to a blaze which could have done tremendous damage.

About 6 p.m., they rushed to the Wake U-Drive-It establishment at McDowell and Lane streets where fire threatened an underground gasoline storage tank.

A truck had knocked over a pump assembly and tore its pipes and electrical wiring from the ground, firemen reported. The storage tank is used by Wake U-Drive-It to fuel its own fleet of vehicles.

Fire Captain L. G. Godwin said an attendant reported the storage tank had recently been filled. This fact lessened the chance of an explosion, Godwin said.

Firemen rushed the blaze with high pressure "fog" and extinguished it before a nearby tool shed could catch fire.

North Carolina Schools Quiet As Integration Starts

By United Press International

Five Negroes—four girls and a boy—entered white public schools in Durham, N. C., for the first time Wednesday. There were no crowds, no incidents and no police.

The scene was just as quiet at Winston-Salem, N. C., where seven Negro students began the city's third year of limited integration.

The Durham school board assigned eight Negroes to previously all-white Durham high school and three white junior high schools. But two of them moved into another area and were assigned to a Negro school. The parents of the two boys, Amos and Sylvester Williams, said they planned to move back into the white East Durham Junior high school district.

Larry Scurlock, another Negro assigned to Durham high, did not show up. Relatives said he was late coming home from a summer job in New Jersey and would enroll later.

Claudette Brame, accompanied by her mother and a friend, slipped through a side door at Durham high and registered for classes. She was largely ignored by white students. The same silent treatment was accorded Anita Brame and Lucy Jones at Brodgon Junior high school and Andre McKissick and Henry Vickers at Carr Junior high.

There were no crowds outside the schools and no police officers on the campuses. Occasionally, a police patrol car would cruise by the schools. Mayor E. J. Evans had said that the "high caliber" of leadership of both races in Durham would "assure proper acceptance" of the program.

At Winston-Salem, six Negroes attended Easton elementary school and one Negro enrolled at Rynolds high school.

No incidents occurred Tuesday at Arlington, Va., and High Point, N. C. where Negroes attended previously all-white and predominately white schools.

Several other North Carolina schools opened Tuesday to integrated classes without incident.

Other Virginia cities are to integrate next Tuesday when most other southern public schools open.

One exception is the Dollarway school district in Arkansas, which postponed its opening next Tuesday until September 21 to await the results of a hearing before the U. S. Court of Appeals at St. Louis. The Dollarway district is seeking to stay a federal district court's order to integrate three Negroes in a white high school.

Litigation was rampant in Virginia, where Negroes are petitioning boards, courts and officials for more integration.

One unusual highlight was the refusal of 77 Negro students to attend a Negro school at Port Tampa, Fla. The school had been erected for Negroes when they sought to integrate the white elementary school. But Tuesday they refused to attend the new four-room Negro school and picketed the building.

Nashville, Tenn., quietly integrated the third grade when 36 Negro students enrolled in previously all-white schools. Nashville's grade-a-year integration plan is being eyed closely by officials in Atlanta and New Orleans which are under court orders to provide a desegregation plan late this year and early next year. All Nashville grades will be integrated by 1968.

Board To Study Negro Applicants

SNOW HILL, N. C. (AP)—The Greene County School Board is scheduled to meet Friday to consider further requests by five Negro students seeking admission to white schools.

Board attorney Walter G. Sheppard said a decision on the application could be expected. The board twice before has considered the transfer requests, but deferred action in order to gain more information from the Negro youths and their parents.

The Negroes applied for admission to a white school at Walstonburg. They said the Walstonburg school is nearer their homes and has better facilities than the Negro school at Snow Hill.

Negro students staged a school boycott in the county in February in an appeal for improved facilities. The school board ended the walkout when it promised to try to improve the county's Negro schools.

Mrs. Dora May Farmer, a leader in the boycott, is the mother of two of the five children asking admission to white schools.

NEGROES SEEK SCHOOL ENTRY

ASHEVILLE, N. C. (AP) — Twenty-seven Yancey county Negro children brought suit in US district court here Wednesday, asking admission to three white public schools in that county.

The suit, brought by John B. Griffith, by his parents and next friend, contends Yancey county schools are segregated on the basis of race and that Yancey Negroes have been denied admission.

The suit seeks a temporary order restraining the Yancey board of education and the Yancey superintendent of schools from denying plaintiffs admission to East Yancey and Cane River High schools and Burnsville Elementary school.

Defendants are J. L. Robinson, Philip Westall, B. B. Penland, and C. Rex McIntosh, member of the board of education; and Hubert D. Justice, superintendent of schools.

The complaint contends that early in June the plaintiffs, who were assigned to Negro schools in Asheville last year, asked for reassignment to Yancey white schools. Yancey has no Negro school.

On Aug. 10 the Negro children were assigned again to Asheville schools. A new request for reassignment was made on Aug. 12 and rejected by the board Aug. 21.

Negroes Lose School Case

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court today refused to review a decision that Negroes seeking admission to North Carolina white schools must use state administrative remedies before asking help of federal courts.

The decision was given by the U.S. 4th Circuit Court in Richmond in litigation brought on behalf of Joseph Hiram Holt Jr., 15, a Negro of Raleigh.

In other actions bearing on the school integration issue, the high court:

1. Declined to rule on a Negro demand that a North Carolina school board promptly set up a plan to speed race integration.

2. Refused to review a desegregation decision that resulted in Prince Edward County, Va., cutting of all money for its schools.

3. Denied a review of an order prohibiting the Norfolk Va., City Council from cutting off public school funds.

Some issues dead—

Suit to continue as schools merge

GREENSBORO, N. C., May 28—(AP)—A Negro attorney says the merger of a white school and a Negro school here will invalidate some of the issues in a desegregation suit against the Greensboro Board of Education.

But the lawyer, Kenneth Lee, says the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People will continue its suit to enjoin the board from operating what he calls a segregated school system.

Parents of four children now attending Pearson Street (Negro) School, sued to have their children admitted to the all-white Caldwell School.

THE SCHOOLS are located side by side, and the school board announced Tuesday the schools would become a single unit at the end of the current school term.

There are about 220 pupils at the Negro school and 300 at Caldwell. The board said the Negro pupils will be assigned to Caldwell School next year. Indications are that the white children currently attending Caldwell will be reassigned to it.

But School Supt. P. J. Weaver commented, "We don't know just how things will work out or who will be assigned where. We will make up the assignments this Summer. . . ."

Lee said one of the charges in the desegregation suit was that the board had a practice of assigning white and Negro children to different schools solely on the basis of race.

ANOTHER, he said, was that there can be no segregation within a campus, or in this case, within the same school grounds.

"Both those issues have been invalidated—or will be if the consolidation has been carried out in good faith," Lee said.

He said another suit involving another school was not affected by the consolidation.

Weaver said the board voted to consolidate the schools because enrollment is increasing at the Pearson Street School and dropping at the white school. The superintendent said the desegregation suit was not a factor in the decision to merge the schools.

He said both buildings will be used in the new operation.

Greensboro and two other North Carolina cities, Charlotte and Winston-Salem, have had token integration for the past two years. A total of 11 Negro students have attended previously all-white schools in the three cities during the two years.

NEGRO SCHOOL OPENS IN CHURCH BASEMENT

BURNSVILLE, N. C., Sept. 21 (UPI) — Eighteen Negro pupils enjoy admission to white public schools began classes today in a dimly lighted church basement.

Two stoves and three tables were the only furnishings in the makeshift private school set up at Griffith Chapel, Methodist Church. A pot-bellied stove in the corner furnished heat.

Seven Negro high school students, also involved in an unsuccessful integration effort here, went to Allen High School, a Methodist-operated institution for Negroes at Asheville, forty miles away.

These students will live in Asheville instead of making a round trip from their homes here each day.

Yancey County's only Negro public school was closed last year and the children were assigned to Negro schools in Asheville.

The Yancey County Board of Education also made arrangements for them to attend the same schools this year, but the children objected to the eighty-mile daily round trip.

They applied for admission to the white school here but the school board rejected the applications.

The case is expected to go into the courts.

Peaceful Integration Is Started In North Carolina And Virginia

FROM PRESS REPORTS

RICHMOND, Sept. 1 — Virginia and North Carolina quietly admitted a few more Negroes to predominantly white schools today without a trace of trouble.

Only a scrawled sign reading "go home nigger" at the entrance to a drive leading to a fashionable school in High Point, N. C. marred the start of peaceful integration in the two states.

Extra police were assigned to keep order, but their only job was to watch a few curious spectators and keep traffic moving around the schools.

16 Negroes Enter

Sixteen Negroes entered three previously white schools in Arlington, Va. Two sisters were escorted through a side door of a junior-senior high school at High Point, N. C., and more than a dozen others sat down in classes School Board received 51 requests to enter white schools from Negro students.

—The opening of a Dollarway School District white high school in Pine Bluff, Ark., where three Negroes are seeking admittance, was postponed until after Sept. 21.

—The Atlanta school board asked the clerk of Federal Court for documents that will be used in the board's appeal of a school desegregation order. The board had been ordered to submit a desegregation plan by Dec. 1.

Nashville's stair-step school integration went into the third year today with 32 Negro students signing up for racially mixed classes without incident. They registered at nine predominantly white grammar schools under a court-approved desegregation plan that extended integration this year to the third grade.

220 Negroes Seek Reassignments In North Carolina

DURHAM, N.C. (AP) — Clerks sifted Tuesday through more than 220 requests from Negroes seeking reassignment to white city schools here.

The requests began pouring in Monday, the deadline. Supt. Lew Hannon said they still were being processed.

Frank Fuller, school board chairman, said he could not comment on how the board would handle the requests. Previously he had said the board, whose next regular meeting is Sept. 14, might meet in a closed session before acting on the matter.

Initial assignments were made Aug. 4.

Three North Carolina cities and two counties have begun or stated plans for limited integration, but there has been none in Durham.

Charlotte Integrates: One Pupil

City's "Token" Plan Keeps Desegregation To A Minimum

CHARLOTTE, N. C. — Only one colored student will attend a predominantly white school in this city's "token" integration program during the 1959-60 school year.

The Charlotte Board of Education, Tuesday turned down applications of eight colored pupils seeking transfers. The board rejected the reassignment applications on the grounds that "Negro" schools were closer to the applicants' homes than the schools to which they sought admission.

THE ACTION leaves Delores Waterman, who will attend the new Garinger high school as the only colored pupil assigned to a predominantly "white" school for the coming year.

Among the eight students whose transfer applications were denied were two sons of Kelly Alexander, state president of the NAACP. Mr. Alexander indicated the case might be taken to court.

Charlotte, along with Winston-Salem and Greensboro, broke the color barrier in city schools two years ago with a handful of colored students assigned to predominantly "white" schools. The token integration has since continued on a limited basis.

For 28 Negroes Seeking Transfer:

Private Classes Are Planned at Asheville

BURNSVILLE (UPI) — Private classes on a temporary basis will begin here and in Asheville Monday for 28 Negro children seeking admission to all white schools here.

An interracial group meeting in Asheville Monday night made plans to provide schooling for the children pending final action by the Yancey County Board of Education on their requests. The children do not attend any school at present.

Yancey County's only Negro school was condemned and closed last year and the children were assigned to Negro public schools in Asheville, 40 miles south of here. The school board made arrangements for similar assignments this year.

In June, however, the Negroes applied for admission to white schools here. The school board rejected the application and the Negroes appealed. The board held a hearing last month on the appeals but has taken no final action.

An attorney for the Negroes warned that the students would not accept transfers to Negro schools in Asheville and would not accept a new Negro school here.

The plan adopted Monday night by the Burnsville educational project calls for the 21 elementary pupils to attend classes under a Negro private tutor at Griffith Chapel Methodist Church here.

The seven high school students will attend Allen High School, a Negro girls' school operated by the Methodist Church in Asheville. They will live in Asheville and will attend the school as day students.

The project committee plans to raise $3,500 to cover the expense of the arrangements.

Supreme Court Refuses To Review Holt Case

By JACK K. RUSSELL.
The News and Observer Bureau,
1255 National Press Building.

WASHINGTON—The U. S. Supreme Court yesterday refused to upset lower court rulings that persons aggrieved by the North Carolina pupil placement act may not appeal for relief from federal courts until they have exhausted the administrative remedies afforded by the satute.

Without opinion the high court refused to review the Fourth U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruling of last March 19 which upheld the right of the Raleigh school board to deny a transfer of a Negro pupil from Ligon High School to Broughton High School.

Although the high court did not affirm the decision, its refusal to grant a review would indicate agreement with the circuit court's doctrine.

The suit was brought on Aug. 19, 1957, on behalf of Joseph Hiram Holt. 17-year-old Raleigh Negro, a transfer to Needham Broughton.

District Judge Edwin M. Stanley ruled Aug. 20, 1958, that Holt was not entitled to go to federal court to challenge the reasons for denial of his transfer until he had exhausted the administrative remedies provided him under the act.

No Other Choice.

The court of appeals affirmed on March 19, stating that the refusal of Holt to avail himself of the administrative appeal remedies had left the district judge no other choice.

The Circuit Court of Appeals emphasized in its opinion that "We are not to be understood as approving the deliberate segregation of the races in the public schools of the city or the questioning of applicants on irrelevant matters. (The act) tended to peretuate the system or (it) provided that each child attending a school by assignment of the board was assigned to the same school for the ensuing school year."

"... The district judge might have dismissed the complaint if he had reached the merits of the case, but he was restricted in the scope of his decision by the failure of the plaintiffs to do their part in giving effect to the plan of the statute" the court said.

The Supreme Court also in effect upheld the right of the Raleigh School Board to question applicants for transfer personally on matters reelvant to the transfer.

Right To Question.

The court of appeals had said that the Raleigh School Board was "clearly within its rights making its initial decision in requesting the child and his parents to appear for interrogation, and that they on their part were clearly delinquent in refusing to attend and to furnish all relevant information in their possession."

Attorneys for Holt had argued that the lower courts should have held that the doctrine of exhaustion of administrative remedies had no application in the case because of the federal court's role in the "protection of Negro public school children against burdensome discriminatory, procedural devices."

Montgomery County Cases.

The Supreme Court also refused lower court rulings on a case in which parents of 45 Negro children in Montgomery County had asked the federal courts for an order requiring both the county and the state to desegregate their schools immediately.

Judge Stanley also had ruled in this case that the Negroes could not appeal to the federal courts until they had exhausted their administrtaive remedies under the state's pupil assignment act.

Yancey School Case Goes to U. S. Court

BURNSVILLE, (AP) — Yancey County Negroes, without a school of their own for more than a year, asked the federal courts Wednesday to order they be admitted to the county's white schools.

Twenty-seven school children, their parents and others filed suit in U. S. District Court in Asheville, contending Yancey County schools are segregated on the basis of race and that Negroes have been denied admission.

A temporary order was sought to restrain the Yancey Board of Education and the Yancey schools superintendent from denying the plaintiffs admission to three schools—East Yancey and Cane River high schools, and Burnsville Elementary.

Defendants are J. L. Robinson, Philip Westall, B. B. Penland, and C. Rex McIntosh, members of the board of education; and Hubert D. Justice, superintendent.

The school dispute began in September, 1958, when parents of Negro children refused to send them to the only Negro school, charging it was inadequate. The school later was condemned and the county arranged for the children to commute daily to Asheville schools, a 70-mile round trip.

This year the parents of the Negroes petitioned for assignment to the all-white schools in Burnsville, Yancey County seat. The petitions were denied and the children were assigned again to Asheville schools. But their parents refused to send them. Another request for reassignment was turned down.

An interracial group arranged then to have the grammar school pupils tutored in a Burnsville church, and high school students have been boarding at the private Allen High School in Asheville.

The board of education charged in September that spokesmen for the Negroes had rejected repeated efforts to put in motion a plan to build a new Negro school. This, they said, was against the will of the majority of the Negroes.

The board said a group of Negro parents and their attorney, Reuben Dailey of Asheville, had turned down offers of a temporary building, teaching at home, or a new, modern building.

Instead, the board contended, the minority was trying to force integration. Dailey is the attorney who filed the suit Wednesday.

Carroll Opposes Changes Proposed In School Law

By CHARLES CLAY.

The State's top school man is opposed to a constitutional revision which would relinquish the requirement for North Carolina to operate a "general and uniform" system of public schools.

"The words themselves are not sacrosanct," said State Supt. of Public Instruction Charles F. Carroll, "but the assurance inherent in the use of the phrase is of tremendous value."

Mr. Carroll also raised questions about other proposed changes dealing with public education.

A study group headed by Victor Bryant of Durham has recommended that the words "general and uniform" be deleted in a move designed to peg the Constitution's articles on education to Pearsall Plan amendments attached in 1956.

These amendments provide State tuition grants and local option elections on school closings as a means of meeting the school integration crisis.

"When, as, and if the expense grant and local option provisions become operative, it is obvious that some of the uniformity for which we have labored through the decades will have been reduced proportionately," Dr. Carroll said.

"Nevertheless, I see and would like to continue to see in these or comparable words something of a guarantee of educational opportunity for all children and youth, something symbolic of our noblest aspirations as a people."

He continued:

"Interestingly, while the commission recommends the deletion of the requirement for a general and uniform system of education, it has preserved the requirement that the State Board of Education 'apportion and equalize the public school funds over the State.'

"Whether the two contemplations are consistent could possibly be a matter of judicial determination. It may be that this whole thought is solely a matter of semantics but from the point of view of practical administration the apportionment and equalization of funds seem to be tied inseparably to the very core of the general and uniform concept."

'Difficult to Comprehend.'

Dr. Carroll said the removal of the provision requiring the use of county tax funds to help maintain schools "is profoundly difficult to comprehend . . ."

Local governing bodies are charged with the responsibility of building and maintaining schools with tax monies and the proposed change also is tied to the Pearsall Plan, under which schools might be closed down.

"Does the commission's proposal imply that the State would provide its customary support plus that support previously provided by the county?" Dr. Carroll asked. "If not the State, who would provide the financial support now provided by the county?"

He added that "this proposal does not appear to be in harmony with recognized need for teachers and buildings, for strengthened instruction, and with recent declarations that there should be more financial support at both local and State levels.

"In any event, should not the Constitution contain a stable framework within which the General Assembly could devise a sound system of financial support for public education?"

Shift to Legislature.

The study group's proposal to relieve the State Board of Education and Dr. Carroll of their broad, general responsibilities for "the general supervision and administration of the free public school system . . ." should be given considerable thought, Dr. Carroll said.

Under this proposal, power over the schools would be shifted to the legislature.

"Except as restricted by the Constitution, any legislature has unlimited discretion and power to legislate on all matters of public school policy," Dr. Carroll said. "I am not aware of any instance in the past where this constitutional provision has restricted the General Assembly in the enactment of any law on the contrary, I am aware every day of the necessity of this general provision of authority.

"It is to be hoped that as substitutions are provided for current administrative and supervisory arrangements, due consideration will be given to the inescapable fact that the administration and supervision of the State's largest program of service involves not only . . . expressly granted constitutional and statuatory powers but also implied powers, including those essential to the accomplishment of the purposes for which the public school system exists."

Dr. Carroll said he was "fully aware of the vast amount of time and intelligence the constitutional commission devoted to its difficult tasks . . ."

However, in its effort to shore up the Pearsall Plan, "I trust that . . . we shall not pull the shoring from under other vital portions of our total educational system," Dr. Carroll said.

Integration Suits' Dismissal Sought

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Defendants in federal court school integration suits in Mecklenburg County and in Greensboro filed answers Thursday asking dismissal of the actions.

The Mecklenburg County Board of Education said it twice denied admission of eight Negro children to white schools because of (1) schools crowded to capacity, (2) the refusal of the Negro children's lawyers to let them answer certain questions by the board and (3) the welfare of the children involved.

The North Carolina Advisory Committee on Education replied in federal court at Greensboro that the two suits, by six Negro children, are improperly drawn as class actions and ask the federal court to pass on a state law which has not been reviewed by the State Supreme Court.

The two suits in Greensboro and the one in Mecklenburg County each name the local school board, the State Board of Education, the North Carolina Advisory Committee on Education and the individual members of each as defendants. The National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People filed the suits almost simultaneously Feb. 10.

The State Board of Education filed its answers earlier. They were, in substance, the same as the answer filed by the advisory committee in Greensboro Thursday.

The advisory committee has not yet answered the Mecklenburg County suit and the Greensboro board of education has not yet answered its suits. Friday is the deadline.

The Mecklenburg board said the Negro children's lawyers refused to let it have "information to which it was entitled." The answer, however, did not specify the nature of the questions which went unanswered.

County Board and State Fight Integration

(CHARLOTTE, N. C. (AP) — Defendants in federal court school integration suits in Mecklenburg County and in Greensboro filed answers Thursday asking dismissal of the actions.

The Mecklenburg county board of education said it twice denied admission of eight Negro children to white schools because of (1) schools crowded to capacity, (2) the refusal of the Negro children's lawyers to let them answer certain questions by the board and (3) the welfare of the children involved.

The North Carolina advisory committee on education replied in federal court at Greensboro that the two suits, by six Negro children, are improperly drawn as class actions and ask the federal court to pass on a state law which has not been reviewed by the state supreme court.

THREE SUITS BY NAACP

The two suits in Greensboro and the one in Mecklenburg county each name the local school board, the state board of education, the North Carolina advisory committee on education and the individual members of each as defendants. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People filed the suits almost simultaneously Feb. 10.

The state board of education filed its answers earlier. They were, in substance, the same as the answer filed by the advisory committee in Greensboro Thursday.

The advisory committee has not yet answered the Mecklenburg county suit and the Greensboro board of education has not yet answered its suits. Friday is the deadline.

The Mecklenburg board said the Negro children's lawyers refused to let it have "information to which it was entitled." The answer, however, did not specify the nature of the questions which went unanswered.

CLASS ACTIONS, REPLY

The defendants asserted that the assignment of a child to a particular school is "personal and individual" and must be considered separately. Consequently, the defendants maintain, the federal suits are class actions, which the US fourth circuit court of appeals has ruled out of school integration cases.

The Mecklenburg board, though it has not yet assigned a Negro to a white school, said its sole guide is the pupil assignment act, which the suits ask be declared unconstitutional even though it does not list race as a factor. The board said it has "conscientiously attempted to decide each and every case (for reassignment) in keeping with facilities, and in the process it has been necessary to refuse many white and Negro applications."

The Greensboro school board has admitted a token number of Negroes to white schools for the last two years, as has Charlotte, the county seat of Mecklenburg, and Winston-Salem.

Durham Negroes Lose New Plea On Placement Act

DURHAM, N. C. (AP) — A federal judge has ruled out any "class" attack on North Carolina's pupil placement law in a Negro mothers' anti-segregation suit.

At a trial session Tuesday, Dist. Judge Edwin M. Stanley told a lawyer for the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People:

"We may as well face this now. The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals has upheld the Pupil Assignment Act. The law is valid—it must be complied with. I don't see where a pattern has anything to do with it."

Stanley commented as Conrad Pearson, the NAACP lawyer, tried to show the pattern of segregation—an issue in this case.

His ruling meant any decisions in the case will have only local—

Whites Transferring to Murphey

Thompson to Become Negro School

By JANE HALL.

Beginning in September, Thompson School will be used as a Negro elementary school to relieve crowding in the Crosby-Garfield, Lucille Hunter and Mary Phillips Schools.

This decision was made yesterday by the Raleigh School Board at its April session.

Thompson white students will be transferred to Murphy School and some adjustment probably will be made between Murphy and Barbee schools in order to prevent crowding at Murphey.

As a result of this decision, the board decided to defer action on bids for an addition at Mary Phillips. Plans for the addition will not be abandoned but construction will take place some time in the future.

In this connection, the board also decided to continue study of the bids submitted for the construction of the proposed school administrative headquarters building in an effort to find ways to reduce the cost.

Bleacher Bid Accepted.

It accepted, however, the low bid of $31,097 submitted by the Burnswick-Balke - Collender Company for bleachers for the new Broughton High School gym. The bid was obtained through the State Division of Purchase and Contract. The bleachers will seat 3,500.

Touching on the Thompson School change, it was pointed out that the white enrollment in the Thompson area had been declining for several years. This year, Supt. Jesse O. Sanderson pointed out, the first grade at Thompson numbers 42. Next year's first grade will number only 20.

Changes in a number of the attendance areas in the city schools system were made by the board yesterday. They were:

The LeRoy Martin Junior High Schools Area — Adjusted from Daniels Junior High to include the portion of Sussex Road between Yarmouth Road and Westwood Dr. This portion of Sussex Road which was destined to be included in the Sherwood-Bates elementary school area will remain where it now is — in the Frances Lacy School area.

Daniels Junior High School area —Adjusted from Morson Junior High area to include the following: Beginning at Peace Street and extending in a Southerly direction on the west side of N. Boylan Avenue to Hillsboro Street; thence westerly on the west side of Hillsboro, including both sides of Hillsboro, to Ashe Avenue; thence on the South side of Ashe Avenue to the Southern Railroad.

Fred A. Olds School Area — Adjusted from Frances Lacy to include the following: Beginning on the east side of Canterbury Road at Grant Avenue; thence in a westerly direction on the north side of Grant Avenue to Banbury Road; thence, in a westerly direction across the west prong of Beaver Dam Branch; thence. westward on the south side of Leonard Street to Ridge Road; thence, southward on the east side of Ridge Road to Faircloth Street; thence, eastward on the south side of Faircloth to Wade Avenue; thence directly south along the west side of Faircloth Road.

Parents of children who will be in the Frances Lacy sixth grade in September may continue to send their children to Lacy if they choose.

Durham School Suit Hits Another Snarl

GREENSBORO, N. C.—A desegregation suit filed against the Durham School Board and two State agencies about a year ago still is snarled in legal objections and counter objections.

Tuesday, attorneys representing the Negro mothers who filed the suit entered a memorandum in opposition to objections entered previously by the Durham Board.

The memorandum was filed in Middle District Court here. The Negroes' attorneys contend that the board's objections to certain questions and exhibits are without legal foundation.

In the memorandum, the attorneys contend that the question they want answered are relevant in that the information they produce will have a bearing on whether the board has maintained segregation in the Durham schools in violation of the Constitution.

They point to the board's objection to the admissibility of forms used as requests for reassignment of Joycelyn McKissick and Elaine Richardson to schools attended only by whites.

These forms, the Negroes' attorneys said, were used in seeking the relief, through administrative measures, that the parents of the two girls are now seeking in Federal Court.

"If these forms are not relevant, nothing is," the attorneys stated.

The Negro mothers contend that administrative remedies under State's Pupil Enrollment and Assignment Act were exhausted without relief before they appealed to Federal Court.

Turning to objections of the admissibility of forms used by the State Board of Education in statistical, financial and budgetary work, the Negroes' attorneys made this statement:

"These forms, all broken down by race, tend to indicate that the city, as required by the State, is maintaining a racial classification in the administration of its system. They tend to indicate the existence of white and Negro schools as such."

For these reasons, the attorney said, the forms are relevant to the issues raised in their complaint.

Answering objections to questions concerning the number, if any, of Negro children admitted to previously all-whiite schools, attorneys said, such information would tend "to show the utterly inconsequental degree of desegregation of which has occurred in North Carolina . . ."

N.C. County Will Begin Integration

NEW BERN, N.C. (AP)—Children of Negro personnel at the Cherry Point Marine Corps Air Station who meet "certain conditions and requirements" are to be admitted to two all-white Craven County schools next fall.

This was announced Monday by the Craven County Board of Education. The children primarily affected have been attending the James City Negro elementary schools about 20 miles from the base.

The board did not list the conditions and requirements. It said the children would be permitted to enter the Graham A. Barden and Havelock elementary schools near the base.

The board said its action was prompted by difficulties involved in transporting the Negro children to the James City school.

County School Supt. Robert L. Pugh said he did not know how many Negro pupils would apply for admission to the white schools, but he said he thought the number would not be large.

He said about 700 white pupils attended each of the two elementary schools at Havelock last year.

A Negro youngster, the son of a master sergeant, was enrolled during the past school year at a Goldsboro school near Seymour Johnson Air Force Base.

Eleven Negroes also attended previously all - white schools in Charlotte, Greensboro and Winston-Salem during the past year, the second year of token desegregation in the three cities.

300 Pupils Ignore Old School For Second Day

HOLLISTER, N. C. — (UPI) — County school authorities moved today to try to end a two-day boycott by 300 pupils at a Negro elementary school here backed by a pro-integrationist organization.

A similar student strike occurred in Greene County recently. The boycott here was aimed at supporting demands for construction of a new school for Negroes.

The racial issue was injected by the Progressive Civic Union, a Negro group, which announced support of the demands for a new school and "opposition to student assignments outside the county for racial reasons."

County School Supt. W. Henry Overman rushed here when only four of the 337 students enrolled in the school reported for classes Thursday. A student bus driver was the only pupil to report to the faculty of eight teachers yesterday.

Overman said the school probably would be closed until the County Board of Education could meet with a delegation from the local PTA to discuss the situation. He said attempts were being made to arrange a special meeting at Halifax Friday. If these attempts failed, the board would probably hear the Negro parents at a monthly meeting Monday.

The local PTA voted Tuesday night for students to boycott classes until the school board sets a definite date for construction of the new school. Funds for the school were included in a three-million-dollar school bond issue approved in a referendum last year.

The Progressive Civic Union, a self-styled "betterment" group in predominantly Negro Halifax, Warren and Northampton Counties, said the "slowness" of authorities to begin construction was "partly to blame" for the situation.

James R. Walker, Jr., executive director of the Union, said the group's executive committee met yesterday and voted to support the "Greene County type student strike" here. A boycott by students at the Greene County Training School for Negroes recently resulted in a promise of better lunchroom and recreational facilities.

The Progressive Civic Union had opposed bringing the Indian school into the public school system and has sent resolutions to school boards in Halifax, Warren and Northampton Counties calling for an end to segregation.

New School For Students Endorsed

HALIFAX, N. C. — (UPI) — The Pro-Integration Progressive Civic Union supporting a boycott of 337 Negro students asking for a new school at Hollister, said Thursday it joined with the PTA demand for a new school and that all children in the district be "assigned to the school, regardless of race, creed or color."

Only six students showed up for classes Thursday as the student boycott went into its third day. The student strike was called because Negroes claimed the Hossister Elementary school building and facilities were in poor condition despite a recent bond issue approved to build a new school.

A delegation of 75 parents of Hollister students met with the County Board of Education in an all day session in an effort to resolve the boycott.

The Education Board told the delegation the delay in building a new school was due to "difficulty in ascertaining the size of proposed facilities for the school because of local conditions."

Supt. W. Henry Overman said "certain parents have withdrawn their children from the Hollister school and the Halifax Education Board has been informed that there are many other who will attempt to withdraw their children."

The Board said it needs "sufficient information as to the size of the proposed building in order to proceed with construction."

The Board requested the parents to furnish the needed information as to how many students will go to the new school.

Vernon Lynch, president of the PTA, acted as spokesman for the delegation urging the Board to carry out its 1957 building plan and "assign all pupils in the Hollister school district to the Holister school."

He said the Haliwa Indians withdrew from the school as the "result of not having adequate facilities' at Hollister. The Indians said they withdrew because they objected to being assigned to go to school with Negroes.

The Education Board said the people of the county "have showed their good faith by approving a bond issue for public school buildings. The Hollister school was immediately placed in a high priority of a list of buildings to be constructed."

The Board told the group it "would be derelict in its duties to spend thousands of taxpayers' dollars until the Board is satisfied as to the needs to properly accommodate students who will attend the school."

James R. Walker, Jr., Negro Attorney, representing the Progressive Civic Union, asked that all children in the school district be assigned to Hollister. He refused to say if the statement meant the Board should force Indians to go to the Hollister School also.

The Indians built their own school in adjoining Warren County and its standards were recently approved by the State Board of Education, to go to the Hollister Schools also.

Overman said the school would continue to operate at least through Monday pending the decision of a special meeting of parents Friday night. The PTA called a special meeting to determine whether the boycotting students would return to school in the light of the County Board's explanation.

He said classes would be held Saturday to make up a school day lost because of bad weather.

Negro School Row Still On In Halifax

HALIFAX, N.C. (AP) — This Virginia border county, locked in a contest of wills over a proposed new Negro school, waited this weekend to see which side will give—county officials or boycotting Negro parents.

The Negro Elementary School at Hollister held make-up classes Saturday, because of bad weather earlier, but only seven pupils showed up. There are 337 pupils in the school, which has been boycotted since mid-week.

The Negroes, fearing that the Halifax County Board of Education will abandon plans for a new school, started the boycott to protest such a course.

"We have nothing to say the rest of the week," said Mrs. Vernon Lynch, wife of the president of the school's PTA after a meeting Friday night.

The school board has a regular meeting Monday and it has been indicated that the boycott situation will be a prime topic. The PTA also may hold a separate meeting Monday.

The crisis is the outgrowth of another school racial matter in the area. Haliwa Indians, who previously attended school with Negroes, built a private school rather than continue. The Haliwas then asked for Pearsall Plan tuition grants to support their school but instead won state support of the institution. This withdrew 26 Haliwa children from the Hollister school.

The county previously had passed a three million dollar bond issue for the Hollister school. After the withdrawal of the Haliwa the Negro parents feared the school improvements would not be made.

Negroes met with the school board Friday and the board asked that petitions be circulated among Negro parents so it could be determined how many pupils would attend the Hollister school. This would guide the board in its planning for the school.

NAACP Wants Negroes Admitted As Patients

CHARLOTTE (AP) — The National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People said Monday it will ask for immediate admission of Negro patients into city-owned Charlotte Memorial Hospital.

Kelly Alexander, president of the North Carolina chapters of the NAACP, said he would appear before City Council next Monday and request that patients in Good Samaritan Hospital (for Negroes) be transferred to Memorial.

Alexander said wards and rooms at the Negro institution are crowded and that patients there are victims of "lack of care." He added that Good Samaritan's Nursing School in 1953 ranked 35th among 38 nursing schools in the state.

Alexander asserted that the maintaining of white and Negro hospitals was duplication and that one hospital for both races would be more economical.

North Carolina placement law clears new test

RALEIGH, N. C., Oct. 14—(AP)—North Carolina's pupil assignment law, which withstood another federal court attack Monday, may be an answer to Southern school segregation problems.

After the U. S. Supreme Court declined to review lower court decisions in two North Carolina segregation cases, Asst. Atty. Gen. Ralph Moody said:

"The Supreme Court—at least a majority of the court has decided that the states will be allowed to see what they will do with the problem with assignment statutes."

BOTH OF THE cases involved pupil assignment laws.

Moody, who specializes in segregation matters, added that federal courts also have indicated that state agencies are not to be parties in segregation cases where the states have local assignment laws.

The court's decision disappointed officials of the North Carolina chapter of the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People.

Kelly Alexander of Charlotte, state NAACP president, said, "It should be made clear that school boards are still assigning pupils to public schools on a racial basis, regardless of their place of residence."

HE URGED NEGRO parents to seek admittance of their children in large numbers to previously all-white schools.

In both North Carolina cases, federal district courts and then the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, held that plaintiffs first must exhaust state administrative remedies on the local level.

The Supreme Court had ruled previously that North Carolina's law, which gives local boards full authority to assign pupils, is not unconstitutional on its face.

The two cases the high court refused to review concerned a Negro boy who sought admission to an all-white high school in Raleigh and parents of 45 Montgomery County Negro children who asked for a federal court order calling for immediate desegregation.

Yancey (N. C.) Students Seek County Assignment

ASHEVILLE, N. C. — (UPI) —An interracial group has mapped plans here to provide temporary private schooling for 28 Yancey county students.

The group, representing Yancey and Buncombe counties, decided to establish the schools so that the children will not miss any more classes pending final action on their applications for transfer to white schools at Burnsville.

THE classes were scheduled to begin here and in Burnsville. The 21 elementary school students will attend classes under a colored private tutor at Griffith Chapel Methodist church in Burnsville.

The seven high school students will attend Allen High school, a colored girls' school operated here by the Methodist church. The high school students will be housed here and will attend the school as day students.

THE INTERRACIAL group, the Burnsville Educational project, plans to raise $3,500 to finance the arrangements. A spokesman said, however, there will be no general public solicitation of funds.

Yancey county''s lone colored public school was condemned last year and the students were assigned to colored schools here. This entailed an 80-mile round - trip daily. In June, they applied for transfer to all - white schools at Burnsville.

THE YANCEY county board of education held public hearings on the request but took no final action. An attorney for the pupils warned that they would not accept assignment to colored public schools here this year and would not accept a new colored school at Burnsville.

YANCEY DELEGATION — The Yancey County delegation which brought its school complaints before the N. C. Advisory Committee to the U. S. Civil Rights Commission included Ed Griffith, Juanita Parker, Mrs. Selelia Griffith and Patty Lou Griffith.

Rights Committee Told

Negro Children In Yancey Make 80-Mile School Trip

News & Observer
Raleigh N.C.

[illegible] is no Negro school in [illegible] and the county's 28 Negro [illegible], whose request for assignment in white schools of the county was recently rejected by the county board of education, have been assigned to attend schools in Asheville.

This means a daily round trip journey of 80 miles aboard a school bus. As a result, a boycott is in operation. The bus is making round trips daily from Yancey to Asheville — with no passengers. The children are not going to [illegible]ol at all.

The recital brought from one committee member, Paul R. Ervin of Charlotte, the comment: "It seems to me that if some integration were ever justified, this would be the case."

Ervin said he could not get greatly concerned over cases where children had to go a few extra blocks to a school, "but this sort of thing does concern me. In effect, these people are being deprived of a public education to which they are entitled."

The Yancey delegation of two women, one man and two school age children were led by Reuben J. Dailey, Negro attorney of Asheville.

The committee voted to receive affidavits concerning the Yancey situation and to forward them to the Federal Civil Rights Commission.

McNeill Smith of Greensboro, chairman of the committee, told the group that it has no authority "to do anything." He added "our only help will be to bring this to the attention of the people of North Carolina."

Dailey told the committee that the Negro high school children have attended school in Asheville for a number of years and that the smaller children have gone to Asheville the last year or so after the only Negro elementary school in the county was closed.

He said the Yancey board "had promised these people a school" but has taken no action to provide one.

He said that when they first came to his office "I nearly threw them out" because "they said they didn't want to integrate."

One of the women, Mrs. Selelia Griffith, told the committee that the long bus ride is too much for some of the smaller children—it nags their kidneys. She said to make the trip the children must leave home by around 6:30 a.m. and don't return until 5:15 to 5:30 p.m.

In the winter, she said, it's dark when they leave and the children use flashlights to go to the school bus stop.

For more than a year, the school has been operated as a private institution by the Indians to serve the two counties- Halifax and Warren. Two months ago, the Haliwas sought to have the State approve the school as a private institution thus making it available for pupil tution grants.

Holt Case Under Advisement

Court's Decision Awaited In Carolina School Suit

By United Press International

CHARLOTTE — North Carolina Atty. Gen. Malcolm Seawell told the U. S. Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals that the state's Pupil Assignment Act — a center of dispute in numerous segregation suits —should not be declared unconstitutional.

Seawell, appearing on behalf of the state, addressed the tribunal briefly near the end of a hearing on a suit filed on behalf of Joseph Hiram Holt Jr., who claimed he was denied admission to a white high school in Raleigh because of his race.

THE THREE-JUDGE court took the case under advisement, to deliver at a later date its decision on whether to return the case to the U. S. Eastern District Court in North Carolina, from which it was appealed, or whether to uphold the lower court ruling.

Seawell told the court that in the Holt appeal "There is no attack on the Pupil Assignment Act," under which North Carolina school boards have based many of their decisions to hold school integration to a "limited degree." The Pupil Assignment Act places authority for assigning pupils in the hands of local boards.

SEAWELL ALSO told United Press International that "The lawyers for Holt are trying to get a test case, that's all."

The court questioned the decision of the school board in rejecting Holt's application for admission to all white Needham-Broughton high school on grounds that it was "not in the best interest of the public" to permit it.

HOLT FIRST sought admission to Needham-Broughton school in 1957, but the application was rejected. The youth charged that he was forced to attend a Negro school nearly four miles from his home while Needham-Broughton high was less than a mile from his house.

The suit claimed the boy was denied admission because of his race, and that the city of Raleigh is operating segregated public schooling facilities.

HOLT APPEALED the school board decision to U. S. Eastern District Court in North Carolina. The court upheld the school board ruling in commenting that Holt had not exhausted administrative remedies available under the North Carolina Pupil Assignment Act of 1955.

It was from this decision that Holt appealed to the Circuit Court.

A "LIMITED" integration program has been undertaken in North Carolina, in which a smattering of Negroes were admitted to schools in Greensboro, Winston-Salem and Charlotte in 1957 and again in 1958.

Snow Hill, N. C.

Negro Students Continue Boycott

SNOW HILL, N.C (AP)—Hundreds of shouting, defiant Negro students, holding out for better school facilities, decided Wednesday to continue their boycott of schools in Greene County, in eastern North Carolina.

Student spokesmen said the county's 2,300 Negro pupils will ignore a county board of education order to reopen the six strike-bound schools Friday morning.

"We won't go back until the county gives us better facilities," the student leaders said.

The assertions came at a mass meeting of Negro parents and pupils. The meeting was called at the suggestion of the board of education in hopes of ironing out the problem. But nearly 300 students shouted down attempts by school officials and representatives of the Parent-Teacher Assn. to take a vote on whether to call off the strike. The session ended without any formal action being taken.

The strike began Tuesday when only two of 34 buses which carry the county's 2,300 Negro students to various schools, made their rounds. County authorities closed the schools and took the buses away from their Negro student drivers.

Earlier Wednesday, a delegation of Negro parents and students met with the education board to outline requests for new and larger facilities at the Greene County Training School, the county's only high school for Negroes.

The board said the only way it could provide the facilities was by special bond election, and it could not promise anything at the present time.

Negro Group Asks Three N. C. Counties To End Segregation In Their Schools

WELDON (UPI) — A Negro group calling itself the Progressive Civic Union, has called on three county school boards to end segregation in their schools.

James R. Walker Jr., executive director of the group, said he had mailed the suggestion to various school boards. The action was included in four resolutions adopted recently at the group's convention here.

Although the resolutions did not mention any specific examples, one of them was believed prompted by the Haliwa Indian School in Hollister. The school was recently taken into the county system after the Indian group appealed for state aid under the Bearskin Plan.

It serves the Haliwas from Warren and Halifax counties who set it up two years ago rather than have their children attend the Negro schools to which they were assigned.

The Negro group asked the Halifax County Board to refuse any student a school assignment outside the county and asked the Warren County Board to remove any private school coming into the county system.

Walker, who has figured in several recent racial cases in the county, said the action was "not meant to be antagonistic" but conceded that it grew out of the Haliwa case.

The resolution did not apply to the schools in Weldon, Roanoke Rapids or Halifax.

The superintendents of the various counties confirmed that they had received the requests but declined to comment, saying they had not had time to study them. They said the letters will be presented at school board meetings next month.

The group also asked that Northampton County officials end the split school session in the county for Negroes and allow a county wide meeting to be held on the subject. The county has denied such a request in the past.

It also asked the General Assembly to repeal a law limiting teacher contracts to one year at a time and asked that the law giving teachers a continuing contract be enacted, along with a law giving full pay to teachers during 30 days of sick leave.

Another resolution called for a state constitutional amendment to give a convicted person the right to appeal to the State Supreme Court and to give persons with the right of appeal, 60 days from the date of conviction in which to file the appeal.

NAACP Plans to Push Program To Break Down Racial Barriers

CHARLOTTE (AP)—The North Carolina chapter of the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People announced Saturday it plans a stepped up program aimed at breaking down racial barriers during its 50th anniversary year of 1959.

The program, adopted Saturday at a meeting of more than 100 state officers, calls for a membership campaign, a voter registration campaign, and increased public schools and in the areas of employment, housing and public accomodations.

Kelly Alexander of Charlotte, state president, said another phase of the program would be an attempt to clear two young Negro boys sent to reform school in the so-called kissing case at Monroe.

Alexander said the NAACP would seek the release of the boys through every legal means possible.

The two boys, David Simpson, 8, and James Thompson, 10, were sent to reform school after forcing a kiss from a 6-year-old white girl. However, the state contends they were delinquents and were on probation for thefts and other offeneses.

The judge who sentenced them said they were sent because of previous offenses, because their home environment was bad, and not merely because of the kissing incident.

Alexander said the NAACP also plans to assist the mothers of the two boys, who are now in Charlotte looking for work.

Alexander said the NAACP membership drive would begin Feb. 12, the birthday of the organization.

He said the goal is 25,000 new members. He said there now are 13,000 members.

Alexander said the program is aimed at reaching into Eastern North Carolina and trying for the admission of large numbers of Negroes to white schools.

The president commented, "Racial segregation is discrimination and our fight against racial discrimination includes an attack on all racial segregation."

Alexander said the voter registration drive would be an important part of the organization's 1959 program. He said educational workshops will be held in each congressional district and that efforts will be made to get qualified Negroes to participate in politics on the local level.

Another airman's child can't go to base school

GOLDSBORO, N.C. — For the time being, the County Board of Education has turned down an airman's request that his son be admitted to currently all-white Meadow Lane school.

The reason for denying admittance to the serviceman's eight-year-old son, M/Sgt. Fred Archer was told, is that his application was out of order.

It was explained that it was the board's duty to assign pupils, but if parents were not satisified with the assignment, they then could apply for reassignment.

THE AIRMAN stated in the application that he wanted his son, Bruce, a second grader, to attend Meadow Lane — a school constructed with Federal funds to serve Seymour Johnson Air Force Base personnel—because it was closest to the child's home.

Sergeant Archer also stated that he and his family live at the Capehart Housing Project at the Base and he preferred for his child to be assigned to "the school within the district" in which he lives.

Meadow Lane school is situated just off the Base about two miles from Goldsboro. Though built with Federal funds, it is under the control of the County Board of Education as a part of the county school system.

THE SERVICEMAN'S son has been assigned to East End school in Goldsboro, as the board stated, in keeping with a policy which has been in effect since Meadow Lane opened last fall.

School officials also noted that some 15 to 20 children of Seymour Johnson Personnel are currently enrolled at the school where a large addition was recently completed with Federal funds.

Greensboro And Charlotte New Targets

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Negroes launched new attacks on North Carolina school laws Tuesday, filing integration suits in federal courts at Charlotte and Greensboro and promising more suits.

The presence of Thurgood Marshall of New York, general counsel for the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People, as attorney in both suits hints that North Carolina—despite its token integration—may be the NAACP's next school segregation battleground. The organization previously concentrated on Virginia where it won courtroom victories.

In addition to the suits, aimed at Greensboro city schools and Mecklenburg County (Charlotte) schools, there were other racial developments on the school front:

Negro students went on strike at schools in Greene County, claiming their school facilities were unequal to white schools there.

MORE SUITS

And Kelly Alexander of Charlotte, NAACP state president (whose son twice has been denied admission to white schools), said that federal school integration suits were to be filed concerning Guilford County (Greensboro) and Durham city schools.

A check of federal courts turned up no such legal action, however.

North Carolina has had token school integration in three cities for two years. At present, there are 11 Negroes attending white schools in Charlotte, Greensboro and Winston-Salem.

The new suits seek to "forever restrain" operation of segregated schools in Mecklenburg County and Greensboro. The NAACP brought the action in behalf of 14 Negro children—six of them in Greensboro and eight in the Charlotte area—and "all others similarly situated."

DEFENDANTS

Named as defendants were the local school boards affected, the North Carolina State Board of Education, the North Carolina Advisory Committee on Education and the individual members of these organizations.

The action would restrain the local school boards from operating segregated schools and from assigning pupils to schools on the basis of race; enjoin the state board and the advisory committee from counseling or working in concert with the local school boards to prevent desegregation or keep integration ot a minimum.

The suits assert that the North Carolina Pupil Assignment Act is designed to impede, rather than carry out Supreme Court integration edicts and, therefore, is unconstitutional.

N. C. pupils end strike over school

BY CHESTER M. HAMPTON

SNOW HILL, N.C. — Greene County school authorities expect 2,500 striking colored students to return to their classes in six schools today. They represented 86 per cent of the total of 2,905 students enrolled.

The students struck en masse last Tuesday in protest against inadequate school facilities for colored students and a $450,000 appropriation for a new school labeled "for white only."

The largest school involved in the strike was Greene County Training School where there are 1,136 high and elementary school students.

L. H. Smith, principal, said that the students and their parents agreed that the children should return to school on Monday. He said the decision was made at a meeting last Wednesday night.

"I don't know of any organization (causing the strike)," he said. "It was just a spontaneous situation as far as we know. I don't know what touched it off."

A CONFLICTING report was that the students had vociferously shouted down a proposed vote to return and vowed to continue the strike. The meeting adjourned with no decision being made, the report revealed.

One main contributing factor to the strike was the refusal of the 36 student-drivers of school buses to transport students. According to Mr. Smith, the buses were recovered at the homes of the drivers.

He said the buses were returned to the drivers on Friday with the expectation that school would be resumed Monday.

(Another report was that the drivers drove empty buses to the school yard on Monday and left them.)

Asked what the students identified as the cause of their dissatisfaction, Mr. Smith said:

"They stated that they lacked adequate facilities — classrooms, library, cafeteria, gymnasium, auditorium and playground equipment."

Q: "Was there any talk of seeking to desegregate the county high schools?"

A: "Not that I know of."

Q: "Is there an NAACP chapter in Snow Hill?"

A: "I never heard of one here."

Q: "What made the students decide to end the strike?"

A: "The parents said that they were promised that corrections would be made in the facilities."

TWO OTHER published reports said that county officials had made no promises to the parents. A delegation of parents and students met with the board of education on Wednesday asking for new facilities.

However, they were told that the only way the facilities could be improved would be through special bond election and that nothing could be promised at this time.

County officials said that $1,165,000 was spent on schools during the past decade and that $622,172 of that amount went for war earmarked for schools attended only by colored children.

(In many southern communities, belated attempts to establish "separate but equal" school facilities have been made following the initiation of desegregation suits.)

Last November, the county approved a bond issue of $450,000 to erect a new school to be attended only by white students.

ALTHOUGH THERE is no present indication of a desegregation campaign in Snow Hill, other North Carolina communities are faced with action to compel more than the token desegregation already existing in the state.

Suits were filed last week in Charlotte and Greensboro to bring about school desegregation. Listed as legal counsel in the two cases are Thurgood Marshall, chief legal counsel for the NAACP, and Conrad O. Pearson, chief NAACP counsel in the state.

Kelly Alexander, state NAACP president, announced that suits would also be filed in Guilford County (Greensboro) and Durham. Mr. Alexander lives in Charlotte where his son has twice been denied admission to schools presently attended only by white students.

Presently, there are 11 colored students attending white schools in Charlotte, Greensboro and Winston-Salem. Their assignment to these schools was made under the state's pupil placement act.

However, the new suits assert that the act is designed to impede rather than support the 1954 school decision of the Supreme Court. The 11 assignments were made only as a matter of token compliance, the litigants feel.

THE SUITS already filed seek to "forever restrain" Greensboro and Charlotte from operating segregated schools.

Defendants are the local school boards, the state board The action was brought on behalf of six children in Greensboro and eight in Charlotte "an all others similarly situated." of education, the state advisory committee on education and the individual members of these bodies.

The suits are aimed at restraining the school boards from operating segregated schools and making assignments on a racial basis and enjoining the state board and the advisory committee from "counseling or working in concert with the local school boards to prevent desegregation or keep integration at a minimum."

One desegregation suit in Durham is now pending appeal to the United States Fourth Circuit Court. Other cases filed have been thwarted by the contention that the plaintiffs did not exhaust administrative remedies.

Mr. Alexander said the new suits are different in that "these cases have exhausted administrative remedies."

THIS SHIFT of emphasis by the NAACP to the North Carolina arena came swiftly on the heels of the collapse of Virginia's "massive resistance" laws.

Last week brought to a close an era in Virginia where officials said that schools would never be integrated and that the Supreme Court decision would result in "a thousand years of litigation" before the issue was resolved.

In eight days three cities desegregated ten schools and admitted 30 colored children to them.

On Feb. 2, colored students entered schools in Arlington and Norfolk. Four students entered Stratford Junior High School in Arlington.

In Norfolk, nine students entered high school and eight entered junior high school. Then a week later, nine students entered one high school and two elementary schools in Alexa- schools was also integrated for the first time.

A FOURTH Virginia community, Front Royal in Warren County, is scheduled for desegregation this week. The desegregation was ordered by Federal District Judge John Paul.

School board attorneys said that they would appeal the decision to U.S. Appeals Court Judge Simon Sobeloff. Judge Sobeloff last week refused a similar appeal from Alexandria officials who sought to delay desegregation still further.

Some 22 colored students are to be admitted to Warren High School in Front Royal as a result of his decision.

These students have been attending schools in Washington. With the high school closed, a private school corporation was set up for the white students locked out of school.

Judge Paul delayed opening Warren High until Wednesday to give the private school corporation time to complete semester examinations.

Protesting the Judge's ruling, officials said that 26 of the school's 42 teachers were under contract to the private school corporation and would not be able to return to the public high school.

The corporation scheduled a meeting for Monday to determine whether or not the private school should continue. Pupils in the private school were questioned on the matter and 545 of the 549 who answered were in favor of boycotting the public school when it opens and continuing in private schools. Wednesday's desegregation in Warren County will bring the number of students in integrated schools to 52.

MEANWHILE, THE Virginia Pupil Placement Board refused the requests of 11 colored students to transfer to the junior high school nearest their homes.

The 11 seek to change from Graves Junior High School, across town from where they live, to Chandler Junior High which is right in their residential area.

The board was given power to make all school assignments in Virginia by a law which was recently ruled unConstitutional by the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals.

Despite this ruling, the board stated: "So far as the board is advised, it is still a legal functioning agency of the State of Virginia and will continue to exercise its responsibility under the Pupil Placement Act."

In denying the transfers, the board said the students ... ed their requests too la...

"In the opinion of the ... Placement Board, it wou... be in accord with wise a... istrative practices to ... transfers on these dilator... plications in the absen... compelling reasons.

"The mere fact that a student may prefer one school to another does not create a right to upset the orderly administratives practices and procedures of local school administration."

ELSEWHERE IN THE NATION, segregationist southern states were unable to look toward the east with any degree of calmness.

In Birmingham, eight colored children applied for admission to schools on a desegregated basis. They ask admission to an elementary and a high school.

Frazier Banks, city school superintendent, said that five of the eight applicants were litigants in a previous case. This case ended in the U.S. Supreme Court ruling that Alabama's placement law was not unConstitutional on its face but could be unConstitutional in its application.

In Pine Bluff, Ark. 11 children applied for admission to city schools on a desegregated basis. The city school board had planned two years ago to initiate desegregation voluntarily as was done in Hoxie, Ark.

However, following the confusion touched off by Gov. Faubus in Little Rock, the board retreated.

Integration Suits May Be Tried Next Month

DURHAM (AP)—A suit aimed at wiping out racial segregation in North Carolina public schools will probably be tried here beginning March 23.

Lawyers for two Durham Negro mothers (the plaintiffs) and the State and City Boards of Education told U. S. Middle District Court Judge Edwin M. Stanley here Thursday that they were ready for trial.

Judge Stanley docketed the case for the March 23-April 3 term of Middle District Court. Criminal cases will be handled the first week, followed by a light civil calendar which is expected to allow the trial to begin March 31. No court will be held Easter Monday (March 30).

The case will thus come to trial two months shy of its first birthday. It was filed in Greensboro May 22, 1958, as a result of two Negro girls being turned away from all-white schools here in September of 1957.

Negro lawyers, however, posed questions that are still unanswered. But, Marshall Spears, representing the State Board of Education, promised the answers well before trial time.

Asst. Atty. Gen. Moody, Spears, Judge Stanley and a battery of lawyers representing the plaintiffs resumed a pre-trial hearing here Thursday which was cut short in December when the Negro attorneys posed the "interrogatories."

Some of the questions were ruled out by Judge Stanley and some amended. Moody said he did not receive a complete and accurate list of the questions until early this week and was unable to get the information required in such a short time.

Mrs. Evelyn McKissick, mother of Joycelyn McKissick, and Mrs. Rachael Richardson, mother of Elaine Richardson, filed the suit.

They named the Durham and State School Boards and each of the State Board's members as defendants. They also lumped the Pearsall Plan with what might be called the State's official general attitude on the segregation question for a "master" attack on statewide segregation.

Three School Suits Filed In U. S. Court in North Carolina

GREENSBORO, N. C.—Legal steps were taken last week in three separate actions to compel North Carolina school officials to operate the public school system of that state on an integrated basis.

In two complaints filed on Tuesday, February 10, with the U. S. District Court in Greensboro, attorneys for the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund sought permanent injunctions restraining the Greensboro Board of Education from assigning Negro students to racially segregated schools.

The third suit was filed on Tuesday with the U. S. district court in Charlotte. It sought a similar injunction to restrain the Mecklenberg county board of education from refusing to admit Negro students to schools nearest to their homes.

Named as defendants in the three cases are the North Carolina Advisory Committee on Education and the North Carolina State Board of Education. They are accused of having counseled with and working in concert with all the school boards in the state "for the purpose of preventing desegregation of the schools of North Carolina, or for keeping such desegregation to a minimum."

The North Carolina Alvisory Committee on Education was created in 1955 b the General Assembly to frustrate desegregation efforts.

Attorneys for the Negro students asked that both the State Board of Education and the Advisory Committee be permanently enjoined and restrained from counseling and working with any school board for the purpose of preventing desegregation of schools.

One of the two actions filed in Greensboro and the one filed in Charlotte attacked the policy of requiring Negro students to register in schools nearest their residence for Negroes only regardless of how far the distance might be. One student lives 11 miles from the all-Negro school he must attend.

The other complaint charged the Greensboro school authorities with assigning Negro students to a 6-room dilapidated building on the campus of a school attended by white students only. The building is administratively attached to an all-Negro school and il without playground facilities, auditorium, cafeteria, gymnasium and other school facilities.

It is charged by the attorneys that luncheon food and eating utensils are transferred, some in large garbage cans, from the Negro school to the 6-room building. The students are compelled to eat and lunch in halls, classrooms or on the building grounds. They are not permitted on the grounds of the building occupied by white students or to use any of the facilities in the campus. Classes are dismissed 15 minutes early alternately in the two buildings so as to prevent contact by the Negro and white students.

Assorneys for the NAACP Legal Defense Fund representing the Negro students in the three complaints are Thurgood Marshall and Jack Greenberg of New York. Local counsel are C. O. Pearson of Durham, G. H. Wyche of Charlotte, and J. Kenneth Lee of Greensboro.

State Grange to Fight School Incentive Plan

By BILL HUMPHRIES.

The incentive plan for public school financing proposed by a school finance study committee and endorsed by Governor Hodges, drew fire Thursday from the rural-minded North Carolina State Grange.

The organization's executive committee, meeting here, went on record opposing "any state plan which would tend to widen the gap between the financial support of the schools of one community versus the schools of another community."

State Grange Master Harry B. Caldwell of Greensboro said the action was intended as disapproval of the proposal under which $10 million in State funds would be offered to city and county school units on an incentive basis.

Widen Gap.

"Our people are afraid that the wealthier counties — those most able to put up matching funds—would receive most of the money coming from the State under this plan, and the less fortunate counties would not receive funds according to their needs. This would widen the gap in educational opportunity in North Carolina," Caldwell declared.

The Grange, a general farm organization, was the first large group in the State to come out in opposition to the incentive proposal. It acted almost at the same time that Governor Hodges was urging the General Assembly to adopt legislation providing incentive funds for distribution to local school systems on a matching basis.

"The North Carolina State Grange believes that equal educational opportunities should be provided for all children and to that end we recommend that resources be taxed where they are to educate the children wherever they are," the group declared in a statement prepared by its education committee, headed by Mrs. C. L. Winchester of Raleigh.

The farm organization pledged its support to the programs of the State Board of Education and United Forces for Education, which call for teacher salary increases to bring them more nearly in line with the national average. It pointed out that "the gap continues to widen" in average teacher salaries in North Carolina and the nation.

Says Integration Aided Oklahoma

NEW YORK — (UPI) — Former Gov. Raymond Gary of Oklahima said today that integration of public schools in his state had improved race relations and saved the state money.

"A single fist fight was the only violence that occurred when we integrated our schools," said Gary, whose term as governor ended last January.

Gary, in an article in Look Magazine, said that teachers' salaries have risen from an average of $3,500 to $4,700 because of an increased efficiency in the state's school system.

"Forty-two hundred classrooms have been built," he said. "Our unified schools save us one million dollars a year, as anticipated. The morale of our students is high."

Gary said that after Oklahomans voted to integrate the schools in 1955, there was no organized opposition to implementing that decision because the state took firm measures to avoid it.

ELITE POLICE

"The Oklahoma Crime Bureau, our elite 18-man police force, hired a Negro agent and moved practically full-time into r a c e relations," he said.

"When a segregationist sounded off too loudly, he would be visited by a couple of crime b u r e a u agents. They would explain the law to him, courteously but firmly. Then, they would list the penalties for violating the law. This usually quieted him down."

Gary said the Negro agent worked to keep the Negro community from doing anything that might inflame public opinion.

"Integration has, however, created one really disturbing problem," he said. "Only 10 Negro teachers are working in integrated schools, and 344 Negro teachers have lost their jobs, since individual school boards, with rare exceptions have not yet seen fit to hire Negro teachers."

Integration Gets Evaluated in Okla. By Ex-Governor

A total of 344 Negro teachers have lost their jobs since the beginning of school integration in Oklahoma, Raymond Gary former governor of the state, said.

In a signed article in the new Look Magazine, Gary reports that only about 10 Negro teachers are working in integrated schools because "individual school boards, with rare exceptions, have not yet seen fit to hire Negro teachers."

He termed this "the one really disturbing problem" that has resulted from integration.

Otherwise, Gary said school integration in Oklahoma has benefited taxpayers, teachers and students, pointing out that the continuing elimination of separate school systems for whites and Negroes has:

Saved taxpayers a million dollars a year.

Enabled teachers' salaries to rise from an average of $3,500 to $4,700 a year.

Spurred the buildings of 4,200 new classrooms.

Gary noted in the Look article that integration was presented to Oklahomans as a means to achieve better schools, and that "a single fist fight" was the only violence that occurred.

Segregation Ends In Pennsylvania

HARRISBURG, Pa., Jan. 16 (AP)—Gov. George M. Leader says he is pleased to learn that all racial segregation has been eliminated in Pennsylvania schools.

The governor made the remark yesterday after reading a Public Instruction Department survey. In 1957 a survey showed racial segregation was being practiced in three schools in eastern Pennsylvania.

The survey showed that 24 schools have all-Negro enrollments, but it said these schools are "located in predominately Negro areas."

Discrimination ban for Philly schools adopted by board

PHILADELPHIA—The Philadelphia Board of Education last week adopted an official statement of policy barring racial discrimination in the city school system.

The statement, which was approved by a unanimous vote, was drafted by E. Washington Rhodes, the only colored member of the 15-man board.

It pledges that the board will not discriminate in the instruction and placement of students or in the assignment and promotion of teachers.

Colored civic groups long have sought a written statement on the board's official policy, charging that 55 of the 245 city schools are all white while 19 have entirely colored student bodies.

School Principal Quits 'Under Fire'

PHILADELPHIA — (ANP)—The principal of an elementary school, which has been the center of a controversy for three weeks following an alleged attack on a seven year-old Negro girl, has announced her retirement, effective Jan. 31.

The principal, Miss A. Reaga Mullen, has been pressed by two community parent groups, charging her with "indifference and alleged incompetence."

The attack on the child by an unidentified man last October 28, was the cause of considerable public indignation. Concerning this incident parents of the child accused the principal of "a general lack of interest and disbelief."

The NAACP, through its executive, presented to Dr. Allen H. Wetter, superintendent of schools, a nine-point bill of particulars.

In the bill there were listed nine alleged incompetences charged to the principal. The last article on the list, the cause of most of the public indignation, was her handling of the alleged lavatory attack by an unidentified man.

Parents of the child accused the principal of indifference. On the other hand, the Board of Education praised Miss Mullen highly for her work in the public school system, and said that her professional record is excellent.

Placement Laws Don't Alter South's Convictions

Advertiser Montgomery, Ala.

The Charleston News and Courier

FINDING The Charlotte Observer in agreement with one of our editorials on forced integration of public schools is a somewhat unnerving experience. Wed. 10-7-59.

When we noted The Observer's approval of our comment on another court decision upholding a Southern pupil placement law, we wondered whether we were slipping, or whether The Observer at last has seen the light.

Our statement that The Observer approved as "eminently sensible" was this:

"By granting a variety of grounds other than race for screening of pupils, the courts may restore antomomy to local school administrations. If racial mingling can be confined to scattered admissions of a few Negroes to white schools, the crisis may be temporary and peaceful adjustments may not be too far off."

Lest anyone misunderstand our position, we reemphasize the word "temporary." Once autonomy is restored to school administrators, we are confident that unnatural and undesirable mixing of the races will cease with mutual agreement.

If it becomes obvious that the court will not order massive mixing, the number of individual Negroes willing to allow their children to be martyrs to the movement will dwindle to the vanishing point. The psychological damage to these children will be obvious, and they will be protected.

Our endorsement of pupil placement laws that omit reference to race should not be construed as acceptance of even "a little bit of integration." We regard token integration as a device to maintain public education. Closing of schools on a statewide basis would amount to surrender in the form of retirement from the field of battle.

In some cases—as in Prince Edward County, Virginia—closing of schools has had a salutary effect. Indeed, it is our judgment that constant, firm resistance to forced integration in most Southern communities is paying off. We believe this resistance has demonstrated to the courts and to the people of the United States that Southerners have reason rather than prejudice and bigotry on their side. The calamitous results of massive integration in Washington, New York, Philadelphia and elsewhere are becoming more generally known.

If The Charlotte Observer and other supporters of racial integration are coming around to The News and Courier's viewpoint, we shall welcome them to the fold.

Pupil Placement Is Approved

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23 (UPI)—Atty. Gen. William P. Rogers said tonight there "would seem to be no constitutional objection" to pupil placement plans if they are not used to continue racial segregation in public schools.

At the same time, Rogers said he did not think the federal government would have to move troops into defiant areas again as it did in Little Rock in 1957. He said he expects the states to carry out their "proper police duty" in protecting the constitutional rights of citizens.

Rogers expressed his views in response to inquiries. Specifically he was asked whether he viewed pupil placement plans, such as the one in Alabama, as an answer to the school integration problem.

Under the Alabama plan there are 11 standards by which Negroes can be barred from moving to white schools. They include student aptitude, home environment, the physical effect on the pupil of attending a certain school, the possibility of a breach of the peace or economic retaliation, plus other social and psychological factors.

The Supreme Court last November upheld the Alabama plan as valid. The court found that "on its face it is not an unconstitutional device to evade school integration."

Unlike the Virginia placement act, ruled unconstitutional by the court, the Alabama law does not mention race. In addition, Virginia's placement act was linked to "massive resistance" laws against school integration.

Rogers, referring to the court's ruling on the Alabama plan, said in his written reply to newsmen's questions:

"I take this to mean that if the law is administered fairly and not as a device to circumvent the decision in the Brown case (outlawing school segregation)—if it is administered without any discrimination on account of race—there would seem to be no constitutional objection."

Asked whether he thought the federal government would ever have to take "direct action" in the enforcement of a federal court order as it did in Little Rock, Rogers replied:

"It is clear that each state has an affirmative duty to use its police power so that no person may be denied his constitutional rights as a result of violence or lawlessness.

"Most states have made it clear that they are fully capable of performing this duty and intend to discharge it. If this is the case and the states perform proper police duty in protecting the lawfully determined rights of its citizens, then the executive branch of the government will not be called upon to discharge its ultimate duty to support and insure the carrying out of a final decision of a federal court in that manner."

Rogers and other Justice Department officials, however, always have maintained it is the federal government's responsibility to "vindicate" the court's authority when its orders are defied.

Placement laws have been adopted in 10 Southern states since the Supreme Court outlawed compulsory segregation.

Rogers Says

Placement Plan Seems Constitutional

WASHINGTON (AP)—Atty. Gen. William P. Rogers said Friday a pupil placement plan in public schools would seem to be constitutional, if it were not used to discriminate against Negroes.

In another aspect of the racial integration situation, Rogers said he did not believe the need would again arise for the kind of direct action which the federal government took at Little Rock in 1957. President Eisenhower at that time used federal troops to protect attendance of Negroes whose admission to a white high school had been ordered by a federal court.

Rogers was asked for his views regarding the use of pupil placement plans as an answer to the school integration problem. He was specifically asked about an Alabama plan which the Supreme Court held last November to be "not unconstitutional on its face."

Rogers, in a written reply, said:

"As you know, the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the Alabama pupil placement law as written does not violate the Constitution. I take this to mean that if the law is administered fairly and not as a device to circumvent the decision in the Brown case (one of the original integration cases) — if it is administered without any discrimination on account of race there would seem to be no constitutional objection."

The question about a possible repetition of the direct action taken at Little Rock brought this response:

"It is clear that each state has an affirmative duty to use its police power so that no person may be denied his constitutional rights as a result of violence or lawlessness. . . If. . . the states perform their proper police duty in protecting the lawfully determined rights of its citizens then the executive branch of the government would not be called upon to discharge its ultimate duty to support and insure the carrying out of a final decision of a federal court in that manner."

RESPONDS TO INQUIRIES

By United Press International

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23. — Atty. Gen. William P. Rogers said Friday night there "would seem to be no constitutional objection" to pupil placement plans so long as they are not used to continue racial segregation in public schools.

At the same time, Rogers said he did not think the Federal Government would have to move troops into defiant areas again as it did in Little Rock in 1957. He said he expected the states to carry out their "proper police duty" in protecting the constitutional rights of citizens.

Rogers expressed his views in response to inquiries. Specifically he was asked whether he viewed such pupil placement plans as the one in Alabama as an answer to the school integration problem.

Standards Listed

Under the Alabama plan there are 11 standards by which Negroes can be barred from moving to white schools. They include student aptitude, home environment, the physical effect on the pupil of attending a certain school, the possibility of a breach of the peace or economic retaliation, plus other social and psychological factors.

The Supreme Court last November upheld the Alabama plan as valid. The court found that "on its face it is not an unconstitutional device to evade school integration."

Rogers, referring to the court's ruling on the Alabama plan, said in his written reply to newsmen's questions:

"I take this to mean that if the law is administered fairly and not as a device to circumvent the decision in the Brown case (outlawing school segregation)—if it is administered without any discrimination on account of race—there would seem to be no constitutional objection."

Each Has Duty

Asked whether he thought the Federal Government would ever have to take "direct action" in the enforcement of a Federal Court order as it did in Little Rock, Rogers replied:

"It is clear that each state has an affirmative duty to use its police power so that no person may be denied his constitutional rights as a result of violence or lawlessness.

"Most states have made it clear that they are fully capable of performing this duty and intend to discharge it. If this is the case and the states perform their proper police duty in protecting the lawfully determined rights of its citizens, then the executive branch of the Government will not be called upon to discharge its ultimate duty to support and insure the carrying out of a final decision of a Federal Court in that manner."

Rogers Accepts Placement Law

Attorney General William P. Rogers declared yesterday that a pupil placement law fairly applied appeared to be one valid approach for the South to its school problem.

Asked if he felt that the Supreme Court's November decision holding that Alabama's placement law was not invalid on its face pointed the way for the South to follow, Rogers said:

"I take this to mean that if the law is administered fairly and not as a device to circumvent the Brown decision (the Court's 1954 decision outlawing enforced segregation)—if it is administered without any discrimination on accout of race—there would seem to be no constitutional objection."

This was lower Federal courts had said two year ago in upholding North Carolina's placement law and last year in upholding Alabama's. The Supreme Court refused to review the North Carolina case and held the Alabama law as written.

Rogers' view was not new. But the statement, coming from the Government's top legal official as Virginia pondered its massive resistance wreckage and Little Rock's schools remained closed, might be taken as a suggestion of what the South could do.

Pupil placement laws have been enacted by most Southern states since the Supreme Court's original school decision. They made no mention of race. But they set up other standards for assigning students to particular schools. The Alabama law contained 17 standards including available classroom space, availability of transportation and scholastic aptitude of the student.

The Alabama law also permits local school boards to take into consideration "psychological relationsships" with other students and the possibility that admission of a student might cause a "breach of the peace . . . or economic retaliation within the community."

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People contends that read against the background of Southern opposition to desegregation the sole purpose of such laws was to keep Negroes out of white schools.

The Supreme Court's answer was that it would presume states will act legally and in good faith until they prove otherwise.

Supreme Court Stand On Pupil Placing Disappoints

SEEN AS EFFECTIVE AID TO SEGREGATION

NEW YORK, Oct. 15 — Action of the United States Supreme Court in refusing to review two North Carolina cases challenging the constitutionality of the state's pupil placement law is deplored by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

The Association's Board of Directors adopted a resolcion at tis regular monthly meeting here on Oct. 13, expressing regret that the Court on Oct. 12 rejected petitions for review of the cases.

"The North Carolina statutes, like hose of other states," the resolution asserts, "is designed to impede and frustrate full implementation of the Supreme Court's decision outlawing racial segregation in public education."

In addition to North Carolina, such laws have been passed by Alabama, Arkansas, Florida Louisiana, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

"In administering these laws, the school boards make no effort to desegregate the school system, but reluctantly approve the transfer of a few Negro pupils out of the segregated schools," the resolution points out. "This latest court action encourages this process and relieves school boards of their constitutional obligation to initiate steus to desegregate with 'all deliberate speed."

"However," the Board asserts "it need not mean the end of the public school desegregation process, but to a significant degree the court's action shifts the burden from the school authorities to Negro parents. It imposes upon them the obligation to take positive steps to see that their children are enrolled in schools of their choice. The school boards are merely required to provide a means through which parents desiring to remove their children from inferior Jim Crow institutions may enroll them in non-segregated schools.

"Further, the Supreme Court's refusal to review the cases impose upon local branches of the NAACP the duty to encourage a large number of parents to request transfers. The advantages of non-segregated education must be made clear to parents through an intensive educational program. In areas where the segregated pattern still prevails this should be the primary task for the NAACP branch."

SAN JUAN, P. R., Oct 15 —Pupil placement laws on books of eight southern states will afford segregationists "the best mileage" in their efforts to circumvent the Supreme Court's school desegregation ruling, John A. Morsell, assistant to the NAACP executive secretary, predicts in an address prepared for delivery at the annual conference of the National Association of Intergroup Relations Officials here this week.

Some Southerners, the paper points out, believe "that it is possible to apply the law in such a way as never to transfer any Negro children to white schools and still not incur an adverse ruling on constitutionality." The placement laws establish non-racial criteria as bases for pupil transfers.

These assignment laws "reduce the strategic elements to the levels calculated to maintain the slowest possible pace of desegregation," by imposing difficult burdens on those seeking transfers, Dr. Morsell's paper contends.

Further it notes that "intimidation and terror are peculiarly effective in that they need not be widely exercised to be effective.

"This is especially true in the South where memories of the lynch years are still quite fresh in Negro minds. Economic pressures have been unrelenting, and public recantation of integration views has not always sufficed to restore the victim to his old status," Dr. Morsell concluded.

His address was read on Oct 13 by Joseph Robison of the American Jewish Congress because Dr. Morsell was unable to atttnd that session of the conference having been detained in New York by NAACP business.

Problems of Desegregation

Clarendon County Case Up Again in So. Carolina

Post Wash. D.C. Wed. 9-30-59. P. A-19

By Robert E. Baker
Staff Reporter

Baker is touring the South. This is one of a series of his articles on the problems of desegregation.

COLUMBIA, S. C. — The Clarendon County school desegregation case has popped up in South Carolina again.

Some NAACP strategists did not want it to. They figured that Clarendon, with its 2 to 1 ratio of Negroes over whites in population and its Deep-Deep South posture, was a near-impossible situation.

They thought it better to concentrate on areas in the South where an attitude of moderation on the race issue is more prevalent.

But the Negro leadership in Clarendon County initiated the newest action. The NAACP now is behind it 100 per cent.

The Clarendon County case is one of those involved in the Supreme Court's school desegregation cases of 1954 and 1955.

Started 10 Years Ago

The rumblings started 10 years ago when some Negroes, dissatisfied with dilapidated and inferior schools, began to press for better conditions. Their demands for separate but equal schools developed into a petition for desegregated schooling and the historic Supreme Court decisions.

The reaction to this pressure was twofold. On one hand, the white officials built schools for Negroes, provided them with buses, and equalized teachers' salaries. Some Negroes were qualified to vote.

On the other hand, three Negro teachers said they were not rehired because their father and the husband of one signed a desegregation petition. A Negro minister, who helped organize the desegregation movement, fled to New York after his home and church burned down.

The head of an NAACP chapter reported two cases of his home being blasted by shotguns. Credit, customary and necessary for Negroes in farming, was cut off. Negro merchants reported boycotts by white wholesalers.

The White Citizens Council tightly organized the white community.

For the state as a whole, the South Carolina Legislature enacted just about every anti-integration law possible, including a funds cut-off law for integrated schools.

Situation Has Cooled Off

Recently, the situation cooled off a bit. The White Citizens Council had a housecleaning to purge its violence-prone members. Gov. Ernest F. Hollings, a strong segregationist, has deliberately tried to play down the volatile issue. At a press conference earlier this month, Hollings gently counseled reporters to deal with the issue conservatively.

Meanwhile, NAACP attorneys were busily attacking anti-integration postures in other states. It looked as if Clarendon County would be allowed to sit a while.

But recently the Negro parents of 84 Clarendon County children petitioned for desegregation there, not only in School District No. 1, the one directly affected by the Supreme Court decision, but in School Districts Nos. 2 and 3 as well.

A leader in the movement is Billy Fleming, insurance man and undertaker in Manning. Fleming, a native of Clarendon County, was a Naval officer in World War II and is an NAACP leader in the state.

Improvising in Schools

"We are thoroughly convinced that, in a segregated system, you can never have equality," said Fleming.

"Sure, there are new schools. But look at the equipment in the Negro school. Improvised. A nonexistent science department, for example.

"These petitions are signed by people who have a sincere love for their children. Each one is saying: 'I don't want my children to have second-class education, or be second-class citizens.'

"The white man has not equalized the schools. He uses no criteria for teachers. Some of them he hires as informers, to keep himself informed.

"It's a lousy educational system, and the Negroes are disgusted. The Negroes have taken everything the white man has dished out in these last few years. Now they are just as eager, if not more so, to do something about it than they were in 1951.

Devoted to NAACP

"Nowhere in the United States will you find a group of people more devoted to the NAACP than the Negroes of Clarendon County. The NAACP opens the door to a new way of life. The white man knows that the Negro has that weapon."

School District No. 2 rejected the petition on the grounds that assignments to schools already had been made for this year. The other two school districts did not reply.

In Columbia, Lincoln C. Jenkins Jr., attorney for the petitioners and a member of the NAACP, said:

"I anticipate going into court."

Clarendon Given Gressette Blessing

Courier Wed. 9-9-59
Charleston, S. C. P. I-B.

COLUMBIA (AP) — The chairman of the State Segregation Committee indicated Tuesday that there is no cause for alarm in the application of 51 Negro pupils for transfer to white schools in Clarendon County.

Following a closed meeting here the chairman, State Sen. L. Marion Gressette of Calhoun County said it was the consensus of the committee "that local officials are acting entirely within state law and have the matter well in hand." Clarendon was one of the five areas on which the U.S. Supreme Court based its 1954 decision against racially segregated public schools.

Gressette reiterated that the advice of the committee's counsel and legal staff "are available to all school trustees and other officials."

But, he said, "State law gives them full authority to handle their own affairs."

Gressette said the committee has no further recommendations to make to Gov. Hollings or to the General Assembly at this time. Hollings attended the meeting and was pledged the committee's continued cooperation, the senator said.

In addition to the Clarendon County school matter, Gressette said, the committee held a general discussion "of the situation surrounding our public schools as they opened for the 1959-60 session."

Clarendon County school officials have not yet acted upon the transfer requests, made about 10 days ago by the parents of the 51 Negro students.

No reason was given for requesting the transfers. A spokesman for the Negro parents said the requests were filed under South Carolina's Pupil Placement Law. He said this statute was a dilatory one, aimed at stopping integration through legal delays.

Clarendon Official Says 'No Mixing'

High state officials yesterday declined comments on the applications of Clarendon County Negroes to enter white schools but the county's school superintendent vowed there would be no racial integration there this fall. Post 8-31-59 P. 1.

"There will be no Negroes in the [illegible]s of Clarendon County when they open," asserted the Rev. L. B. McCord, the Clarendon superintendent.

Meanwhile Gov. E. F. Hollings said in Charleston he would make no statement on the application of at least 15 Negroes for reassignment to white schools in Clarendon's School District 1. Disembarking from a tour of Charleston harbor with members of the State Development Board, Hollings declined to discuss any phase of the matter.

Both Att. Gen Daniel R. McLeod and State Sen. L. Marion Gressette, chairman of the state's segregation committee, also remained silent.

SPECIAL MEETING

Between 15 and 18 applications for reassignment to white schools were received last Friday, according to W. Cantey Sprott, chairman of the district's school board. He said yesterday the applications involved both high and elementary schools but would not name the schools. He expects to call a special meeting of the school board to consider them but as of last night had not decided when.

Clarendon's white schools open this Thursday and the Negro schools on Sept. 14.

The basis for the reassignment requests could not be learned. Sprott said he could not release details until the school board has met. He said, however, that the requests were not based on arguments that Negro schools in the district are inferior to the whites'.

ORIGINAL CASE

Summerton's schools produced one of the five original cases on which the Supreme Court based its 1954 desegregation decision. They were last in the courts in July, 1955, when a three-judge panel in Columbia enjoined the district from refusing admission because of race. No deadline was set, however, and local school officials were given more time to work out their plan.

The district has one of the largest Negro populations in South Carolina. According to Superintendent McCord, there are 2,500 Negro students in three elementary schools and one high school. Two school-one high, one elementary-house about 300 white students.

Mr. McCord said yesterday he does not expect any Negroes to attempt actual entrance to the white schools. "It would be worse on them than on the whites, because we would just have to close the schools. State law calls for

it." 14a VA C

One state segragation statute automatically cuts off funds to any school ordered by a court to accept transfers from another school. In addition, no funds could go to the school from which the student had sought transfer.

Segregation Defended In Charlotte

The News + Courier Charleston, S.C. Thurs, 11-19-59

"And darst thou then to beard
the lion in his den,
The Douglas in his hall . . .?"

CHARLOTTE ISN'T yet the exclusive den of The Observer's John Knight and Pete (Crumpled Culture) McKnight or of the gentleman who is "laughing segregation out of the South," Mr. Harry Golden. But Editor Thomas R. Waring has bearded them in it, anyhow. He told the Civitan Club there the other day that he couldn't decide whether to make his Northern speech or his Southern, especially when he noted that in spite of Charlotte newspaper talk of "accepting integration" and making it work the city has only one Negro with the 1500 whites at the Garinger High School which is described as integrated.

"In my opinion," Editor Waring said, "enrollment of a few Negro children in a white school under duress is not the same thing as acceptance of integraton. It is, as I see it, recogntion of superior force. It is making the best of a bad situation. In time even that small degree of integration may be removed by mutual consent . . ."

HE IS OPPOSED to toke integration, a are this column and most Southerners. He sees the placement laws as "implying at least some degree of mixing" (I don't agree yet, as the Court hasn't said so). "How long the courts will let integration be limited to the variety called token remains to be seen," he says. Evidently, like this column, he is intrigued with the possibility of a court finding the psychology depended on when abolishing segregation controlling now against ruinous integration.

He is one with all of us who say "total integration is impossible."

"Perhaps," he told Charlotte's Civitans, "the psychological arguments about the harm done to colored children by excluding them from white schools may be invoked to protect a handful of lonely colored children lost in an ocean of white faces. Another possibility is that once Negroes see total integration is impossible, fewer Negro parents will be willing to offer their children as martyrs to make court cases . . ."

"In any event token integration should not be rgarded as surrender or even a permanent solution."

IN A HARPER'S piece called "A Fate Worse than Segregation" Howard Zinn pictures Southerners being reconciled to integration by (1) increased Negro purchasing power, (2) sports, (3) traditional Southern good manners and good will, (4) the Negro vote, and (5) desire not to have public schools closed.

Not so! It is submitted that—

(1) Negro purchasing power may develop more under the equal but separate ideal with more Negroes getting to be prosperously leading citizens, merchants, bankers, doctors, lawyers, etc. Ike told the Senate Military Affairs Committee when he was chief of staff that in an integrated army not enough Negroes could hope to become sergeants. That goes for civilian life, too.

(2) As for amateur sports, the white South excells so in football and basketball—the main spectacles—that outsiders will take us on our own terms or be the sufferers.

(3) Good manners have resulted in part from segregation and a sense of noblesse oblige.

(4) Under integration prospective competition for the Negro vote by venal politicians may so outrage the white public that opposition will be more affective than ever.

And (5) desire not to have schools closed includes desire not to have them ruined for education as integration would ruin them. The South is totally determined to have schools and mass segregation, too. The placement laws promise it.

Racial Advancement Requires More Than Mixed Schools Can Supply

The News and Courier Charleston S.C. Sunday 11-15-59 Page 8-A

In his speech Sunday at Manning, Roy Wilkins of the NAACP again took a position that in our judgment puts too much responsibility on public schools.

Such a position, we believe, conflicts with human experience. Advancement of the human race and all its racial components depends on more than classroom instruction, whether integrated or otherwise. People must behave like people, not like trained animals.

Referring specifically to The News and Courier, Mr. Wilkins is quoted as saying that if we "would look at the condition of schools during the period in which the Southern Negro was brought up," we would "realize why that 'social lag' " exists. 14a VI

The story of the Southern Negro goes back a long way—through slavery, emancipation and the long road that both races have been traveling since the Civil War. Free public schools are a relatively recent development throughout the world.

As with most things, their development has been uneven. Some European school systems are said to be more efficient than this country's, whether Northern or Southern. It is not our purpose to debate the relative merits of these systems, nor the dates when this or that one reached certain "standards" as set up by professional educationists or professional integrationists.

We know that Southerners, and South Carolinians specifically, have taxed themselves heavily to support public schools for both races. Public schools for Negroes have steadily improved, along with the white schools. In regions outside the South where the schools have been massively mixed, standards of decency and safety have steadily declined. Newspapers throughout the country— even behind the Paper Curtain — are reporting the bitter fruits of integration. These mixings are warping the manners, morals and intellect of an upcoming generation.

In inviting The News and Courier to "look at the condition of schools," Roy Wilkins, the NAACP and all others of their persuasion also should invite themselves to take a hard look at blackboard jungles outside the South. White people are fleeing from neighborhoods where they operate. Negro youths seem to be learning more about hoodlumism than the three Rs.

Some of the more responsible spokesmen for the colored people — and their voices are now being heard above the NAACP propaganda —are urging racial responsibility along with demands for racial equality. We wish that Mr. Wilkins, with his ability and eloquence, would adopt this approach to advancement of the colored people instead of constantly threatening political duress through oppressive laws and court decrees.

15 Clarendon Negroes Seeking School Mixing

Petitions Submitted To Board For Action

By W. G. BARNER
News and Courier Staff Writer

SUMMERTON — At least 15 Negroes have applied for "reassignment" to white schools of Clarendon County, it was learned Saturday night.

W. Cantey Sprott, chairman of the school board, said the applications were received Friday.

They were mailed from Columbia.

The Clarendon County school board was one of the five boards cited as defendants in the school integration decree handed down by the U. S. Supreme Court on May 17, 1954.

Sprott said no action has been taken yet on the applications. He said the applications will be considered at a school board meeting but no date has been set.

This lower Clarendon County town whose high school lists only about 100 students but whose Negro-white pupil ratio is about eight to one, has straddled the segregation issue for five years.

The 15 applicants for reassignment here put Summerton back into the school segregation-integration picture for the first time since the original Briggs case that made its way to the Supreme Court.

And it is the first reported application for reassignment made in South Carolina this year.

Should the schools here be ordered to integrate both white and Negro schools would be closed, their funds cut off by state statute. The Clarendon County [illegible] also has had a similar provision as far back as 1955. And residents here frequently have said they would close their schools before they would integrate.

Summerton residents saw the letters this week coming as a "surprise." Despite the national attention through the 1954 Supreme Court decision, race relations here have been pleasant, whites and Negroes working together in many jobs.

From time to time, reports have circulated out of the county of economic boycotts of Negroes by white merchants and of firings of Negroes who favor integration. However, not one concrete evidence of either has been unearthed here.

As for the closing of schools residents said in 1955, and have repeated it several times, they do not want to close their schools unless it would come as an alternative to integration. Compulsory school attendance in South Carolina has been repealed.

Summerton's schools are in extra good condition. Three new Negro schools were completed about four and a half years ago; surrounding schools were consolidated and a new white grammar school was completed five years ago.

A handful of Negroes began the original petition suit in Summerton. In July, 1955, state Atty. Gen. T. C. Callison received a petition asking that an additional 200 names be added as plaintiffs to the suit.

The same month two of the names were withdrawn — those of J. H. Richburg and his son, Joseph Richburg — because, the elder Richburg then said, his daughters were being denied teaching jobs on the basis of his signature.

As Schools Re-Open Here

Charleston County's 41 bulging white public schools will open today as approximately 22,000 youngsters return to lessons after three months of play.

Last year, the total of 34,881 pupils officially enrolled in Charleston County schools represented an increase of 2,148 over the previous year. Of that number, 14,653 were Negro students and 20,228 were white students. These figures do not include School District 20, the city schools, which will open Sept. 8. In the city schools last year Negro students outnumbered white pupils, making up approximately 69 per cent of the school population.

If the increase in enrollment is as great this year as last (and most school officials believe it will be even greater), at least 1,500 more white students will enroll in the public school system this year in Charleston County. The first official 20-day enrollment figures are not yet ready for county Negro schools which opened Aug. 24, but the gain last year was 565 and is expected to be at least that this year.

Cooper River and St. Andrew's Districts are anticipating the heaviest increase again because of their proximity to military installations in the county. Both will feel the brunt of additional Navy families moving into Charleston with new destroyer and submarine squadrons being transferred here.

In order to meet the increasing pupil load, Cooper River District this fall will open three new schools—Lambs and Park Circle Elementary Schools and Garrett High School. The new St. Andrew's Junior High School opening today is expected to provide adequate additional space for students in that district.

Last year, 10,737 white and 4,710 Negro students attended Cooper River schools for a total of 15,447 students and the heaviest enrollment in the county. St. Andrew's, with 3,900 white and 1,060 Negro students, was second in district enrollment with a total of 4,960.

Other districts and last year's enrollment, as shown in the 1959-60 budget application, include: St. James Santee No. 1—269 white and 1,163 Negro; Moultrie No. 2—2,020 white and 3,889 Negro; James Island No. 3—895 white and 3,255 Negro; St. John's No. 9—627 white and 1,836 Negro; and St. Paul's No. 23—780 white and 2,655 Negro.

Dissatisfaction With Teachers Is Given As Clarendon Transfer Request Basis

MANNING (AP) — The Clarendon County Education superintendent said Thursday the reason Negro pupils are seeking entrance to white schools in the county must be dissatisfaction with their teachers.

A total of 51 pupils have petitioned for transfers to white schools. Two applicants, Supt. L. B. McCord said, asked for transfer from their school half a mile from home to a white school six or seven miles away.

"We have given them (Negroes) equal facilities and made every effort to give them equal quality in teachers, and they still are not satisfied," he declared.

Therefore, he concluded, dissatisfaction with their teachers can be the only remaining reasons.

He said perhaps the Negro schools, due to open Sept. 14, should remain closed until teachers acceptable to all the Negroes in the county can be employed.

The school board has yet to meet to consider the reassignment requests. White schools opened Thursday without incident, although officers were stationed at schools to which transfers were requested.

The county has 6,569 Negro puils and 2,572 white pupils.

One of the school districts involved is the Summerton District, birthplace of one of the cases on which the U. S. Supreme Court ruled in 1954 that enforced school segregation is unconstitutional.

Last year eight petitions for integrated schools were put before the board in vain. There were no appeals after the requests were denied.

Clarendon School Study Opens Today

ST. MATTHEWS, S.C. (AP) — South Carolina's segregation committee meets in Columbia Tuesday to hear a report on the school situation in Clarendon County. Fifty-one Negro pupils have asked to be reassigned to white schools in the county.

State Sen. L. Marion Gressette of Calhoun County, chairman of the committee, said other routine matters may also be discussed.

This will be the first meeting of the committee since the reassignment requests were filed two weeks ago.

Clarendon County school officials have not yet acted on the requests White schools opened without incident last Thursday. Negro schools in the county will open next Monday.

No reason was advanced in the written petitions for the desire for reassignment.

tempts to force the integration of Clarendon County schools had come as a surprise.

The school district is one of five in which suits were filed that brought about the United States Supreme Court order on May 17, 1954, to integrate schools.

Mr. Sprott said Sunday the requests would be referred to the board at its next meeting.

"Appropriate replies will be made at that time," he said.

He did not say when a meeting would be held.

The state law says that if a Negro student is enrolled in a school, funds for all schools in that district will be withheld.

L. B. McCord, Clarendon County Superintendent of Education, who also serves as president of the local chapter of the Citizens Council, said emphatically:

"There will be no integrated schools in Clarendon County." Summerton white schools are scheduled to open Thursday for the 1959-60 term. Negro schools will not open until Sept. 14.

by Negroes for reassignment to white schools. "We have given them (the Negroes) equal facilities and made every effort to give them equal quality in teachers, and they still are not satisfied."

Thirty Negro parents applied for reassignment of 51 children to white schools. No reasons were given. However, McCord said in one case reassignment was asked for two children from the Negro Walker Gamble School a half-mile from their home to a white school in Turbeville, six or seven miles away.

Could Be Reason

He said the quality of teachers could be the only reason for such a request.

McCord's statement came as the county white schools opened without incident today. Law officers were stationed at the schools involved in the integration requests but no Negro attempted to enroll.

The county has 2,572 white students and 6,569 Negro students. There are 102 white teachers and 192 Negro teachers.

A case brought by the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People against Clarendon County was one of several upon which the U.S. Supreme Court based its 1954 school integration decision.

School Mixing Pleas Denied At Summerton

Courier, Charleston, S.C.
Wed. 10-14-59

SUMMERTON, S.C. (AP) — W. Gantey Sprott, chairman of School District 1, in Clarendon County, said Tuesday night that requests for reassignment of 44 Negro children to white schools have been turned down.

Last month similar requests involving 32 children in the county's School District 2 were rejected. No action has been announced yet on reassignment requests in School District 3 of Clarendon County.

Sprott said letters were mailed Tuesday afternoon to the parents of 44 children in District 1.

He said the requests were turned down because they didn't comply with a regulation that reassignment requests must be in the school board's hand at least 40 days before a new school term. The requests were made in late August, about a week before schools were due to open.

Sprott said the district's board of trustees reached its decision at a meeting here Monday.

The petitions for reassignment were filed by Lincoln C. Jenkins Jr., Columbia Negro attorney. He said at the time that the action was a local move in which the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People is not involved.

MANNING (AP) — Legal matters involving the Clarendon County school desegregation case will be discussed here Nov. 22 at a meeting of the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People.

Billy Fleming, a local undertaker and president of the Manning NAACP chapter, said the desegregation case and other civil rights topics will be on the agenda.

The main speaker at the Sunday afternoon meeting will be Roy Wilkins of New York, executive secretary for the NAACP. Fleming said the gathering will be the largest of its kind ever held in Clarendon County.

In addition to Wilkins, Fleming said participants will include the Rev. I. DeQuincey Newman of Spartanburg, state NAACP president, and Dr. Frank Veal, president of Allen University in Columbia.

Integration Could Produce Rash Of Sub-Par Private Schools, Grimball Declares

South Carolina can look for a rash of below-par "wildcat" private schools if its public education is knocked out by integration, a private school headmaster said yesterday.

Berkeley Grimball, headmaster of Gaud School for Boys here, said public awareness would be a major factor in stemming off the growth of low-standard private schools. He cited a need for discipline in all schools.

He told the Charleston Exchange Club at the Francis Marion Hotel that recognized independent schools now in operation also would help prevent development of such schools.

6-12-59

Grimball explained the place of recognized independent schools, which he said now constitute only 2 per cent of total school population in the country.

Independent, or private, schools have existed since the 1700s in America, he said. He predicted they would grow in importance.

The Supreme Court's integration decision is a factor in preserving independent schools and so is population growth, he said. If public schools are closed, he declared, "wildcat schools may spring up to take advantage of the situation."

Good independent schools, he added, are neither dumping grounds for problem children nor halls of snobbery. Grimball said these often are unfounded popular beliefs.

A program of discipline, he continued, should be the basis of school training. This is possible only through mutual respect by student and teacher, he asserted.

A teacher must also follow Teddy Roosevelt's policy of carrying a big stick, he declared.

"Children like discipline," he said. "They are not happy unless they understand the limits of their freedom. If the pattern of discipline is good enough in the home, the job in school is easy."

Grimball said children should learn early that study is hard work, and that discipline required for science and mathematics should be applied to all subjects.

"A disciplined mind cannot be produced in an undisciplined atmosphere," he said.

He cited the so-called progressive education as changing methods of teaching as well as calling for social reforms. "Independent schools, he added, stand "just right of center in the matter of discipline, which he said must be the approach to the whole field of education.

George F. Von Kolnitz IV of Mount Pleasant recipient of the club's first scholarship to The Citadel, was a special guest yesterday. Club President John E. Huguley and Edwin Guenther were named delegates to the State Exchange Club convention which begins today at Clemson.

Clarendon County Stands Steadfast Against Mixing

SUMMERTON, S.C. (AP) — Clarendon County now stands alone as the only party to the original Supreme Court school integration decision which has not moved toward desegregation.

Prince Edward County, Va., moved involuntarily in that direction Tuesday. The U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals ordered the county to integrate its schools in September. But the order could, and likely will, become involved in litigation.

There were five areas involved in the May 17, 1954 Supreme Court decision — Topeka, Kans.; Washington, D. C.; New Castle County, Del.; Prince Edward County and Clarendon County.

The South Carolina case arose in Summerton, a town of some 1,500 residents and all but about 400 of them Negro, in November, 1949, when Negro parents petitioned for their children to enroll in white schools.

Four and a half years later, after the case made several trips up and down the ladder of U.S. courts, the Supreme Court ruled.

Lower Grades Get Honors Plan

Honor classes for bright 4th, 5th and 6th graders will be operated in about 15 District public schools starting next fall if the Board of Education approves a proposed "three-track" plan for elementary schools.

About 1200 youngsters are under consideration for assignment to the special classes, Schol Superintendent Carl F. Hansen reported yesterday.

Enrollment in the honors program will be limited to pupils working well ahead of their normal grade level. Except in unusual circumstances, only children whose intelligence quotients are 120 or higher will be assigned to honors classes.

Details of the three-track proposal were spelled out by Hansen yesterday at his weekly press conference. The plan would extend down to junior highs and grade schools the system of ability grouping introduced in senior highs three years ago.

3-and-4 Track Systems

The senior high four-track program includes a tough honors course, a college preparatory sequence, a general course for students not planning to go to college, and a remedial basic track.

In junior highs and grade schools, the system would include honors, regular and basic tracks.

A School Board committee will meet at 2 p. m. Monday to consider the three-track proposal. The full Board is scheduled to act on it June 24.

In the meantime preparations are being made to put the program into effect, Hansen said. Yesterday some 75 elementary teachers and 25 principals met at Shepherd School for an "orientation session" on the honors program.

Hansen said honors classes would be set up in each building with a sufficient number of gifted youngsters. The classes will be scattered throughout the city, and eligible youngsters whose schools do not offer an honors program will be permitted to transfer.

"Experience has shown that highly gifted children benefit from special group instruction without losing the democratic values of association in a general school situation," Hansen said.

"If gifted children are not adequately challenged," he added, "they may fail to work to their capacity, they may acquire habits of indifferent performance and may become bored and—as a result—sometimes rebellious and emotionally disturbed."

As for the proposed basic program, it would start at the first grade and replace present special classes for "atypical" and "over-age" children and occupational classes.

Some 2400 youngsters now are enrolled in these special classes, Hansen said. The basic track would include them as well as some others "who need special attention in academic subjects."

Label on Curriculum

Hansen said the basic program "will place the label on the curriculum rather than on the child" and "provide opportunity for greater flexibility, improved remedial work and emphasis on upgrading the achievements of children who are severely retarded."

The Superintendent stressed that basic classes would be taught "on the same principle as regular classes" and would not close the door on any pupil's transfer to a regular program when he catches up with his proper grade level.

Hansen explained the three-track program would set up "an effective and continuous pattern of curriculum offerings beginning at the kindergarten and continuing through the 12th grade with flexibility and variability to meet the different needs of children at each stage of their development."

Want faster mixing—

Negroes to appeal Nashville ruling

Birmingham, Ala.
Thurs., 6-18-59

NASHVILLE, Tenn., June 18— (AP)—An attorney for Negro parents says a decision of the U. S. Court of Appeals upholding Nashville's gradual desegregation plan will be appealed to the Supreme Court.

"I will want to confer first with my clients before making a definite annoucement," said Z. Alexander Looby, who represented parents of children seeking immediate desegregation.

The city school superintendent and the federal district judge who originally approved the plan both expressed satisfaction with the Appellate Court's ruling.

THE COURT'S Sixth Circuit, in upholding the plan at Cincinnati Wednesday, said Nashville's school board acted in good faith in setting up the program, which calls for integration in the public schools to be spread over a 12-year period.

Supt. W. H. Oliver said "We are very grateful" for the ruling. "We will continue to carry out this plan with faithfulness and integrity," Oliver said. "I have felt sure in my own mind all along that it is the best plan we could have here."

Federal Judge William E. Miller, whose ruling the Appellate Court upheld, said "I am pleased. . . . I believe it is the best plan for Nashville, though it may not be the best plan for all Tennessee cities."

UNDER THE PLAN, desegregation started in some first grade classes in the Fall of 1957. Some first and second grade classes were desegregated last Fall and one grade a year will be added until all grades are desegregated. The National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People has called the program a circumvention of the U. S. Supreme Court ruling banning segregated schools.

When Supreme Court 'Goofed'

SOME DAYS AGO the youthful Governor Hollings of South Carolina said that the United States Supreme Court had "goofed" in making the school race mixing decision. This moved the Jonathan Daniels pro-Truman and pro-New Deal organ, the Raleigh News and Observer, to indignation. "Such a wise crack," said the North Carolina paper, "will hardly serve persuasiveness," adding that "the thing the South suffers from most is from a humorless rigidity of its politicians."

The Charleston News and Courier in Gov. Hollings' own state thinks the executive used an excellent word to describe what the Supreme Court of the United States did when the governor said the court "goofed." It insists that "goof" is a good American word that everyone well understands and said that it contains more persuasiveness than a string of polysyllabic, gobbledegook plucked from a legal brief." The Charleston paper then proceeded to do a little analyzing of the Supreme Court in its own way. It said:

"Furthermore, the use of the word is fitting. The members of the present Supreme Court aren't elder statesmen. Some of them are Franklin Roosevelt's and Harry Truman's old political cronies. Justice Black is a former member of the Ku Klux Klan. Justice Frankfurter was the patron of Alger Hiss. Chief Justice Warren is as leftist as an American political figure can be. Justice Douglas is busy delivering biased political lectures when the court isn't in session.

"'Liberals' are eager to cloak the justices with dignity they lack. Southern political leaders shouldn't be so aggressive in exposing machinations of the justices that the rest of the nation, which is slowly awakening to the ugly realities, may find the truth too painful to bear in big doses.

"But the rhetoric of Southern leaders ought to help Americans see the justices for what they are. For that reason, the use by Gov. Hollings of the word 'goof' was more than fitting—it was good strategy."

There has never been a time in American history when the Supreme Court was regarded with less respect than is the case today, not even in the tense days of the Dred Scott decision prior to the war between the states. And nobody is to blame for it but the members of the court themselves.

Not only has the public rebuked the court for trying to write political legislation into its opinions, but the sternest rebukes have come from the nation's highest legal authorities. Even the chief justices of the supreme courts of the states have by formal resolution declared the court has been going too far, and eminent lawyers all over the country have taken similar position. No one has defended the court except the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the demagogic politicians who have courted the votes of the members of the NAACP.

Actually, to say that the court "goofed" in its decision is a mild and gentle form of humor compared with what people are really saying about its departure from law and precedent.

Clarendon Request Refused

School Trustees Veto Negro Plea

TURBEVILLE, S.C. (AP)—Officials in Clarendon County's School District 3 have rejected requests for transfer of two Negro children to a white school in line with action taken in two other districts.

G. Ray Coker, board chairman in District 3, said Wednesday the board gave the reassignment request no consideration since it was filed too late.

The request came from J. E. Wheeler, Negro farmer of New Zion, who asked that his two children be transferred from the Walker-Gamble School for Negroes to a white school in Turbeville.

On Tuesday School District 1 officials turned down requests for transfer of 44 Negro children to a white institution. Last month reassignment petitions involving 34 Negro pupils got similar treatment from the District 2 board of trustees.

In each case refusal to reassign the Negro children was made on the grounds that the requests weren't filed with school officials at an early enough date. The petitions in all three districts were filed late in August, only about a week before schools were scheduled to open for the fall term.

A Columbia Negro lawyer, Lincoln Jenkins Jr., has said he is prepared to appeal the cases in the event the reassignment requests should be rejected.

An integration move, involving Clarendon County schools, was one of several cases on which the U.S. Supreme Court based its 1954 decision outlawing public school segregation.

Clarendon Does Not Integrate

SUMMERTON, S. C. (AP) — The board of trustees of Clarendon County School District No. 1 has rejected requests for the transfer of 44 Negro children to a white school.

W. Cantey Sprott, board chairman, said Tuesday night the requests were turned down because they weren't made early enough.

The same reason was given when reassignment petitions involving 32 Negro pupils in the county's school district No. 2 were rejected last month.

Still pending is action on transfer petitions filed in behalf of Negro children in school district No. 3.

The Summerton board was one of five cited as defendants in the case that led to the desegregation decree handed down by the U. S. Supreme Court in March, 1954.

First Old Dorchester Free School Board Still Exists

By GRACE ALLAN HUTCHINSON

SUMMERVILLE—Since possibility of restoration of the Town of Dorchester has created so much enthusiasm establishment of the first school in Dorchester and subsequent results of the Dorchester Free School Board, organized first in 1724 and still in existence, should be of interest.

An act was proposed in 1710 to establish a free school in the Province of South Carolina. This first effort was ratified to authorize a free school in Charles Town. The school was established in 1712.

In 1724, an act was passed to "found and erect, govern, order and visit a Free School in the Town of Dorchester, in the Parish of St. George, in Berkeley County, for the purpose of educating the inhabitants of South Carolina."

The plan to establish a free school at Dorchester, therefore, was the second in the Province and the first such outside Charles Town.

EVIDENTLY THE ACT of 1724 did not materialize because, in 1734, the preamble of another act states:

"Whereas, by the blessings of Almighty God, the youths of this Province are become very numerous, and their parents so well inclined to have them instructed in grammar and other liberal arts and sciences, and other useful learning and also in the principles of Christian religion, that the free school erected in Charles Town for this purpose is not sufficient fully to answer the good intent of such an undertaking and, whereas several of the inhabitants of this province, who have numerous issue and live at such a distance from the aforesaid school that their circumstances may not permit them to send their children to Charles Town, thither to be educated, whereby they may be deprived of so great a benefit, and it thereby appearing necessary that one or more schools be founded in other parts of this Province as shall be most convenient for carrying on so laudable a design, we, therefore, most humbly pray your most sacred Majesty it be established."

IN APRIL 1734, 12 commissioners were named for the school to be established. They were given the power to acquire, by gift or purchase, property, and to dispose of it for profit to erect a school house and a dwelling for a master.

A public summons given 10 days beforehand was required for all annual meetings, which were to be held on April 23, St. George's Day.

Any commissioner who failed, without good excuse, to attend all meetings, was required to pay 10 shillings. This was to be put into a fund for the school.

The commissioners apparently spent some time and effort acquiring funds but no school was built. In 1756 an act was passed to make more effective the act of 1734.

THE FIRST MINUTES recorded in the original minute book of the Dorchester Free School Board pertain to a meeting of a group of men in the vestry room of St. George's Church for the purpose of "founding, erecting, governing, ordering and visiting a free school at the Town of Dorchester in the Parish of St. George, for the inhabitants of South Carolina."

At this meeting, the oath of office and state oath were given Henry Middleton, as president, and Daniel Blake, as treasurer. Other members of the board were the Rev. Mr. Langhorne, Walter and Ralph Izard, John Ainsley, Benjamin and Joseph Waring and John Ioor.

Also at this meeting 500 pounds, a legacy from Thomas Diston, was given Blake to be added to other funds on hand, apparently accumulated over the years by the original board.

This brought the total to 2,600 pounds. The treasurer was instructed to advertise in the Gazette that he had this much money to be let at interest on good personal security.

IN MARCH 1758 it was "agreed that two brick houses, 23' x 38', one story high, with a Dutch roof" be built for a school house and for a school master. Expenses were to be defrayed by money given by subscription.

In August 1758 the minutes again record that the buildings were in some "forwardings," so a master was needed immediately:

"A master who is capable of teaching the languages and some branches of mathmaticks, and can write a tolerable good hand."

The master was to be offered 300 pounds sterling, plus 40 pounds currency for passage from England on condition that he stay two years. However, for several years no master was obtained.

Minutes of August 1760 state that Samuel Wragge bequeathed 100 pounds sterling to help erect a free school in St. George Parish on the Ashley River, but directed that it not be paid until the school was built, the roof "tyled or shingled and a master established."

It would appear from Wragg's will that up until that time no active school had been in use. It was not until March 1761 that a master was engaged.

THAT FIRST MASTER was the Rev. John Allison. The master was required also to instruct 10 or more children between the ages of 10 and 18, whose families could pay no tuition, these scholars to be selected by the commissioners. The first beneficiaries were William Hobzendorph, John Hobzendorph, a son of a Mr. McClary, and a grandson of a Mr. Roache.

As the school grew, minutes of July 1761 show that the school lots were paled in and a wooden house 308x188; a kitchen and a wash house for the master built. The Rev. Mr. Allison resigned in 1763 and the Rev. William Sergeant was appointed.

His salary was raised. In 1764 it was decided to put "forms and benches around the school for the scholars." In 1769 doors and windows were painted and a "little house with two apartments for the boys and girls built in the most convenient spot near the school house upon the water."

SUBJECTS TAUGHT WERE reading, orthography, writing, arithmetic, English grammar, geography, elocution, Latin, Greek and astronomy.

Holidays were from the third Saturday in August for four weeks, and at Christmas one week, another week at Easter, and one week at Whitsunday. Also, when the commissioners held their meeting at the school house, that day was to be a holiday.

There is no record of the exact location of the school. It is probable that the original buildings were either damaged or destroyed by the British during the Revolutionary War. The minutes of 1796 state that a sum of money was to be used to repair buildings formerly used as a school.

After the war, the school functioned successfully for a number of years but, in 1814, probably because of the dwindling population of the town, it was decided to look into the legal possibility of moving it elsewhere in the parish.

In 1817 an act was ratified to allow Dorchester School to be moved to Summerville. The board already owned land in Summerville. That was the spot chosen to locate the school. As the years went by, location of the school was changed with growth of the town.

The school house and land at Dorchester were sold and the money put away. After this many pupils were helped from these funds, available to those who needed financial help toward their education. This was offered until 1897, when the commissioners decided to make no more outlays until the funds were built up.

IN 1901 THE following resolutions were adopted:

"That the funds of the Dorchester Free School Board be invested in a brick building to be used for a school for white children, and that a tablet be placed in the same building setting forth the history of this fund and this building to be a memorial to the originators of this fund."

The commissioners purchased land and built a brick building. This school was opened in 1906 and leased to the trustees of the school district for $100 a year.

In 1912 it was decided to sell this land and building to the trustees. The building was then enlarged and used to house pupils from the first through the eleventh grades.

In 1925, a new high school was built and the old building continued in use as a grammar school. The old building was declared unsafe and abandoned when a new grammar school was constructed. Subsequently the old building was razed and the grounds are now used as a playground for white children.

IN 1920, COMMISSIONERS of the Dorchester Free School Board decided that a part of their income should be used each year for educational purposes for a deserving boy and girl and that every year the commissioners select the beneficiaries to receive $100.

Some of the names of commissioners of the Dorchester Free School Board over the years are familiar in this section, such as, Middleton, Izard, Waring, Blake, Ioor, Hutchinson, Smith, Guerry, Gadsden, Perry, Coachman, Rutledge, Cattell, Carroll, Miles, Dehon, Foster, Simons, Burden and Boyle.

After more than 200 years, the dream of a few men to help educate the needy in this part of the state is still carried by a similar group of men, some of them direct descendants of those earlier commissioners.

THROUGH WARS, financial crises, the changing of the character of the civilization of this section and the disappearance of the original town for which this help was planned, still a substantial sum has been preserved and is being utilized for furtherance of the purpose for which this institution was created.

(I am indebted to the commissioners of the Dorchester Free School Board for allowing me to use their minute books, and to Legare Walker for lending me the "History of Dorchester Free School," written by his father, the late Legare Walker Sr., and "A Sketch of Summerville Schools," written by my mother, the late Mrs. James Allan.)

Harmony Among Races Cited To S. C. Legislature

No Need Seen For New Laws

COLUMBIA (AP) — The chairman of South Carolina's Committee on School Segregation Tuesday cited harmonious relations between the races as one reason for there being no need for additional state legislation in the segregation field.

State Sen. L. Marion Gressette of Calhoun County said present statutes, "protecting state sovereignty and the rights of the people," also preclude the need for further segregation laws.

In particular, he specified provisions setting up separate but equal facilities for Negroes.

'GOOD ORDER'

In its sixth interim report released Tuesday, Gressette's committee said the state's school situation is in "good order."

"If conditions change or unexpected developments occur, it (the committee) will strive to limit of its ability to be prompt with recommendations to meet them," the report said.

The report reiterated the committee's stand that it would not recommend "any course of action that would force Negroes into white schools or whites into Negro schools."

POSITION PLAIN

"It's position was plainly stated in a joint resolution it helped to draft and which was adopted unanimously by the General Assembly and signed by the governor, Feb. 14, 1956.

"It has not deviated from that position nor has the governor, the General Assembly or the state as a whole," the report said.

The Gressette committee was formed in 1951, composed of five senators, five members of the House and five gubernatorial appointees. Its purpose was to study conditions which might arise from the U. S. Supreme Court decision, outlawing segregation.

S. C. Stands Firm On Segregation, Maybank Says

FLORENCE (Special) — South Carolina is determined to stand firm for the right of the government of this state to control the affairs of its own schools and operate them on a segregated basis only, the Florence District 1 Citizens Council was told Thursday night.

Lt. Gov. Burnet R. Maybank, addressing the gathering at McClenaghan High School, said that South Carolina is also determined to offer the Negro equal education facilities.

Elaborating on the problem, Maybank said, "I care not what other states may do. I do not want to ever see us yield one inch, no matter what pressures may be brought upon us."

Reviewing some of the reasons why most South Carolinians are for segregation, he listed three main causes.

"First of all, we believe that segregation is in accord with the divine will of God, as manifested in the created order," Maybank said "God created the races seperate and distinct and we know that tampering with His creation is a violation of His will."

"Second, we believe that the proponents of integration are advocates of absolute and total integration, not just integration of church and schools, and they would never be satisfied with what some Southern defeatists term token integration."

"Their demands would of necessity result in racial amalgamation, bringing with it consequent disintegration of both races, with a mulatto culture. When and if this ever happens, and God forbid it," Maybank said with emotion "America will be destroyed.

"Third and lastly, we know from having lived with it for generations that segregation serves the best interests of our country our South and both races. There is absolutely no question in my mind about it."

The young state official pointed to the Communist party and the U. S. Supreme Court as being allied in an effort to try to end segregation and destroy America.

"We in South Carolina abhor lynching and mob violence and we will not tolerate it," Maybank stressed.

Pointing to South Carolina as a state where civil rights legislation is not needed, he emphasized: "We are a state of tolerance and understanding, for we have lived in peace and harmony with racial and religious differences for years."

G. L. Ivey, local chairman, presided. State officers, led by Farley Smith of Lynchburg, executive secretary, were recognized.

Clarendon County Unmoved by Order

SUMMERTON, S. C. (AP) — Clarendon County now stands alone as the only party to the original Supreme Court school integration decision which has not moved toward desegregation.

Prince Edward County, Va., moved involuntarily in that direction Tuesday. The U. S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals ordered the county to integrate its schools in September. But the order could, and likely will, become involved in litigation.

There were five areas involved in the May 17, 1954 Supreme Court decision— Topeka, Kans.; Washington, D. C.; New Castle county, Del.; Prince Edward county and Clarendon county.

MOVES BEFORE RULING

Topeka, which had operated separate schools for whites and Negroes under a law which permitted, but did not require segregation, integrated its schools shortly before the Supreme Court ruling.

Washington wiped out its dual school system with the start of the school year following the decision.

New Castle county opened white schools to Negroes in two towns in September, 1954, but has not yet integrated all schools of the county. The state will begin a gradual, grade-by-grade integration this fall, starting with the first grade.

Prince Edward county fought the decision and Clarendon county stood pat.

PARENTS PETITION

The South Carolina case arose in Summerton, a town of some 1500 residents and all but about 400 of them Negro, in November, 1949, when Negro parents petitioned for their children to enroll in white schools.

Four and a half years later, after the case made several trips up and down the ladder of U. S. courts, the Supreme Court ruled.

In the meantime, South Carolina built a new Summerton Negro school (a three-judge federal court had ordered school improvement in a 1951 "separate but equal" decision), began a state-wide 178-million-dollar school equalization program, and chose a stand-pat course on segregation for all its public schools.

City Public, Private, Parochial

Negroes Total 58 Per Cent Of All School Enrollment

Negro pupils make up approximately 58 per cent of the City of Charleston's total enrollment in public, private and parochial schools.

In public elementary and high schools, the negro ratio is about 68 per cent, figures released this week by School District 20 officials show. The figures are based on the number of students who have attended a city school for at least 10 days this year and have not attended any other school in the state for 10 days this term.

Of the city's public school enrollment of 12,502 students (based on the state enrollment figures through May 7) 3,945 of the pupils are white and 8,557 are Negro.

However, a total of 6,904 students are enrolled in the city's public Negro elementary schools and only 2,386 are enrolled in the city's public white elementary schools. The elementary school enrollment, therefore, is about 74 per cent Negro.

In the city's public high schools, the distribution is almost even with 1,653 Negro students and 1,579 white students.

Approximately 2,700 white students are enrolled in the city's private and parochial schools and 562 pupils attend Immaculate Conception Elementary and High School, the only Negro parochial school in the city.

Garry Says Integration Saves Oklahoma Money

NEW YORK, March 16 (UPI)—Former Gov. Raymond Gary of Oklahoma said today that integration of public schools in his State had improved race relations and saved the State money.

"The only fist fight and the only violence that occurred when we integrated our schools," said Gary, whose term as Governor ended last January.

Gary, in an article in Look magazine, said that teachers' salaries have risen from an average of $3500 to $4700 because of an increased efficiency in the State's school system.

"Forty-two hundred classrooms have been built," he said. "Our unified schools save us $1 million a year, as anticipated. The morale of our students is high."

Gary said that after Oklahomans voted to integrate the schools in 1955 there was no organized opposition to implementing that decision because the State took firm measures to avoid it.

"The Oklahoma Crime Bureau, our elite 18-man police force, hired a Negro agent and moved practically full-time into race relations," he said. "When a segregationist sounded off too loudly, he would be visited by a couple of Crime Bureau agents. They would explain the law to him, courteously but firmly. Then, they would list the penalties for violating the law. This usually quieted him down."

Gary said the Negro agent worked to keep the Negro community from doing anything that might inflame public opinion.

"Integration has, however, created one really disturbing problem," he said. "Only about 10 Negro teachers are working in integrated schools, and 344 Negro teachers have lost their jobs, since individual school boards, with rare exceptions, have not yet seen fit to hire Negro teachers."

344 Negro Teachers Have Lost Their Jobs In Oklahoma Integration, Ex-Governor Savs

NEW YORK, (A total of 344 Negro teachers have lost their jobs since the beginning of school integration in Oklahoma, Raymond Gary, former governor of the state, said recently.

In a signed article in the new issue of Look Magazine, Gary reported that only about 10 Negro teachers are working in integrated schools because "individual school boards, with rare exceptions, have not yet seen fit to hire Negro teachers."

He termed this "the one really disturbing problem" that has resulted from integration.

Otherwise, Gary said, school integration in Oklahoma has benefitted taxpayers, teachers and students, pointing out that the continuing elimination of separate school systems for whites and Negroes has:

Saved taxpayers a million dollars a year.

Enabled teachers' salaries to rise from an average of $3,500 to $4,700 a year.

Stimulated the building of 4,200 new classrooms.

Gary noted in the Look article that integration was presented to Oklahomans as a means to achieve better schools, and that "a single fist fight" was the only violence that occurred.

He warned, however, that some areas of the South with "special problems" will require "10 or 20 years" to accept integration and urged Northerners "not to push them into attempting a change that cannot be made overnight."

enied Transfers to 'White' Flee Mixed Classrooms

Edmondson Children Leave District

By PETER H. MOORE

Double talk from Oklahoma City Board of Education this week revealed that segregation is still very much a part of the education system here.

The revelation came to light as an estimated 61,500 elementary and high school children ended their vacation and trooped back to the classrooms this week.

The form is in the method of granting transfers, or student placement. The system is working this way:

If you are white and live in an integrated school district you can transfer to an all-white district with no delay. On the other hand, if you are Negro, you can transfer within so-called Negro districts.

The fact was revealed last week when four Negro families tried to enroll their children at the Harmony school, 24th and Jordan.

Three of the families want transfers because the Harmony school is closer to them than Culbertson, which is in their district. The fourth person wanted to transfer his child from Edison elementary, 28th and Creston, to Harmony because morning classes are not offered at the former school.

Robert Webb, Harmony principal, called the parents and informed them that the school board denied the transfers without giving a reason.

A check with other school principals showed that principals are the determining factor whether or not transfers are accepted.

In the Negroes' case, M. J. Burr, assistant superintendent of school and director of research, told the daily press that transfers are granted only in emergencies and being closer to one school than the other is not an emergency.

However, when Governor J. Howard Edmondson wanted a transfer for his three children from integrated Lincoln elementary and Webster junior high, Burr called it "routine" transfers.

"We have granted about 4,000 special transfers in the city this year," Burr told the daily press. "Any parent can go to the school of his choice and request a transfer. If there is room in the school, the transfer is granted."

The above statement is completely opposite of what happened in the case of Negroes seeking transfers.

The fact that the Edmondson children had made friends at another school they attended last year while the State's First Family suprned the governor's mansion ,takes precedence over the conveniences of Negro' families.

One parent whose child was accepted at an all-Negro school after being turned down at Harmony, plans this week to ask the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to take action against the board.

The NAACP is currently in court in Arkansas where a similar placement of students is in effect.

15 Clarendon Negroes Seeking School Mixing

Petitions Submitted To Board For Action

By W. G. BARNER
News and Courier Staff Writer

SUMMERTON — At least 15 Negroes have applied for "reassignment" to white schools of Clarendon County, it was learned Saturday night.

W. Cantey Sprott, chairman of the school board, said the applications were received Friday.

They were mailed from Columbia.

The Clarendon County school board was one of the five boards cited as defendants in the school integration decree handed down by the U. S. Supreme Court on May 17, 1954.

Sprott said no action has been taken yet on the applications. He said the applications will be considered at a school board meeting but no date has been set.

This lower Clarendon County town whose high school lists only about 100 students but whose Negro-white pupil ratio is about eight to one, has straddled the segregation issue for five years.

The 15 applicants for reassignment here put Summerton back into the school segregation-integration picture for the first time since the original Briggs case that made its way to the Supreme Court.

And it is the first reported application for reassignment made in South Carolina this year.

Should the schools here be ordered to integrate both white and Negro schools would be closed, their funds cut off by state statute. The Clarendon County supply act also has had a similar provision as far back as 1955. And residents here frequently have said they would close their schools before they would integrate.

Summerton residents saw the letters this week coming as a "surprise." Despite the national attention through the 1954 Supreme Court decision, race relations here have been pleasant, whites and Negroes working together in many jobs.

From time to time, reports have circulated out of the county of economic boycotts of Negroes by white merchants and of firings of Negroes who favor integration. However, not one concrete evidence of either has been unearthed here.

As for the closing of schools residents said in 1955, and have repeated it several times, they do not want to close their schools unless it would come as an alternative to integration. Compulsory school attendance in South Carolina has been repealed.

Summerton's schools are in extra good condition. Three new Negro schools were completed about four and a half years ago; surrounding schools were consolidated and a new white grammar school was completed five years ago.

A handful of Negroes began the original petition suit in Summerton. In July, 1955, state Atty. Gen. T. C. Callison received a petition asking that an additional 200 names be added as plaintiffs to the suit.

The same month two of the names were withdrawn — those of J. H. Richburg and his son, Joseph Richburg — because, the elder Richburg then said, his daughters were being denied teaching jobs on the basis of his signature.

County School Population Nears 50,000

A total of 50,000 students may be in attendance at Charleston County's eight school districts for the term beginning in September, according to Dr. G. Creighton Frampton, county superintendent of education.

For the school year ending in May, 47,420 students were in county schools, an increase of 2,139 pupils over the previous year. White students totaled 24,207 and Negro students totaled 23,213.

The City of Charleston was the only school district that showed a decrease in enrollment. The city gained 335 Negro students, and lost 344 white students, for a net loss of nine students.

Cooper River School District 4, the county's largest school district with an enrollment of 15,447, led all the districts in students gained, with an increase of 819 pupils. White pupils numbered 10,737.

The city is the county's second largest school district, with an enrollment of 12,539. Of these, 3,971 were white and the rest were Negro.

Totals for the rest of the districts were: St. Andrew's, 4,960 (3,900 1,060 Negro); Moultrie District 3,880 (2,020 white; 1,860 Negro); St. Paul's, 3,435 (780 white; 2,655 Negro) James Island, 3255 (1,895 white; 1,360 Negro); St. John's 2,463 (627 white; 1,836 Negro); St. James Santee, 1,432 (269 white; 1,163 Negro).

Charleston County has added 10,246 students to its public schools since 1953-54. This is an average of more than 2,000 students a year. Of the more than 10,000 students, almost 4,000 were added in the Cooper River District.

Negro Schools In State Show Advance, Education Dept. Agent Says In Report

COLUMBIA (Special) — Negro education in South Carolina has made some notable advancements during the past 10 years, the 1959 annual report of the state agent for Negro schools, F. M. Kirk, reveals.

Over the 10 - year period the elimination of small, inefficient schools and consolidation into larger units brought improved instructional programs, total enrollment in Negro schools increased by 40,051 and attendance made a better than 5 per cent improvement, the report shows.

In 1949 there were 2,064 Negro elementary schools and 77 accredited or in the process of being accredited high schools in South Carolina. Ten years later, during the 1958 - 59 school session elementary school buildings numbered 401 and there were 137 senior high schools and six junior high schools.

The total enrollment of 215,559 during the 1948 - 49 school term had climbed to 255,616 in 1959.

Of this increase, the total of 192,971 students in grades 1 to 8 ten years prior has risen to 208,501 during last school year, while the number of pupils in the last four years of the 12-year program more than doubled from 22,588 to 47,115, the report said.

Attendance improved during the 10 - year period from 79.42 per cent to an average of 84.85 per cent, the highest recorded to date.

This rise in average attendance and the increase in the enrollment figure for the last four grades, according to Kirk's report, was the result of several factors — adequate buildings, full transportation and the improvement in the holding power and interest stimulation within the school system.

Retention, or failures, in the first grade apparently decreased during the 10-year period. This was indicated in the report by comparison of Negro birth figures for six years prior to the school years 1948-49 and 1958-59 and the first grade enrollments during those school terms.

In the calendar year 1942 there were 22,970 live Negro births recorded in South Carolina. When these children were to enter school in 1949, the total first grade enrollment was 49,255, more than twice the number of births six years before. Retentions were the main cause of this difference, the report said.

During the 1958-59 session the first grade enrollment was 34,493, or 6,800 more than the 27,693 Negro births recorded in 1952, according to the report.

The report also pointed out that Negro educators have been taking advantage of the numerous state-supported training programs, indicating a growing interest in professional improvement.

In addition to the state-supported programs, grants from the Southern Education Foundation have made many scholarship programs available for Negro educators.

Two of the state's Negro principals, one of whom completed his degree requirments in August, studied on doctoral grants last year, the report said.

Clarendon District Rejects Transfers

MANNING, S.C. (AP) — The Clarendon County school board in District No. 2, East Clarendon, has turned down the requested transfer of two Negro children to white schools.

The board said, "It is impossible to grant the request."

The action, taken at a Sept. 7 meeting after receipt of a letter from the State Segregation Committee, was not announced until Monday. The board cited as its reason for denying the transfer requests a regulation it passed some time earlier requiring that such requests be received at least 40 days before a new school term.

Registered letters informing the Negro parents of the two children of the action were to be mailed Monday, a spokesman said.

In all, 78 Negro children applied for transfer to white schools in this county — two to the East Clarendon district, 44 to the Summerton district and 32 to the Manning district.

It was reported that the Summerton and Manning district boards have not set meeting dates to act on the transfer requests.

Meantime, 12 Negro schools of the county opened as scheduled Monday without incident, School Supt. L. B. McCord said. He added that it would be several days before an accurate count of enrollment could be obtained.

148,500 Attend Racially Mixed Southern Schools

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — (UPI) — Southern School News said Friday that 148,500 Negroes are attending racially mixed schools in Southern and Border states.

The News, published here by the Southern Education Reporting Service, said there are a total of 437,000 Negroes in "integrated situations." That means there are that many Negroes in school districts which have made a start at desegregation.

The 148,500 are those actually in schools with whites, the publication said.

There are 800 school districts in Southern and Border states which have started the desegregation process, the News said, and 2,896 districts still are segregated.

The month of March saw efforts speeded up for desegregation, with opposing moves by state legislatures to head off racial mixing.

New desegregation cases were filed in North Carolina and Arkansas. The first desegregation suit to be filed since the Little Rock crisis was filed in Pine Bluff.

No School Integration In 5 States

Report Says 21 Negroes In South Go To Mixed Classes

Alabama is one of the five states which still has completely segregated schools.

Others are Louisiana, Georgia, South Carolina and Mississippi, according to the October issue of Southern School News.

Next highest ranking in segregated schools is Florida, with only one of its 67 school districts having any integrated school.

Other states which have added desegregated districts since June are Arkansas, one; Delaware, nine; Maryland, one; North Carolina, three; Oklahoma, two; Tennessee, one, and Virginia, one.

Dade County became the first Florida district to desegregate when 25 Negroes started school with 770 white children at one elementary school in Miami and at the air base school at Homestead.

In this district there are about 26,000 Negroes and 125,000 whites.

Alabama has 113 school districts, all completely biracial, with an estimated enrollment of 497,700 whites and 292,300 Negroes.

Of the total number of Southern School districts, 2880 are biracial with 762 of these having started or completed desegregation.

The October figures of the News puts 2,486,988 white pupils and 518,357 Negro pupils in "desegregated situations," meaning those residing in districts which have completed or made a start toward desegregation.

But only about 211,000 of these Negroes, or less than half, actually attend classes with white children.

The District of Columbia, with about 87,000 Negro students, and Maryland, with 29,000 of its 131,300 Negro students in biracial classes, account for more than half of the Negroes attending classes with whites.

Washington, D. C. has almost no segregated schools and 23 of Maryland's 24 school districts are desegregated.

Number of desegregated school districts in the rest of the 17 states:

Arkansas, nine of 422; Delaware, 26 of 94; Kentucky, 123 of 212; Missouri, 203 of 2890; North Carolina, seven of 174; Oklahoma, 188 of 1323; Tennessee, four of 153; Texas, 125 of 1600; Virginia, five of 129; and West Virginia, 47 of 55.

762 Districts Mixed, Says School News

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (UPI) — Southern School News, in its September edition, said 762 of 2,880 school districts in southern and border states and Washington, D. C., have some integration.

The publication, put out by Southern Education Reporting Service, also took note of dynamitings in Little Rock, new integration in Florida and federal court approval of Arkansas' pupil placement laws.

Three blasts in Little Rock in September were connected with integration. One of them shook the city school board office.

School integration made further news in Arkansas when the Eighth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in St. Louis upheld the state's pupil placement plan in a decision on the case of Dollarway High School near Pine Bluff.

The Southern School News also said Dade County became Florida's first to desegregate schools. Twenty-five Negro children went to a formerly all-white school at the Homestead Air Force Base and a Miami elementary school.

749 School Districts Desegregate In Dixie

Daily World Atlanta, Ga. Sat. 9-5-59

1440 G.I.

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Five states planned voluntarily or were under court order to desegregate at least 15 districts with the sixth fall school term to begin since the U. S. Supreme Court decision outlawing compulsory segregation in public schools, SOUTHERN SCHOOL NEWS reports in its September issue.

Five other states were expanding existing desegregation programs.

The 15 new districts would bring to 749 the total of desegregated districts in the 17 southern and border states and District of Columbia. There are 2,132 still-segregated biracial districts in the region.

Those with desegregation in prospect this fall represent the smallest number for any school term opening since the U. S. Supreme Court decision.

In the 1956 school year 450 districts had desegregated, 270 were added in 1957, 60 in 1958 and 20 in 1959. The discrepancy in this total of 800 and the 749 total this year is accounted for by the fact that there have been a number of district consolidations.

One state — Florida — scheduled its initial desegregation in two Dade County schools.

With Little Rock's high schools reopened under a desegregation plan, and Dollarway under federal court order to begin, Arkansas' total would increase to 10 desegregated districts.

Eight Delaware districts joined 18 others in that state, with 31 more conceivably possible, as its statewide stairstep plan began with the first grade.

In North Carolina, school boards in High Point, Durham and Craven County assigned Negroes to formerly all-white schools. Token integration continued in Charlotte, Greensboro, Winston-Salem and Wayne County.

Charlottesville prepared to become Virginia's fifth desegregated district, joining Norfolk, Arlington Alexandria and Warren County.

Six Districts Tell Integration Plans

Defender Chicago, Ill.
Sat. 8-15-59

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — At least six school districts have announced desegregation programs for the fall term, and 12 others have scheduled expansion of existing desegregation plans, "Southern School News" has reported.

Plans for desegregation for the first time have been set for Dade county, (Miami) Fla.; Craven county, N.C.; Alluwe, Okla., and Charlottesville, Va. In addition, Little Rock's newly constituted school board has said it will redesegregate the high schools there, closed last year to halt the desegregation inaugurated in 1957. And in Oklahoma, school authorities disclosed that the Ardmore district was desegregated quietly in principle some time ago.

The publication also stated that 39 still-segregated districts in Delaware have come under the statewide grade-a-year integration plan formulated by the state Board of Education and approved by a federal district court. The plan is scheduled to go into effect this fall.

NUMBER MAY REACH 779

Should all 45 districts in the six states desegregate as planned the total for the 17-state region (including the District of Columbia) would be 779, "Southern School News" said. However, it was not anticipated in Delaware that Negroes will apply at white schools in all the districts affected by the new statewide plan.

Extension of current desegregation plans was announced for Fort Smith, Ark.; Dover, Del.; Daviess and Owen counties, Ky.; Anne Arundel County, Md.; Oklahoma City, New Model and Chickasha, Okla.; Nashville, Tenn.; Victoria, Texas; Norfolk and Arlington County, Va.

Fall enrollments for the 17 Southern and border states and the District of Columbia were expected to total some 3,040,400 about 23.4 percent Negro.

The publication reported these other developments:

ALABAMA — Two Alabama schools —one urban, one rural— will be converted from public to private operation this fall to demonstrate, an official said, the feasibility of such a changeover in the event it becomes necessary later on on a large scale.

ARKANSAS — The Little Rock school board went ahead with plans to reopen the city's high schools through use of a pupil assignment law.

DELAWARE — Dover moved to join in the statewide gradual desegregation plan, although it was exempt from the federal court approved 12-year plan.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA — President Eisenhower, breaking his long silence on segregation, said it is "morally wrong" to deny equality of opportunity in the economic and political fields.

FLORIDA—Developments were followed closely in Miami where the Orchard Villa elementary school is scheduled to be desegregated this fall — the first public school in the state to make the move.

TUMBLES

Other Southern States Make Hurried Appraisal of Loopholes

Here Is State-by-State Rundown

NASHVILLE, Tenn.—The court-decreed death of Virginia's massive resistance to public school integration has spurred other southern states into a hurried reappraisal of their pro-segregation positions, Southern School News reported today.

Departure of Virginia from the list of segregated states left six still maintaining separate schools for whites and Negroes at elementary and secondary levels.

These are Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi and South Carolina.

Some, determined to maintain segregation, buttressed their anti-integration laws against the time their turn might come.

Others had under consideration programs aimed to soften the impact of integration. One feature most generally discussed provides for tuition grants for children to attend private schools if their parents object to integrated public schools.

The Virginia legislature adopted such a plan. It acted after both federal and state courts voided statutes which had kept schools closed in some cities until last Monday.

Gov. John Patterson, newly inaugurated in Alabama on a no-integration platform, conceded the situation was altered and that "it is going to be tough to maintain segregation." He told the state legislature it must be ready to act promptly and decisively on short notice.

Sen. Herman Talmadge introduced in the U. S. Senate a proposal to amend the Constitution to place operation of schools in local hands.

At the same time the Georgia General Assembly quickly approved six segregation-strengthened laws sponsored by the new administration of Gov. Ernest Vandiver. This flurry of activity followed a federal court decision against maintenance of segregation by Georgia State college.

A group of Florida legislators announced measures would be introduced at the forthcoming state assembly in April providing for a dual, optional system of integrated and segregated schools.

The legislature in Arkansas, where some public schools are integrated but where Little Rock high schools still are closed, worked on new segregation legislation. Aides of Gov. Orval E. Faubus said it was beyond reach of federal courts.

Desegregation of schools in Norfolk and Arlington County, Va., brought to 798 the number of districts in southern and border states which have made a start on or have completed desegregation. With a total of 2,896 biracial districts, this leaves 2,098 districts continuing segregation.

Other developments, by states:

ALABAMA—U. S. District Judge Frank M. Johnson jr. cleared former Circuit Judge George C. Wallace of Clayton on charges of contempt arising from Wallace's refusal to hand over voting records to the U. S. Civil Rights Commission.

ARKANSAS—Gov. Orval Faubus presented the Arkansas Legislature a new plan aimed at avoiding school desegregation. His advisers said it was beyond reach of federal courts.

DELAWARE—The state Board of Education will present federal court in mid1March a desegregation plan providing for a stairstep start at the first grade this fall with desegregation to be complete in 1970.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—The school crisis and civil rights shared the spotlight at the opening of the 86th session of Congress. Sen. Herman Talmadge of Georgia introduced a proposal to amend the Constitution to place public schools in local hands. Majority Leader Lyndon Johnson won approval of his compromise filibuster measure.

FLORIDA — Members of the state Legislature prepared for presentation at the April session a dual state school system, superimposing a "voluntary" integrated system on top of the present segregated schools.

GEORGIA—The state's first ruling against public school segregation came from a federal judge who directed Georgie State college to stop refusing admission to qualified Negroes. The new Legislature quickly adopted six major segregation-tightening bills sent up by newly-inaugurated Gov. Ernest Vandiver.

KENTUCKY—The 1959 gubernatorial campaign began to warm up with Gov. A. B. Chandler's presidential ambitions an interesting issue but with school segregation not an issue. Better than 80 per cent of the state's Negro school-age population now is in desegregated districts.

LOUISIANA—The U. S. Civil Rights Commission announced it would look into charges of Negroes being denied voting rights; Democratic leaders predicted a possible bolt from the national party over the civil rights issue.

MARYLAND — Montgomery County's school system became the first in the state to set a definite date of termination of segregation at all grade levels.

MISSISSIPPI—The head of the state Democratic Executive committee invited National Democratic Chairman Paul Butler to come to Mississippi and apologize for allegedly telling the South to accept integration or get out of the party. Butler declined, saying he hasn't been that blunt.

MISSOURI—Kansas City, with a start on desegregation in 1955, reported integration of both pupils and faculties had progressed year by year.

NORTH CAROLINA—Gov. Luther Hodges predicted North Carolina's Pearsall Plan for dealing with school desegregation would stand up despite the knockout of massive resistance in neighboring Virginia.

OKLAHOMA—Although segregation is legally dead in Oklahoma evidence appeared in January of continued and lively opposition to integration.

SOUTH CAROLINA — Former Lt. Gov. Ernest F. Hollings took over as the state's new governor with an inaugural pledge to maintain racial separation in public schools.

TENNESSEE — Negro parents appealed to federal court for immediate total desegregation in place of the previously court-approved stairstep plan in Nashville.

TEXAS—A new survey showed 40 Texas colleges desegregated, with 13 others willing to accept Negroes but with no applicants.

VIRGINIA—White and Negro pupils quietly entered integrated classes for the first time. The General Assembly adopted Gov. J. Lindsay Almond's legislative program aimed to ease the impact of desegregation.

WEST VIRGINIA—The Legislature opened its 1959 session with a speech in which the governor made no mention of the racial issue and with the question expected to draw little or no attention at this session.

INTEGRATION STEPS REVIEWED IN SOUTH

Special to The New York Times.

NASHVILLE, Tenn., March 7—Southern School News reported today new efforts to accelerate integration in Southern schools and legislative countermoves to delay it.

New school integration cases were filed in North Carolina, according to Southern School News. In Alabama Negroes renewed efforts to breach school segregation barriers.

Florida faced a legislative fight over its first step toward school mixing. Dade County touched it off with an announcement that one elementary school would be integrated in the fall.

Integration of two more districts in Virginia brought to 800 the number that had started the process in Southern and Border states, Southern School News said.

A tabulation showed about 148,500 Negroes were attending racially mixed schools in the South out of a total of 437,000 in integrated situations. "Integrated situations" means the total number enrolled in a district at grade levels that had made a start toward desegregation—not the number of children in mixed classes.

Civil Rights Issue Joins Desegregation Area Debate

NASHVILLE, Tenn.—The civil rights issue has joined segregation-desegregation as the subject of mounting debate in the South, Southern School News reported Friday.

With the fifth anniversary of the Supreme Court's desegregation decision coming up next month, the publication reported that question still is far from settled. About a third of the region's bi-racial districts are operating racially mixed schools, with six states maintaining complete segregation at the primary and secondary levels.

At the same time it pointed out the closely-related subject of civil rights had in recent days become the subject of increasingly bitter and widespread discussion.

The U. S. Commission on Civil Rights itself continued under attack in parts of the South where it has been branded as an invasion of states' rights.

In Washington hearings were under way in both the House and Senate of the 86th Congress on the Eisenhower administration's "moderate" civil rights program. Southern School News reported these additional developments:

Columbia he considered both the commission and its program unnecessary. He added it would get no help from him in seeking a state advisory committee.

A commission staff member looked around in Mississippi for an advisory committee and left without saying what he had accomplished.

A commission representative was rebuffed in two northern Louisiana parishes (counties) when he tried to see voter registration records.

In Missouri a report by the state Commission on Human Rights said racial discrimination continues in education, employment, housing and recreation despite that state's prompt beginning toward compliance with the Supreme Court's desegregation edict.

Meanwhile the count of desegregated school districts in southern and border states stood at 801 out of 2,890 biracial districts.

South Carolina's newly-inaugurated governor, Ernest F. Hollings, said at Columbia he considered both the commission and its program unnecessary. He added it would get no help from him in seeking a state advisory committee.

A commission staff member looked around in Mississippi for an advisory committee and left without saying what he had accomplished.

A commission representative was rebuffed in two northern Louisiana parishes (counties) when he tried to see voter registration records.

In Missouri a report by the state Commission on Human rights said racial discrimination continues in education, employment, housing and recreation despite that state's prompt beginning toward compliance with the Supreme Court's desegregation edict.

Meanwhile the count of desegregated school districts in southern and border states stood at 801 out of 2,890 biracial districts.

South Seeks New Ways To Stymie Mixing

Acts In Wake Of Va. Collapse

NASHVILLE, Tenn., — The court-decreed death of Virginia's massive resistance to public school integration has spurred other southern states into a hurried reappraisal of their pro-segregation positions, Southern School News reported.

Departure of Virginia from the list of segregated states left six still maintaining separate schools for whites and Negroes at elementary and secondary levels.

These are Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi and South Carolina.

Some, determined to maintain segregation, buttressed their anti-integration laws against the time their turn might come.

Others had under consideration programs aimed to soften the impact of integration. One feature most generally discussed provides for tuition grants for children to attend private schools if their parents object to integrated public schools.

The Virginia legislature adopted such a plan. It acted after both federal and state courts voided statutes which had kept schools closed in some cities until last Monday.

Gov. John Patterson, newly inaugurated in Alabama on a no-integration platform, conceded the situation was altered and that "it is going to be tough to maintain segregation." He told the state legislature it must be ready to act promptly and decisively on short notice.

Sen. Herman Talmadge introduced in the U. S. Senate a proposal to amend the Constitution to place operation of schools in local hands.

At the same time the Georgia General Assembly quickly approved six segregation - strengthening laws sponsored by the new administration of Gov. Ernest Vandiver. This flurry of activity followed a federal court decision against maintenance of segregation by Georgia State college.

A group of Florida legislators announced measures would be introduced at the forthcoming state assembly in April providing for a dual, optional system of integrated and segregated schools.

The legislature in ARKANSAS, where some public schools are integrated but where Little Rock high schools still are closed, worked on new segregation legislation. Aides of Gov. Orval E. Faubus said it was beyond reach of federal courts.

Desegregation of schools in Norfolk and Arlington County, Va., brought to 798 the number of districts in southern and border states which have made a start on or have completed desegregation. With a total of 2,896 bi-racial districts, this leaves 2,098 districts continuing segregation.

Other developments, by states:

ALABAMA — U. S. District Judge Frank M. Johnson, jr., cleared former Circuit Judge George C. Wallace of Clayton on charges of contempt arising from Wallace's refusal to hand over voting records to the U. S. Civil Rights Commission.

ARKANSAS — Gov. Orval Faubus presented the Arkansas Legislature a new plan aimed at avoiding school desegregation. His advisers said it was beyond reach of federal courts.

DELAWARE — The state Board of Education will present federal court in mid-March a desegregation plan providing for a stairstep start at the first grade this fall with desegregation to be complete in 1970.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA— The school crisis and civil rights shared the spotlight at the opening of the 86th session of Congress. Sen. Herman Talmadge of Georgia introduced a proposal to amend the Constitution to place control of schools in local hands. Majority Leader Lyndon Johnson won approval of his compromise filibuster measure.

FLORIDA — Members of the state Legislature prepared for presentation at the April session a dual state school system, superimposihg a "voluntary" integrated system on top of the present segregated schools.

GEORGIA — The state's first ruling against public school segregation came from a federal judge who directed Georgia State college to stop refusing admission to qualified Negroes. The new Legislature quickly adopted six major segregation - tightening bills sent up by newly-inaugurated Gov. Ernest Vandiver.

KENTUCKY — The 1959 gubernatorial campaign began to warm up with Gov. A. B. Chandler's presidential ambitions an interesting issue but with school segregation not an issue. Better than 80 percent of the state's Negro school-age population now is in desegregated districts.

LOUISIANA — The U. S. Civil Rights Commission announced it would look into charges of Negroes being denied voting rights; Democratic leaders predicted a possible bolt from the national party over the civil rights issue.

MARYLAND — Montgomery County's school system became the first in the state to set a definite date for termination of segregation at all grade levels.

MISSISSIPPI — The head of state Democratic Executive Committee invited National Democratic Chairman Paul Butler to come to Mississippi and apologize for allegedly telling the South to accept integration or get out of the party. Butler declined, saying he hadn't been that blunt.

MISSOURI — Kansas City, with a start on desegregation in 1955, reported integration of both pupils and faculties had progressed year by year.

VIRGINIA integrates schools —With the collapse of the state's massive resistance laws, a number of Negro students were enrolled in previously all-white school. Above photo now mixed crowd as history is being made.

New Look Taken At School Laws

Southern States Concerned By Fate Of Virginia

DEVELOPMENTS LISTED

Special to The Commercial Appeal

NASHVILLE, Feb. 7.—The fall of Virginia from the segregated school ranks last week has caused concern in other Southern states.

Southern School News reported Saturday that a hurried reappraisal is under way of pro-segregation laws to see whether they will survive court tests. Those laws failed in Virginia.

The intensive look was being taken in Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi and South Carolina. Some states fortified their anti-integration laws against the time their turn might come.

Under Consideration

Others had under consideration programs aimed to soften the impact of integration. One feature most generally discussed provides for tuition grants for children to attend private schools if their parents object to integrated public schools.

The Virginia Legislature adopted such a plan. It acted after both Federal and state courts voided statutes which had kept schools closed in some cities until last Monday.

At the same time the Georgia General Assembly quickly approved six segregation-strengthening laws sponsored by the new administration of Gov. Ernest Vandiver. This flurry of activity followed a Federal court decision against maintenance of segregation by Georgia State College.

A group of Florida legislators announced measures would be introduced at the forthcoming state assembly in April providing for a dual, optional system of integrated and segregated schools.

New Legislation

The Legislature in Arkansas, where some public schools are integrated but where Little Rock high schools are still closed, worked on new segregation legislation. Aides of Gov. Orval E. Faubus said it was beyond reach of Federal courts.

SERS Book Probes Education in South

Desegregation Issue To Be Fully Developed; Summer Publication Set

Directors of the Southern Education reporting service approved yesterday publication of a book dealing with public education in the South since segregation-desegregation became a major issue in 1952.

The board, at its annual meeting, also received a report on a recently completed segregation-desegregation documentary, "Facts on Film." This is the SERS library on microfilm, the first time filming of a complete library has been undertaken.

Philip H. Coombs, Ford foundation education program director, and John Scanlon, program associate, both of New York, attended the meeting and discussed other foundation-supported activities such as SERS.

Present were Frank Ahlgren, editor of the Memphis Commercial Appeal and SERS board chairman; Thomas R. Waring, editor of the Charleston, S.C., News and Observer and board vice chairman; Dr. Harvie Branscomb, chancellor, Vanderbilt university; Dr. Luther H. Foster, president, Tuskegee institute; Dr. Henry H. Hill, president, George Peabody college; Charles Moss, executive editor, the Nashville Banner; Dean George N. Redd, Fisk university; Bert Struby, general manager, Macon (Ga.) Telegraph and News; Henry I. Willett, superintendent of Richmond, Va., schools; and Edward D. Ball, SERS executive director.

Board Members Re-Elected

Board members whose terms expired and who were re-elected included Coleman A. Harwell, editor, THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN, presently in Europe on a U.S. State Department assignment; Dr. Hill, Dean Redd and C. A. McKnight, editor of the Charlotte Observer and first executive director of SERS on its founding in 1954.

The book on Southern education, as yet untitled, will be published in the summer. It is based on data gathered from the 17 Southern states under a grant from the Fund for the Advancement of Education.

The material, collected by a team directed by Dr. Bennie Carmichael, co-ordinator of the Peabody-Public School Co-operative program, deals with seven phases of education—enrollment and attendance, revenue, expenditures, personnel, transportation, buildings and equipment, and special services—as well as with population, industrial and agragrian developments from 1952 to 1957.

The book will be in two parts—a narrative section for the lay reader and a statistical section for the scholar and researcher.

"It takes a long and searching look at the South," Ball said. "The results are surprising, sometimes startling.

"Although it deals with the educational picture in general, and is not based primarily on the racial issue, segregation-desegregation plays a major role in anything written on Southern schools in the '50's."

Included 700 Tables

The mass of data collected by SERS is included in upwards of 700 tables. These will be boiled down to some 65 tables for publication.

All the raw data will be added to the SERS library for use by students and researchers. It also will be microfilmed and added to "Facts On Film" and made available separately for researchers and commercial survey organizations.

Intraduction to the book's statistical section will be written by Dr. John A. Griffin, associate professor of sociology at Emory university who has written a number of books on education in the South.

The introduction to the narrative section will be Relman Morin, Associated Press writer and holder of two Pulitzer awards, one of them for his coverage of the Little Rock school crisis.

Writers contributing chapters include Patrick E. McCauley, assistant director of SERS; William H. McDonald, assistant editor, the Montgomery Advertiser; Waldon James, associated editor, the Louisville Courier-Journal; Edgar L. Jones, editorial writer, the Baltimore Sun; W. D. Workman Jr., Columbia, S.C., capital correspondent; Tom Flake, Nashville Banner staff writer; Richard M. Morehead, Austin bureau chief for the Dallas News; and Overton Jones, associate editor, the Richmond Times-Dispatch.

"Facts On Film" is being made available to colleges, libraries, state governments, historical and sociological organizations on a cost basis.

The first installment covers May 1954 to June 1958. Annual supplements are guaranteed through 1961 and for additional years beyond if SERS continues its operations.

Initial subscribers to the film, which has won commendation of Dr. Arthur M. Schlesinger and other noted historians, editors and sociologists, include: Civil Rights commission, Mississippi Southern college, New York city public library, Southern Regional council, University of South Carolina, Virginia State college, Memphis State university, University of Arkansas, University of Kentucky, Cornell university, Wintrop college, Ohio State university, North Carolina State college at Durham, North Texas State college, Dartmouth college, Northwestern State college of Louisiana, Louisiana State university, Southern Illinois university, University of Pennsylvania and Johns Hopkins university.

SERS Directors Vote To Publish 8-Year Survey

Banner, Mon. 3-16-59 P. 17

The directors of the Southern Education Reporting Service approved a proposal Sunday to publish an eight-year survey of Southern educational developments.

In their annual meeting, the directors also re-elected four members of the board and heard a report from Executive Director Edward D. Ball on the recently completed SERS "Facts on Film."

The book to be published this summer will be based on data gathered from 17 Southern states under a grant from the fund for the advancement of education by a team directed by Bennie Carmichael, co-ordinator of the Peabody-public school cooperative program.

The book, Ball told the board, is not based primarily on the racial issue, but he added: "Segregation-desegregation plays a major role in anything written on Southern schools in the '50s."

SERS is a non-profit agency seeking to report impartially and completely the events following the Supreme Court's school desegregation decision of May 1954. It is supported by the Ford Foundation.

Ball said the introduction to the narrative section of the book will be written by Relman Morin, Associated Press writer and winner of two Pulitzer prizes, including one for reporting during the Little Rock crisis.

The book also will include 65 statistical tables in a second part. These will be condensed from the mass of data which will be retained in the SERS files for reference by scholars and other researchers.

The information will also be included in supplements of "Facts on Film," the agency's microfilm of its extensive file of information on segregation and desegregation.

During the weekend the SERS board, which publishes the monthly Southern School News, also approved final details for a cooperative working arrangement with the Vanderbilt School of Law on the issuance of the Race Relations Law Reporter, a quarterly publication which deals with the judicial and legislative phases of the segregation-desegregation question. Representing Vanderbilt at the conference were John W. Wade, dean of the law school, and Paul Sanders, director of the Race Relations Reporter.

Directors re-elected for new terms on the board include: Coleman A. Harwell, editor of the Nashville Tennessean; Dr. Henry H. Hill, president of Peabody College for teachers, Nashville; Dean George N. Redd of Fisk University, Nashville; and C. A. McKnight, editor of the Charlotte Observer.

Philip H. Coombs, Ford Foundation education program director, and John Scanlon, program associate, both of New York, also attended the meeting.

Other directors present were Frank Algren, editor, Memphis Commercial Appeal; Harvie Branscomb, Chancellor, Vanderbilt University; Luther H. Foster, president, Tuskegee Institute, Tuskegee, Ala.; Charles Moss, executive editor, THE BANNER; Don Shoemaker, editorial page editor, Miami Herald; Bert Struby, general manager, Macon Telegraph and News, Macon, Ga.; Thomas R. Waring, editor, Charleston News & Courier, Charleston, S. C.; Henry I. Willett, Superintendent of Schools, Richmond, Va. Algren is chairman.

Quality, Quantity No. 1 School Woe

Foundation Official Says Boost Needed In Both Areas

By GARRY FULLERTON
Education News Editor

America's number one educational problem is how to boost quality and quantity at the same time, the educational program director of the Ford Foundation said here yesterday.

"It comes as something of a shock to realize that children now entering elementary school are going to spend a good part of their lives in the 21st century," said Philip H. Coombs. "What kind of education are we going to give these children to equip them for life in the 21st century? Obviously even the best models from the past are not good enough."

Coombs was interviewed as he arrived with John J. Scanlon, Ford Foundation program associate, to attend today's board meeting of the Southern Education Reporting Service. SERS, an information agency in the field of public school segregation-desegregation, is supported by a Ford Foundation grant. Jun, 3-15-59

Revolution Suggested

In order to improve quality and quantity at the same time, American education must undergo a revolution in technique on the order of the industrial revolution Coombs said.

"Actually, that revolution has already begun," he said. "During the past five years, and especially the past two years, we have seen more fundamental experiments in education than at any period in the past. There has been a much greater willingness to experiment, both on the part of educators themselves and on the part of the general public. And there has been a far greater variety of experiments than ever before."

Educational television is one of the most dramatic of the innovations, he said, but there have been many others.

The Ford Foundation, through its grants, is encouraging these experiments, he said.

Scarcest Resource Not Money

"Our general philosophy," he said, is this: We realize that our educational system has to be improved first by greater investment of money and greater investment of manpower. But we also realize that there are limits to our resources and that to do the job the system has got to make better use of its money and manpower.

"Actually, our scarcest resource is not dollars. In our expanding economy, we have the money if we're willing to spend it. Our biggest lack is talented manpower for teaching. Brain power is in demand for all the other professions, too, and unfortunately our schools and colleges are at a competitive disadvantage when it comes to bidding for talent. To correct that situation, we must not only increase teachers' salaries. We must also find ways to reach more people, more effectively with our rare and unusual teachers."

Coombs also is secretary and research director of the Ford Foundation's affiliate, the Fund for the Advancement of Education. Both the fund and the foundation support educational experiments, he said, the difference being that the fund, which has less money to spend, usually takes on pilot projects on a small scale, while the foundation subsidizes those which have already been developed to a certain extent.

Ratio Attacked As Index

Coombs attacked the teacher-pupil ratio as an index of educational quality.

"Research simply does not bear out the contention that the lower the ratio the better the learning," he said. "If it proves anything at all, it proves that different ratios are needed for different cases. In Pittsburgh recently, for example, Robert Frost taught 3000 pupils in fifth grade English classes. He did it by television. On the other hand, a child who has a particularly difficult time learning to read might need a teacher all to himself for a while. The one ratio which cannot be justified, for all purposes, is the ratio of one to 30 or one to 25."

What's happening, state by state—

Deep South still segregated five years after court ruling

NASHVILLE, Tenn., May 7—The South nears the fifth anniversary of the U. S. Supreme Court's desegregation decision with 802 biracial school districts desegregated and some 2100 still segregated.

These figures represent totals in 17 Deep South, Middle South and border states and the District of Columbia which had compulsory racial segregation in public schools before the court's May 17, 1954, decision.

The region has an over-all total of 8597 school districts, of which 6568 are not biracial.

Records maintained by "Southern School News" show that by the close of the 1956 school year, 450 of the biracial districts had been desegregated. In 1956-57, 270 were added, 60 in 1957-58 and 22 thus far in the 1958-59 school year.

Prospects at present are that two districts will be added in the Fall. Dade County (Miami), Fla., has announced it would desegregate a grammar school and Charlottesville, Va., is slated to be the fifth Virginia district to do so.

OF THE DESEGREGATED districts, 783 are in border states: Delaware 12 of 57, plus five all-white districts which also have policies of desegregation; Kentucky 123 of 175; Maryland 21 of 23; Missouri 211 of 244; Oklahoma 237 of 271; Texas 125 of 722, and West Virginia all of 43 plus four all-white which have announced desegregation as a policy.

In the Mid-South, Arkansas has desegregated 8 of 228 districts; North Carolina 4 of 172; Tennessee, 3 of 141; Virginia, 4 of 129—a total of 19.

There has been no desegregation of public schools in the Deep South states of Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi and South Carolina. There have been some Negroes enrolled at the college level in Louisiana and Florida.

APPROXIMATELY 439,000 Negro school pupils are in what is called "integrated situations." This means districts which have begun or completed desegregation. But the actual number attending schools with white children is about 140,000.

Other developments by states:

ALABAMA—The State Legislature is in session for a regular biennial session with new segregation and civil rights proposals sharing interest with the problem of finding more revenue for schools.

ARKANSAS—The Pine Bluff School Board, saying that "under existing state laws it is not practical to proceed with integration," announced it was postponing indefinitely its desegregation plan.

DELAWARE — The first statewide stairstep grade-a-year desegregation plan, approved by U. S. District Judge Caleb R. Layton at Wilmington, becomes effective in Delaware with the Fall school term.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA — Southern officials testifying before congressional committees studying civil rights proposals described them as "civil strife" bills.

Near Fifth Anniversary of Decree:

802 Biracial School Districts Desegregated

NASHVILLE—The South neared the fifth anniversary of the U. S. Supreme Court's desegregation decision with 802 biracial school districts desegregated and some 2,100 still segregated, Southern School News reported Thursday.

These figures represent totals in 17 Deep South, Middle South and border states and the District of Columbia which had compulsory racial segregation in public schools before the court's May 17, 1954 decision.

The region has an overall total of 8,897 school districts, of which 5,688 are not biracial.

Records maintained by Southern School News show that by the close of the 1956 school year, 450 of the biracial districts had desegregated. In 1956-57, 270 were added, 60 in 1957-58 and 22 thus far in the 1958-59 school year.

Prospects at present are that two districts will be added in the fall. Dade County (Miami), Fla., has announced it would desegregate a grammar school and Charlottesville, Va., is slated to be the fifth Virginia district to do so.

Of the desegregated districts, 783 are in the border states: Delaware 12 of 57, plus five all-white districts which also have policies of desegregation; Kentucky 123 of 175; Maryland 21 of 23; Missouri 211 of 244; Oklahoma 237 of 271; Texas 125 of 722; and West Virginia all of 43 plus four all-white which have announced desegregation as a policy.

In the Mid-South, Arkansas has desegregated eight of 228 districts; North Carolina, four of 172; Tennessee, three of 141; Virginia, four of 129—a total of 19.

There has been no desegregation of public schools in the Deep South states of Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi and South Carolina. There have been some Negroes enrolled at the college level in Louisiana and Florida.

Approximately 439,000 Negro school pupils are in what is called "integrated situations." This means districts which have begun or completed desegregation. But the actual number attending schools with white children is about 140,000.

Other developments by states:

ALABAMA—The state Legislature began assembling Monday for a regular biennial session, with new segregation and civil rights proposals sharing interest with the problem of finding more revenue for schools.

ARKANSAS — The Pine Bluff School Board, saying that "under existing state laws it is not practical to proceed with integration," announced it was postponing indefinitely its desegregation plan.

Changes Are Noted At 77 States

Drop-off Attributed To Consolidation, Moving Of Families

NASHVILLE, Tenn. —(UPI)—Migration of colored families and school consolidation have reduced by 77 the number of desegregated school districts in southern and border states, Southern School News said last week.

The News, published here monthly by Southern Education Reporting Service, said a new tabulation shows at least 742 districts integrated compared with a previous total of 819.

THE PUBLICATION said that in 40 more districts in Oklahoma school boards have ordered an end to segregation, but there has been no actual classroom integration because of a lack of colored applicants.

Some states have stopped keeping statistics by race, the News said, and consolidations and annexations also make it difficult to keep an accurate and up - to date account.

SINCE THE 1954 U. S. Supreme Court ruling against school segregation, the News said, Mississippi has cut its school districts from 971 to 151, Missouri from 4,022 to 2,1890 and Oklahoma from 1,799 lo 1,365. Five other states also have been making consolidations.

The latest tabulation shows 7,847 school districts in 17 southern and border states and the District of Columbia. Of this total, 2,875 are bi-racial having white and Negroes of school age.

THERE ARE 2,140 of the biracial school districts which are still segregated, the News said.

Race Issue Hot In Two Centers

Little Rock And Virginia Top Other Areas In School Controversies

Special to The Commercial Appeal

NASHVILLE, June 5. — The City of Little Rock and the State of Virginia, two continuing centers of the segregation-desegregation controversy, accounted for the major developments in that field last month, according to Southern Education Reporting Service.

In Little Rock, three strongly segregationist members of the school board were recalled after having tried to fire 44 teachers and school employes on unspecified charges. The board's other three members, opposed to desegregation but not willing to abandon public schools, were retained in the same election.

Decision Overruled

In Virginia, the United States Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals overthrew a previous district court decision giving Prince Edward County until 1964 to begin desegregation. The latest decision directed the county to admit Negroes to its high school this fall. Prince Edward County subsequently voted to withdraw financial support of its public schools.

In general, consolidation of school districts and migration of Negro families have reduced by 77 the number of desegregated school districts in Southern and border states. Now, 742 districts are known to be desegregated.

Other developments by states:

ALABAMA—Gov. John Patterson proposed an annual education budget increase of 42 million dollars and at the same time asked the Legislature for authority to close any public schools facing desegregation.

ARKANSAS — The Arkansas Supreme Court upheld Act 5 of 1958, the student transfer aid law, and a companion measure, the school closing law, which are under consideration by a Federal District Court.

DELAWARE—Federal District Judge Caleb R. Layton III deferred until after the June registration a decision whether to include an attendance area plan in the state's 12-year desegregation program.

Hearings Completed

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—A new congressional battle over school desegregation and civil rights legislation appeared building up after House and Senate subcommittees completed hearings on various proposals.

FLORIDA—The state Legislature, moving into its final days, had passed one of many segregation bills introduced — this one providing for the mechanics of setting up a private school system.

GEORGIA—Hearings began in Federal Court on a suit aimed at desegregation of Atlanta's public schools.

KENTUCKY — Gov. A. B. Chandler's faction lost control of the Democratic Party in a state election which administered a severe blow to Governor Chandler's ambitions for the presidential nomination as a peacemaker between North and South on racial issues.

LOUISIANA — Segregation leaders thwarted a legislative move by state administration forces to ease Louisiana's voter registration laws.

MARYLAND—Three counties announced expanded desegregation plans for the fall term, bringing to seven the number of counties which have signified such intentions.

MISSISSIPPI—A warrant was sworn out, but not served, naming Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the NAACP, when Wilkins spoke at a Jackson meeting observing the fifth anniversary of the Supreme Court desegregation decision. The warrant was issued under a 1955 state law making it illegal to advocate overthrow of the state's segregation laws.

'Boot Heel' Resists

MISSOURI—A survey showed Missouri public schools to be substantially desegregated except in the state's southeast section known as the "boot-heel."

NORTH CAROLINA—A white and Negro school, which adjoin and which are involved in Federal court litigation, were ordered merged by the Greensboro school board.

OKLAHOMA— Sixteen school districts have been added to the state's desegregated districts, making the total 186.

SOUTH CAROLINA—The General Assembly completed its session without passage of additional school segregation laws.

TENNESSEE— Clinton High, whose school plant was heavily damaged by dynamite blasts last fall, quietly ended its third year of desegregation with commencement exercises for 143 white seniors. None of the school's eight Negroes were seniors this year.

TEXAS—The NAACP asked Federal courts in Dallas and Houston to order immediate desegregation of public schools in the two cities.

VIRGINIA—With token integration in four Virginia communities, Negroes applied for admission to white schools in scattered localities throughout the state.

WEST VIRGINIA — A poll showed the state's congressional delegation to be divided on the question of strengthened civil rights laws.

CHANGE MADE QUIETLY

16 Desegregate At Smyrna, Tenn.

World, Atlanta, Ga.
Thurs. 9-17-59. P. 1.

SMYRNA, Tenn. — (UPI) — Sixteen Negro pupils entered previously all-white John Coleman Elementary School without a ripple of trouble Wednesday in Tennessee's first rural public school integration.

The Negro children, accompanied by their parents, entered the school less than 24 hours after Federal Judge William E. Miller of Nashville ordered immediate integration of the school. Its patrons are mostly service personnel attached to Sewart Air Force Base here and all the Negroes are children of Air Force personnel. There are 500 white pupils.

Miller said that since the Air Base is operated on a racially integrated basis he could see no reason for difficulty in integrating the school. The Rutherford County School Board, ordered a week ago to submit a desegregation plan for the entire middle Tennessee County ,asked for a delay until 1960-61. Miller refused the request.

School officials were forbidden by Miller's order to bar the Negro pupils. The school board last month refused to admit the Negroes contending that Rutherford County schools were operated under a "separate but equal" policy. Miller said this doctrine was quashed by the Supreme Court in May, 1954.

Unless admitted to the Smyrna School, the Negroes would have had to attend an all-Negro school at Murfreesboro, Tenn., 14 miles away.

It was also Tennessee's first public school integration above the third grade. Two of the Negroes entered seventh grade classes and one each entered the fourth, sixth and eighth grades.

Sheriff Bill Wilson and two deputies were on hand when the Negroes arrived. School officials told the parents "your children will receive the same treatment as any other child in the school there will be no differernce in any way in discipline and education."

Miller said there was "not a bit of trouble, and no indication of any."

Highest Tribunal May Rule Soon On Desegregation Here

Attorney Z. Alexander Looby And Avon Williams Principals In Appeal Against School Board's "Too" Gradual Decision Against Majority Of Colored Pupils

Washington, D. C., Oct. 15—The U. S. Supreme Court was asked today to review a lower court's decision which approved the Nashville Tenn., 12-year "stair-step" public school desegregation plan.

The U. S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit on June 17, 1959, affirmed a district court ruling which permitted the Nashville school authorities to begin desegregating its classrooms with the first grade and to continue at the rate of one grade per year. This plan takes 12 years to complete, therefore the students above the first grade at the time of the filing of the suit are denied an opportunity to ever enter a desegrated class.

According to a petition for a writ of certiarari filed with the high Court today by NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund attorneys. the lower court based its findings largely on local hostitality and antipathy to desegregation rather than on the issue of how soon desegregation could "practicably" be accomplished.

The Supreme Court was asked to reverse this decision and order the lower court to reconsider the facts as they apply to the case.

The case was originally filed September 23, 1955, with the district court in behalf of a group of Negro children. It was later amend to include 2 white students who wanted to attend desegregated schools.

Highest Tribunal May Rule Soon

Underterred by newspaper reporst saying the U. S. Supreme Court does not intend to hear any more cases from the South involving school desegregation, where lower courts have already passed upon said suits, Attorney Z. Alexander Looby and his assistant, Avon Williams, last week filed another petition with the high tribunal, seeking its review of the latest ruling of a lower court.

What Messrs Looby and Williams want is for the Supreme Court to spell out the reasons it may have for ignoring the strange decision already handed down which condems local Negro students to a wait twelve years before desegration in Nashville is completed, at the present rate of desegregation one grade a year. Among the contentions set forth by Attorneys Looby and Williams are the following:

1. That not all Negro children in Nashville are subject to be desegregated. They thus are taking note of the plan of the zoning system which confines pupils to the school communities in which they live, for the most part.

2. It is contended that there is no justification for the long delay of twelve years to carry out a program of total desegregation.

3. The Court is told that the Nashville School Board is not adhering to the instructions for "deliberate speed" in carryinfg out desegregation.

4. It is contended that no consideration or hope is given to a large part of a generation of pupils, many of whom will have either quit school and gone to work or will graduate from local high schools, such a Meigs, Cameron and Pearl before getting the experience of attending an un-segregated school.

5. Attention is called to the fact that the Supreme Court has never authorized the Federal courts to take into consideration the hostility of any parents to desegregation.

"Hostility" to desegregation in Nashville developed in September of 1957, but it was a case of "more noise than frogs" when Mayor Ben West hurried to the city from a business trip and "took on" a Northerner by the name of John Kasper who started all of the trouble.

The strongest sentence in the brief filed by Mr. Looby and Mr. Williams was stated as follows:

"A doctrine recognizing hostility to the enjoyment of constitutional liberties as a basis for postponment or denial of those liberties is entirely alien to the concept of liberty under law. Liberty could not survive such a doctrine."

It was held by Messrs Looby and Williams that the burden restsupon the defendants (Nashville School Board) to establish that such time (12 years) is necessary in the public interest, and is consistent with good faith at the earliest practicable date. It appears that the school board has shown less of a disposition to carry out the 1954 order to desegregate schools than at any other time.

The school board had stated that it had a big problem in Nashville pertaining to teacher recruitment, should schools be fully desegregated. They feel that many white teachers would quit their jobs rather than teach mixed classes

A number of years ago when colored teachers fought for equal salaries, Supt. Bass demurred and even more vigorously when he was challenged by Attorney Looby to choose colored teacehrs to replace white teachers who might throw up their jobs. Supt. Bass at that time held that the "people wouldn't stand for it."

Nothing like the kind of disturbance has occured in Nashville over desegregation as has occurred elsewhere in the South. Seemingly all concerned are reconciled to full desegregation at an early future date. This early date could come to pass should the Supreme Court find favor with the petition filled by Messrs Z. Alexander Loob ,yand Avon Williams last week.

While Messrs Z. Alexander and Avon Wililams are the principal figures in this latest segregation case carried to the U. S. Supreme Court, it is stated that they are supported in their petition by the NAACP Chief Counsel, Thurgood Marshall and assistants, Elwood Chisolm, Constance Baker and James M. Nabrit, III., all of New York City.

It will be remembered that it was Attorney Looby who brought to a successful conclusion the celebrated case at Clinton, Tenn. Mr. Thurgood Marshall also gives credit to Attorney Looby for the "spade work" which won for Nashville's colored teachers eual pay for equal work in the lawsuit tried in the Federal Court here, under Judge Elmer Davise, now deceased.

Third Tennessee County School Desegregated

SMYRNA, Tenn. (AP)—Public school integration came to the Third Tennessee County quietly and without incident Wednesday when 16 Negro children were enrolled in John Coleman Elementary School.

Accompanied by their parents, they walked a few blocks from their homes at Sewart Air Force Base and were assigned to classes in the first through eighth grades.

All are children of airmen. All but three of their 500 white classmates also are children of airmen. Some had attended a Negro school 14 miles away last year; some had gone to integrated schools in other states.

After the Rutherford County School Board ruled that they should go to the Negro school again this year, the 10 fathers obtained a federal court order allowing the children to attend John Coleman.

segregated schools.

Under the court - approved Nashville desegregation plan, the first, second and third grades are integrated this year. The plan was begun in 1957 with the first grade.

No Negro appeared at Hattie Cotton school, which was bombed during the 1957 crisis.

36 Negroes Register In Nashville

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) — Thirty-six Negro children signed up for racially mixed classes as Nashville city schools began without incident their third year of partial integration.

Police kept watch as the Negroes registered at nine predominantly white grammar schools Tuesday but there were no disorders, such as marked the start of integration here two years ago.

The number of Negroes registering was somewhat below what officials had expected, since about 325 were eligible to attend integrated classes this fall. Last year, 34 of an eligible 230 registered for integrated classes, but six of those later transferred to

Nashville Opposes Review Of Desegregation Plans

Atlanta Ga. Atlanta Daily World p. 1

Dec. 11-13 — By LOUIS LAUTIER

WASHINGTON, D.C. (NNPA)—Opposing a Supreme Court review of lower Federal court decisions upholding its plan of gradual desegregation of Nashville, Tenn., public schools, the Nashville Board of Education contends that the lower courts applied the principles laid down by the high tribunal in its decision outlawing racial segregation in public schools.

In a brief filed in the Supreme Court Monday, the school board asserts that the NAACP is really asking the Supreme Court to lay down new and different principles to control the lower courts or to appraise the findings in individual cases to see if the lower courts have granted the most appropriate remedy.

In its decision of May 17, 1954, the Supreme Court said compliance required the solution of varied local problems, that the school authorities have the primary responsibility for solving these problems, and school authorities must make a prompt and reasonable start toward compliance.

The court added that once such a start has been made the lower courts may allow additional time that may be necessary in the public interest.

SAYS PRINCIPLES RECOGNIZED

The Nashville school board says these principles were recognized and applied by the District Court and the United States Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals in approving Nashville's plan of one-grade a year desegregation.

The three-judge District Court, which heard the Nashville case, ruled that the school board acted in good faith and with appropriate dispatch to arrrive at a workable plan to solve its problems.

The Nashville school board showed its good faith, the lower court said, when disorders by outside agitators were effectively halted by vigorous action of local police and a Federal injunction obtained by the school board.

The disorders in Nashville occurred at the same time as the riots in Little Rock in September, 1957, and the Nashville school board obtained a Federal injunction before Gov. Orval Faubus was enjoined from interfering with Federal Court orders and before President Eisenhower sent Federal troops to Little Rock.

The school board also argues that the transfer provisions of the plan are valid.

The plan provides that school zones or districts, based upon location of school buildings, should be established.

Atlanta, Ga.

The plan gives every student the right to attend the school designated for the zone in which he lives, but transfers may be requested by a parent if a student would be required to attend a school previously serving only students of other color, or attend a school where the majority of students in the school or his class are of a different color.

Integration Works, School Heads Say

NASHVILLE, Tenn., March 5 (UPI)—Five school superintendents from New Mexico to the Nation's capital told the U.S. Civil Rights Commission today that school integration was working in their communities.

They gave statements to the five-man commission at the first civil rights conference ever called by a Federal agency.

Virgil T. Hansen, superintendent of schools in Washington, D. C., told the commission that the community attitude toward school desegregation in Washington, though mixed, predominantly was favorable.

Hansen said that much of the criticism directed at the integrated Washington school system was based on "generalizations."

"The discipline problem obviously is not one that results from integration, although the incidence of social malfunction seems to be higher among Negroes than whites," Hansen said.

Hansen said that 74 per cent of the enrollment in Washington schools is Negro. He said there had been an exodus by whites from the central part of the city and "some of the out-migration might have been caused by integration."

G. B. Wadzeck, superintendent of San Angelo, Tex. schools, said desegregation brought "very little complaints from parents. "We didn't receive any nasty letters or complimentary letters from local people," he said.

"We did receive some uncomplimentary letters from Chicago et cetera, et cetera."

Wadzeck said 10 per cent of the enrollment in San Angelo schools is Negro.

Claude C. Harris, assistant superintendent of schools at Muskogee, Okla., said that there were 800 Negro students and 7000 white students in his system. He said there was one all-Negro high school and one white high school with limited integration.

"We went about desegragation in a very quiet way," Harris said. "There were no incidents that I am aware of. Our plan was a community-wide plan. There weren't a lot of meetings."

Hugh Bryan, superintendent of schools at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., described Fort Leavenworth as an old pro-slaver community.

"I think we are making slow progress," Bryan said. "I think we're moving about as fast as the community will accept. He said there were 140 Negroes in mixed schools.

Charles Mills, superintendent of schools at Hobbs, N. M., said he didn't think integration has hurt the quality of educational standards in his system.

"There was quite a lot of emotion when we implemented desegregation," Mills said. "There were implications there might be violence, but there was none."

Challenge Set For Nashville Stairstep Desegregation Plan

NASHVILLE, Tenn., (ENS)—A challenge to Nashville's stairstep school desegregation plan, begun in 1957, by the Court of Appeals judge in Cincinnati April 2.

Nashville's plan of integrating one grade a year starting with the first grade in 1957 was approved by U. S. District Judge William E. Miller. He ruled that the stairstep plan was in keeping with the concept of [illegible] speed" set forth by the Supreme Court.

NAACP [illegible] and Nashville city councilman, [illegible] Alexander Looby filed the appeal asking complete desegregation of all grades in the public schools.

Southern School Heads Meet With Rights Unit

By CECIL HOLLAND
Star Staff Writer

NASHVILLE, Tenn., Mar. 5 — Members of the United States Civil Rights Commission met with representatives of 18 Southern school districts here today in an effort to find out how school integration can be carried out without injury to the public education system.

The two-day conference got underway with representatives from New Mexico, Oklahoma, Texas and Missouri relating their experiences with integration.

Supt. Carl F. Hansen of the District public schools and representatives of Baltimore and other Maryland school systems will be heard tomorrow.

No representative of the integrated schools in Arlington, Alexandria, Norfolk and Warren County in Virginia will participate in the conference. Commission officials explained that invitations for the meeting were extended before integration was carried out in any of the Virginia schools.

Hotel Is Segregated

The conference is being held in Nashville's Hermitage Hotel which bans Negroes as guests.

For this reason the members of the commission—including Father Theodore Hesburgh, president of Notre Dame—and its staff obtained living quarters at the Methodist Guest Home on the campus of Scarritt College, two miles from downtown Nashville.

Dr. John A. Hannah, president of Michigan State College and chairman of the commission, told reporters that no effort was made to obtain rooms in Nashville hotels because of the segregation policy followed here.

Dr. Hannah said the commission did not wish to create any problems or incidents over hotel accommodations and for that reason arranged to stay at the Methodist center where segregation is not practiced.

Open to Press

The meetings were open to the press but television was barred, Dr. Hannah said, at the request of some of the school officials participating in the meetings.

The commission also had requests from one Arkansas representative to hear his statement in a closed meeting because of the tension involving the segregation problem in his State.

One of the key school officials invited to the conference was Virgil M. Blossom, former superintendent of the Little Rock (Ark.) school system. It was uncertain, however, whether Mr. Blossom would attend and relate his own experiences and problems in the efforts to integrate schools in that city

The high schools in Little Rock have been closed all this year.

Stresses Fact-finding

Mr. Blossom has been named as superintendent of the schools in San Antonio, Tex., and commission officials were uncertain as to whether he would attend this meeting.

Dr. Hannah opened the meeting with a statement emphasizing the fact-finding nature of the conference and said:

"The constitutional rights of all minority groups can and must be attained without injury to our great public educational system that serves 35 million children of all races, creeds and national origins."

The commission's findings will be included in a report to the President and the Congress. Unless extended the commission will expire on next September 9 but it is expected that in some form it will be continued. Two bills are pending in Congress to extend its life.

Schools Seen Drifting Back Into Segregation

By a Star Staff Writer

NASHVILLE, Tenn., Mar. 6 — The Washington School System, measured by powerful "social and economic forces," is drifting back to a form of segregation, it was indicated yesterday by District School Supt. Carl F. Hansen.

Dr. Hansen spoke here at a conference on civil rights, staged by the Civil Rights Commission. He reported on the integration of District schools, which took place in September, 1954.

He said that since integration, transitional schools tend to become predominantly Negro or white. But he emphasized:

"Technical desegregation, while it does not of itself assure cultural sharing, provides opportunities that should be made use of without resort to artificial methods of enforcing intercultural contacts by the transportation of pupils out of their own residential zones."

Yet he said the "values" that follow "cultural diffusion" must be sought by "maintaining or setting up mixed faculties, establishing and following a common curriculum, observing the same patterns of cultural and academic standards."

Effort Seen Needed

In other words, he said, "directed effort is required if the Negro pupil is to assimilate the white culture system and if the white pupil is to enjoy the contributions of the Negro culture system."

Dr. Hansen reported that from 1950 to 1958, the per cent of Negro pupils in the District school system jumped from 50.7 per cent to 74.1 per cent, or a 23.4 per cent gain in eight years.

This shift in the population has caused two reactions.

One such reaction, Dr. Hansen said, is that integration alone has caused the increase in Negro pupils. But he said this viewpoint is held by those "who are unsympathetic to shifts in residential patterns . . . predicated upon the assumption that Negroes should be restrict in their freedom to choose where they want to live.

The other, he added, is a concern held by proponents of integration that a form of segregation by residence is developing.

"It is clear," Dr. Hansen said, "that social and economic forces at work in this situation are more complex and powerful than the fact of school integration. Thus it cannot be accurate to ascribe the increase in Negro enrollment in the public schools to integration alone, nor can a policy of open schools prevent residential grouping by race."

Acceleration Noted

Dr. Hansen said that last October there were 23 elementary schools which were 80 to 100 per cent white and 86 which were 80 to 100 per cent Negro.

"In other words," he said, "83 per cent of the elementary schools are predominately white or Negro, indicating clearly that if a numerical balance in enrollments does occur it does not remain for long. There is evidence that once a school population shifts from white to Negro in racial composition beyond the 50 per cent point, the rate of change tends to accelerate."

Faced with these developments, Dr. Hansen said:

"The soundest principle of operation is to educate children in their neighborhood schools while at the same time making a broadening of cultural experience a conscious part of the school curriculum. The acceptance of this view, furthermore, suspends as an academic exercise all discussion of whether or not integration causes ultimate resegregation. It puts the focus on the primary responsibility of the public school, which is to educate every child to the maximum of his ability. To accomplish this requires that no child should be denied admission to any school because of his race or social or economic status."

Five Key Points

Dr. Hansen also made these points on the integration of District schools:

1. City-wide achievement medians have gone up, although the number of white pupils has decreased. This fact attests to the educability of the Negro pupil and indicates that the cultural and economic poverty experienced by many Negro pupils can be overcome by education.

2. It is clear that establishing discipline—whatever it may mean—is a problem of great complexity. The most dangerous oversimplification is to ascribe the lack of it to integration. Little notable increase in difficulty can be linked to integration.

3. Only one case in four years of integration has developed in which a Negro boy and a white girl who had attended the same school were subsequently married. School-sponsored social functions, such as dances and picnics, have not led to the promotion of romantic attachments. It is accurate to say that integration has resulted in little social loss to pupils. Because of a need to place greater emphasis upon intellectual education, school authorities have stressed the desirability of curbing social activities that interrupt the program of instruction.

4. The District has accepted desegregation, has made and is making accommodations to it, and has established a climate favorable to the improvement of the education system.

5. Integration did not lower school standards. What really happened was that the school system began to report achievement scores for the entire school system. The method of reporting had changed, not the facts. For the first time, standard achievement tests were given to all pupils in selected grades.

Reports Vary On Integration

School Officials Are Heard By Rights Commission

CLINTON VIOLENCE CITED

By The Associated Press

NASHVILLE, March 6. — School officials from five Southern and border states recounted their integration problems Friday for the United States Civil Rights Commission.

Their stories ranged from rioting and dynamiting at Clinton, Tenn., High School to relatively peaceful desegregation at Louisville, Ky.

The five-man commission wound up two-day conferences, the only scheduled meetings before the group reports to President Eisenhower and the Congress by next Sept. 9. It was directed to determine the effects of the Supreme Court's 1954 desegregation ruling and to make recommendations for possible legislation.

Hits Federal Government

R. G. Crossno, chairman of the Anderson County, Tenn., School Board when integration was started at Clinton High School in 1956, accused the Federal Government of creating an "impossible situation" and then failing to help in its solution.

He told of rioting in September, 1956, when the Tennessee National Guard was called out to restore order, the later beating of a white minister who accompanied some Negro pupils to school and the dynamiting last October of the school building.

"To say that we (the school board) were worn to a frazzle would be a gross misstatement of facts," Mr. Crossno said.

His biggest criticism was against Federal agencies for failure to help maintain and restore order in his community. Referring to the dynamiting, Mr. Crossno said:

"I don't have words to describe the reaction of our citizens . . . one hysterical mother cried, 'My God, what if my child had been in there!'"

Easy At Louisville

The Anderson County official said they had little or no help from the Federal Government and its agencies after violence broke out, and that even the FBI was reluctant to co-operate after the dynamiting.

"I think it is morally wrong to ask the state to come in and enforce something it didn't create," Mr. Crossno said.

Mr. Carmichael, on the other hand, reported a minimum of trouble in Louisville after desegregation began in 1955.

He outlined a plan of conferences with parents, teachers and various civic groups to keep everybody informed on the problem of desegregation and plans for handling it.

"The press, radio and TV were enormously helpful," Mr. Carmichael said. "We got wonderful help from the state level and from our churches."

Aside from a few minor isolated instances, he said, integration was accomplished without difficulty. The city was redistricted and pupils were assigned to specific schools without regard to race, Mr. Carmichael said. But considerable latitude was given to parents of children who wanted to transfer to avoid integration.

Educators from Delaware, Maryland and Arizona told the commisison they achieved the start of integration with relatively minor difficulty.

Joshua K. Shepherd, acting chairman of the Arkansas Advisory Committee, urged the commisison to consider the necessity for more time to enforce the Supreme Court's desegregation order.

"But I urge you never to recommend the use of soldiers," Shepherd said.

He apparently was referring to the use of Federal troops last year in Little Rock.

Tennessee's Senate Kills School Bill

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) — The Tennessee Senate shelved a bill Tuesday which would have prohibited attendance at integrated schools. Opponents said it would wreck the public school system.

The bill, which cleared the house 72-15 Monday night, brought o na full dress debate in the Senate. It finally was sent to the judiciary committee to die by a 24-4 vote.

"In effect, this killed the bill," said Rep. Ralph Kelley of Chattanooga, the House sponsor. Sen. Larry Hughes of Shelby County authored the Senate version.

TENNESSEE

Rights Unit Sets Nashville Meet

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP)—The U.S. Civil Rights Commission opens a two-day hearing here Thursday on school desegregation problems in the South.

David Koonce, information officer, said the primary purpose of the conference is to gather facts for the Commission's Sept. 9 report on civil rights to the President and Congress.

The commission will seek to learn whether the progress of Negores in integrated schools has compared favorably with their prior progress in all - Negro schools.

Koonce said 26 to 30 public school officials from states affected by the Supreme Court's 1954 desegregation decision are expected to participate, and that some 100 members of state civil rights advisory committees will be on hand as observers.

The meeting will be open to the press but closed to the general public. Koonce said the room where the conference will be held is not large enough to accommodate spectators.

All five members of the commission are expected to attend Dr. John A. Hannah, president of Michigan State University, is chairman.

Tennessee Integration In U. S. Court

Cincinnati, April 20 (AP)—Another legal dispute over integration of Negroes and whites in [illegible] was turned over to the United States Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit, for settlement.

The case is one in which the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has attacked in integration program adopted for Nashville public schools.

The Nashville plans call for schools to be integrated, one grade each year, beginning with the first grade. Under such a plan, integration would not be completed for 12 years.

N.A.A.C.P. Charges Evasion

The N.A.A.C.P. attacked the plan as a circumvention of a U. S. Supreme Court decision banning segregation. A U. S. District Court at Nashville upheld the plan, however, and the N.A.A.C.P. appealed.

Three members of the Court of Appeals Monday heard oral arguments on the appeal and then took the case under advisement.

Another issue in the case is a Nashville plan by which pupils in a minority in a school may apply, through their parents, for a transfer to another school.

Avon N. Williams, Jr., Nashville, representing the N.A.A.C.P., argued against the 12-year plan saying:

"The original appellants will never go to an integrated school. In fact, no one beyond the first grade ever will go to an integrated school in Nashville."

Edwin Hunt, representing the School Board, said the major issue before the court was whether the plan represented a "good-faith implementation" of the Supreme Court decision. He added that school officials have found many Negro pupils one to two years behind white pupils in the same grades in achievement records.

Integration In 12 Years Wins Court

CINCINNATI (AP)—The plan of the board of education at Nashville, Tenn., to spread integration in the public schools over a 12-year period was upheld by the U. S. court of appeals, sixth circuit, Wednesday.

The National Association for Advancement of Colored People attacked the plan, calling it a circumvention of the U. S. supreme court ruling which bans segregated schools.

Under the plan, first approved by the district federal court in Nashville two years ago, desegregation started in some first grade classes in the fall of 1957.

GRADE A YEAR

Some first and second grade classes were desegregated last fall and some first, second and third grade classes will be desegregated next fall. One grade a year will be added until all grades finally have been desegregated.

The action of the appellate court Wednesday upheld the findings of the U. S. district court for the middle district of Tennessee.

Supporters of the plan declared a sudden transition to a desegregated basis would engender administrative problems so great they would undermine or impair the educational system of Nashville.

"The findings of the district court were sustained by the evidence," the high court said. "There is no claim that the board of education did not act in good faith. The plan is supported by practically all of the teachers in the schools.

PRINCIPAL CITED

"The reasons for the support of the plan were clearly given by the superintendent of schools, the former superintendent of schools, by the acting chairman of the board of education, and by one of the most experienced principals and teachers where the desegregation plan was operating . . .

"One may disagree with the gradual process, but we cannot say that such a plan is so unreasonable that the judgment of the district court approving the plan, in the light of the evidence before it, should be reversed as clearly erroneous."

The appeals court also said, "There is no evidence before us that the transfer plan is an evasive scheme for segregation.

Pupils Will Begin Pre-Harvest Term

11 Negro Schools In County To Open July 22

Negro pupils of 11 county schools are tentatively scheduled to return to classes July 22 for a pre-harvest season term.

George H. Barnes, superintendent of county schools, said yesterday the term will extend until Oct. 9, when the fall harvest will begin.

Mr. Barnes added that the schedule depends on whether chores are completed by the July date.

The schools concerned are Arlington, Collierville, Barret's Chapel, Eads, Mt. Pisgah, Brunswick, Neshoba, Capleville, Shadowlawn and Wells.

An in-service training period will be held on the two days prior to the opening.

All other county schools start Aug. 31.

Parents continue siege on Knoxville schools

KNOXVILLE, Tenn. "We request that our children be admitted to the public schools of Knoxville this fall 1959."

Twenty colored parents here said this in petitioning the board of education to take immediate action in desegregating the city's public schools "on or before" the regular July 13, board meeting.

The 20 parents had originally petitioned the board in 1955 when 17 parents petitioned for desegregation on July 17 and 45 more on Aug. 13.

In the original petition the parents asked: that Knoxville abolish racial discrimination in the public schools and work out a plan for desegregaton not later than Sept. 1956.

ACCORDING TO the parents, the board issued a formal statement Aug. 17, 1957 promising to desegregate the public schools. The statement revealed that the board's superintendent and his staff had been instructed to develop a plan for gradual integration of the public schools.

However nine months later, May 14, 1956, the board announced a decision to delay "indefinitely the formulation of a plan of desegregation."

According to the parents, they again petitioned the board to rescind the May 7 delay. The request was ignored.

ON JUNE 11, 1956 the parents went to the board and again requested that they reconsider the order to delay.

By unanimous vote the board decided to answer "no" to the parents request. The "no" action was made emphatic when the schools opened for the fall term, Sept. 4, 1956. The colored pupils were not admitted to the schools.

The parents contended that the board resisted another petition filed by them Jan. 7, 1957.

They also said local newspapers had published eight plans reported to have been devised by the board for desegregation.

The parents charged that no attempt had been made to put either of the plans into action.

"You have had this problem under consideration from time to time, but have taken no positive action in the way of discontinuing segregation," the petitioners charged.

The board was reminded of the Supreme Court decision that "the maintenance of racially segregated public schools is a violation of the Constitution," reaffirmed on May 17, 1955.

All federal, state, and local laws permitting such discrimination, were ordered to "yield" in good faith and compliance at the earliest possible date.

In the petition for admittance to the Knoxville public schools in Sept. 1959, the parents further requested that "you reorganize the schools on a non-discriminatory basis; establish a policy that students cannot be assigned to schools on the basis of race; that segregation be abolished in the Knoxville school system; that a plan of desegregation be worked out as soon as possible, and that these desegregation steps be taken in the fall school term.

The petition added that the children were qualified to attend the schools on an unsegregated basis.

School Desegregation Plan Upheld By Courts

CINCINNATI (AP)—The plan of the Board of Education at Nashville, Tenn., tp spread integration in the public schools over a 12-year period was upheld by the U.S. Court of Appeals, 6th Circuit, Wednesday.

The National Assn for Advancement of Colored People attacked the plan, calling it a circumvention of the U.S. Supreme Court ruling which bans segregated schools.

Under the plan, desegregation would begin with the first grade and proceed by the desegregation of one additional grade a year until all grades finally have been desegreated.

The action of the appellate court upheld the findings of the U.S. District Court for the middle district of Tennessee.

Supporters of the plan declared a sudden transition to a desegrated basis would engender administrative problems so great they would undermine or impair the educational system of Nashville.

"One may disagree with the gradual process, but we cannot say that such a plan is so unreasonable that the judgment of the District Court approving the plan, in the light of the evidence before it, should be reversed as clearly erroneous."

NOT EVASIVE

The appeals court also said that "there is no evidence before us that the transfer plan is an evasive scheme for segregation. If the child is free to attend an integrated school, and his parents voluntarily choose a school where only one race attends, he is not being deprived of his constitutional rights."

The appellate court also referred to the background of the case—a background of violence "on the part of criminal elements opposed to desegregation, who wrecked a city school of bombing, and destroyed a synagogue by the same means."

12-Yr Integration Plan Is OKd For Nashville Schools

NASHVILLE (ANP) — The board of education's plan to spread integration over a 12-year period was upheld last week by the U. S. Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals. Under the plan, some first and second grade classes were desegrated-ed last fall, and some first, second and third grade classes will be desegregated next fall. One grade a year will be added until all grades finally have been desegregated.

GETTING ACQUAINTED: Patricia Haynes, 8, meets her new teacher, Mrs. Lucille C. Brandon, at John Coleman Elementary School in Smyrna, Tenn. On Wednesday Patricia was among 15 Negro children who entered previously all-white school without difficulty.

CHANGE MADE QUIETLY

16 Desegregate At Smyrna, Tenn.

SMYRNA, Tenn. — (UPI) — Sixteen Negro pupils entered previously all-white John Coleman Elementary School without a ripple of trouble Wednesday in Tennessee's first rural public school integration.

The Negro children, accompanied by their parents, entered the school less than 24 hours after Federal Judge William E. Miller in Nashville ordered immediate integration of the school. Its pupils are mostly service personnel attached to Sewart Air Force Base here and all the Negroes are children of Air Force personnel. There are 500 white pupils.

Miller said that since the Air Base is operated on a racially integrated basis he could see no reason for difficulty in integrating the school. The Rutherford County School Board, ordered a week ago to submit a desegregation plan for the entire middle Tennessee County, asked for a delay until 1960-61. Miller refused the request.

School officials were forbidden by Miller's order to bar the Negro pupils. The school board last month refused to admit the Negroes contending that Rutherford County schools were operated under a "separate but equal" policy. Miller said this doctrine was quashed by the Supreme Court in May, 1954.

Unless admitted to the Smyrna School, the Negroes would have had to attend an all-Negro school at Murfreesboro, Tenn., 14 miles away.

It was also Tennessee's first public school integration above the third grade. Two of the Negroes entered seventh grade classes and one each entered the fourth, sixth and eighth grades.

Sheriff Bill Wilson and two deputies were on hand when the Negroes arrived. School officials told the parents "your children will receive the same treatment as any other child in the school there will be no difference in any way in discipline and education."

Miller said there was "no a bit of trouble, and no indication of any."

Nashville Facing Total Mixing Push

NAACP To Urge Integration Of All Eligible

NASHVILLE, Aug 3.—(UPI)—W. H. Oliver, superintendent of the integrated school system here, said Monday "it is deplorable" that the NAACP is urging Negro parents to replace token integration with complete integration in grades one through three.

The city school system was desegregated under a court-approved grade-a-year plan in 1957. The first grade integrated that year, the second last year and the third is due to be integrated next month.

The local chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People says it will conduct a parent-education program on school attendance Thursday and Friday.

The program is to be conducted by Negro high school students. Parents of Negro children eligible to attend integrated schools will be urged to send them to those schools, according to a story in the Nashville Globe and Independent, a weekly Negro newspaper.

Mr. Oliver said "it is unfortunate and deplorable that the NAACP is trying to influence parents where to send their children to school . . . It is especially objectionable when they enlist the aid of high school students."

He said Negro high school students have an obligation "to take advantage of the fine educational opportunities which the city is providing for them, rather than concern themselves with the problems of trying to integrate grades one, two and three."

Under the gradual plan, 10 of the 115 eligible Negroes entered previously all-white schools in 1957. In 1958 34 of 230 eligible Negro first and second graders entered integrated schools and in this, the third year, about 300 are eligible to go to integrated schools.

The NAACP will urge that all attend integrated schools.

The NAACP will urge that all attend integrated schools.

Nashville Negro attorney Avon Williams said after the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati upheld the Federal cut here on the gradual plan that it was not acceptable to the NAACP "but it's a step in the door."

Oak Ridge, Tenn. Integrated Schools Transfer To State

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — The integrated schools of Oak Ridge, Tenn., world's first atomic city, will pass from federal to local state jurisdiction this fall with no change anticipated in racial policies, Southern School News reported Wednesday.

Oak Ridge's school system, one of the most modern in the nation, is part of a $35 million "package" of public utilities the Atomic Energy Commission is turning over to local self-government. The city, with a population of 28,500, has a school enrollment of 7,000 in a dozen schools.

Since 1955 all grades in Oak Ridge schools have been open to any race. Although federal policy forbids keeping records of pupils by race, it was learned unofficially that only two schools — Robertsville Junior High and Oak Ridge High — were attended by both white and Negro pupils.

There were 214 Negro pupils — or about three per cent of the pupil population — in Oak Ridge schools during the term closed. Of these, about 45 were enrolled in the junior and senior high schools Oak Ridge residents said the absence of Negroes in the elementary schools was due to residence, not racial distinction.

Major segregation - desegregation developments last month, Southern School News reported, were federal court decisions holding Arkansas' school - closing laws unconstitutional, approval of Nashville's grade - a - year desegregation plan and an order for Atlanta to submit, within a reasonable time, a plan for desegregating its public schools.

Other developemnts by states:

ALABAMA — Gov John Patterson called the Legislature into special session to solve what he called the greatest financial crisis in the history of the state's schools.

ARKANSAS — Little Rock was ordered to proceed with gradual integration, originally approved in 1956.

DELAWARE — A federal court rejected a state request for inclusion of an attendance area paragraph in its 12-year desegregation program.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA — A House subcommittee approved a civil rights bill which would recognize the Supreme Court's 1954 desegregation decision as the law of the land.

FLORIDA — The General Assembly adjourned after passing seven segregation bills described as "mild."

GEORGIA — Gov. Ernest Vandiver, commenting on the federal court order for Atlanta schools to desegregate, said he would have no choice but to shut down any public school which did so.

KENTUCKY — The fourth year of the state's integration program ended quietly with 123 of 175 biracial districts desegregated.

LOUISIANA — Sen. William M. Rainach, segregationist leader, was expected to open his gubernatorial campaign early in July. Gov. Earl K. Long won freedom from a mental institution and resumed talk of running again.

MARYLAND — Dr. John H. Fischer, Baltimore superintendent of public instruction, reviewed the city's desegregation course in an exclusive interview on the eve of his taking over the post as dean of Teachers' College at Columbia University.

MISSISSIPPI — Gov. J. P. Coleman replied to critics who call him a "moderate" by pointing out Mississippi still is 100 per cent segregated.

MISSIOURI — The state Advisory Committee on Civil Rights reported the vast majority of Negro children are in desegregated districts but still attend schools with all- or predominantly -Negro enrollments.

NORTH CAROLINA — Greensboro, Winston - Salem, Charlotte and Wayne County moved to maintain their policy of limited desegregation.

OKLAHOMA — Arcadia, in northeast Oklahoma County, feared possible loss of its integrated high school as a result of transfer efforts by white pupils.

SOUTH CAROLINA — The head of the state's Special Segregation Committee reaffirmed the determination of officialdom to maintain segregation.

TENNESSEE — Knoxville's desegregation suit in effect was dismissed by a federal judge.

TEXAS — A federal judge set July 30 for hearing a plea for immediate compliance with an order for desegregation of Dallas schools.

VIRGINIA — Gov. J. Lindsay Almond told Virginians the state could not afford to permit destruction of its public school system.

Court Denies Negroes Plea In Knoxville

KNOXVILLE, Tenn. (AP)—The city of Knoxville won another round in federal court Tuesday in its fight to keep Negro pupils out of its all-white public schools. Attorneys for both sides said the suit, in effect, was dismissed.

U.S. Dist. Judge Robert L. Taylor ruled against the Negroes on three points:

1. He said the city school board cannot be sued as a unit; its members act individually in enforcement of state segregation laws.

2. He removed three former school board members as defendants in the Negroes' 29-month-old lawsuit. This leaves a minority of two members still affected by the action.

3. He restrained the Negroes from substituting in the current lawsuit three new school board members for the three former members removed as defendants. 'As I see it," said school board lawyer S. Frank Fowler, "the Negroes will have to file a new lawsuit."

Carl Cowan, attorney for the Negroes, said that "for all intents and purposes, the court has sustained the (city's) motion to dismiss" the suit.

Taylor's ruling came on a legal technicality raised by the school board.

Oak Ridge, Tenn. Integrated Schools Transfer To State

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — The integrated schools of Oak Ridge, Tenn., world's first atomic city, will pass from federal to local state jurisdiction this fall with no change anticipated in racial policies, Southern School News reported Wednesday.

Oak Ridge's school system, one of the most modern in the nation, is part of a $35 million "package" of public utilities the Atomic Energy Commission is turning over to local self-government. The city, with a population of 28,500, has a school enrollment of 7,000 in a dozen schools.

Since 1955 all grades in Oak Ridge schools have been open to any race. Although federal policy forbids keeping records of pupils by race, it was learned unofficially that only two schools — Robertsville Junior High and Oak Ridge High — were attended by both white and Negro pupils.

There were 214 Negro pupils — or about three per cent of the pupil population — in Oak Ridge schools during the term closed. Of these, about 45 were enrolled in the junior and senior high schools Oak Ridge residents said the absence of Negroes in the elementary schools was due to residence, not racial distinction.

Major segregation - desegration developments last month, Southern School News reported, were federal court decisions holding Arkansas' school - closing laws unconstitutional, approval of Nashville's grade - a - year desegregation plan and an order for Atlanta to submit, within a reasonable time, a plan for desegregating its public schools.

School Desegregation Plan Upheld By Courts

CINCINNATI (AP)—The plan of the Board of Education at Nashville, Tenn., to spread integration in the public schools over a 12-year period was upheld by the U.S. Court of Appeals, 6th Circuit, Wednesday.

The National Assn for Advancement of Colored People attacked the plan, calling it a circumvention of the U.S. Supreme Court ruling which bans segregated schools.

Under the plan, desegregation would begin with the first grade and proceed by the desegregation of one additional grade a year until all grades finally have been desegreated.

The action of the appellate court upheld the findings of the U.S. District Court for the middle district of Tennessee.

Supporters of the plan declared a sudden transition to a desegrated basis would engender administrative problems so great they would undermine or impair the educational system of Nashville.

The findings of the District Court were sustained by the evidence, the Court of Appeals said. "There is no claim that the Board of Education did not act in good faith. The plan is supported by practically all of the teachers in the schools.

"The reasons for the support of the plan were clearly given by the superintendent of schools, the former superintendent of schools, by the acting chairman of the Board of Education, and by one of the most experienced principals and teachers where the desegregation plan was operating.

"One may disagree with the gradual process, but we cannot say that such a plan is so unreasonable that the judgment of the District Court approving the plan, in the light of the evidence before it, should be reversed as clearly erroneous."

NOT EVASIVE

The appeals court also said that there is no evidence before us that the transfer plan is an evasive scheme for segregation. If the child is free to attend an integrated school, and his parents voluntarily choose a school where only one race attends, he is not being deprived of his constitutional rights."

The appellate court also referred to the background of the case—a background of violence "on the part of criminal elements opposed to desegregation, who wrecked a city school of bombing, and destroyed a synagogue by the same means."

Court Upholds Nashville Plan For Integration Over 12 Years

Cincinnati, June 17 (AP)—The plan of the Board of Education of the City of Nashville, Tenn., for desegregation of the public schools there was upheld today by the U. S. Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit.

Under the plan, desegregation started in some first-grade classes in the fall of 1957.

Some first- and second-grade classes were desegregated last fall and some first-, and second-, and third-grade classes will be desegregated next fall. One grade a year will be added until all grades are desegregated.

The high court thus upheld the decision of the U. S. District Court for the Middle District of Tennessee.

The National Association for Advancement of Colored People attacked the integration plan as being a circumvention of the U. S. Supreme Court ruling which bans segregated schools.

It would take twelve years to complete integration under the Nashville plan.

Supporters of the plan held that a sudden transition to a desegrated basis would endanger administrative problems so great they would undermine or impair the education system of the city.

Integration Drive In Knoxville Brought To Halt By Federal Judge

Knoxville, Tenn., June 8.—Knoxville's school integration suit was dealt a heavy blow Tuesday by federal court ruling removing three former school board members as defendants in the suit.

Federal Court Judge Robert Raylor removed former school board members Andrew Johnson, D. A. Cooper and W. Hoyle Campbell as defendants in the suit.

The judge also forbade the Negroes from substituting the names of new board members Mrs. Gilmer H. Keith, Dr. John H. Burkhart and Dr. Charles A. Moffett.

Several courses of action are now open. The Negroes can voluntarily take a non-suit and file a new one.

The school board can move to dismiss the suit on the grounds of an insufficient number of defendants since only board members Robert B. Ray and E. C. Woods remain as defendants.

The two page interlocutory decree leaves the suit technically still in the court, but there is some doubt whether the ruling can or will be appealed. Some interlocutory decrees can be appealed, others must await final dismissal of the suit.

There is also a question whether the suit can be maintained against only the two remaining board members.

School Board Attorney S. Frank Fowler said he interpreted the ruling as the likely end of the present suit.

Last February Fowler argued in court that the three former board members named as defendants were no longer in office. He said the Negroes failed to substitute the names of the new school board members in the required six-month period.

12 Denied Entry To White Schools

KNOXVILLE, Tenn. —(SNS)— Twelve Negro students were denied entry to all white schools here Wednesday, September 2 as school bells rang for the first day of school in Knoxville. The 12 students ranging from elementary to high school age applied for entry at Mountain View Elementary School, East High School and Fulton High School.

The students were accompanied by their parents and the attempt to register was orderly as was the refusal. The School Board had refused a request in July to integrate the 1959-60 school year.

The request to integrate the schools; the refusal; the attempt to register and the denial are seen as part and parcel of the necessary steps to initiate a new law suit to replace the one recently dismissed in Federal Court because of technicalities in a ruling handed down by Judge Robert L. Taylor on rule 25 of Federal Court procedure. The Negroes failed to amend their suit to name new Board of Education members elected after the suit was filed.

Of the 12 students to attempt registration, three applied at Mountain View Elementary School, seven at East High School and two at Fulton High School.

The two applying at Fulton High, a combination trade and academic high school, said they applied because they wanted to study courses in electronics which are not offered at Austin, the all-Negro high school.

The Board of Education has consistantly refused to consider integration or to offer a plan as required by law. Superintendent Tom Johnston is reliably reported as saying serious consideration will be given to a plan for smooth an easy integration.

The federal judge said he had no alternative since the school board offered no valid reasons for delay. To do otherwise, he said, "would be a raw, naked use of the court's power . . . without any justification."

Partial integration already is in effect at Nashville, Oak Ridge and Clinton, but today's ruling was the first ordering mixed classrooms in a rural Tennessee school.

Tennessee school ordered to mix

NASHVILLE, Sept. 14—(AP)—U. S. Dist. Judge William E. Miller today ordered 10 Negro children admitted immediately to an all-white elementary school in Rutherford County.

He refused a request by the school board to postpone integration of John Colemon School at Smyrna until next September, and granted a temporary injunction sought by 10 Negro airmen at Sewart Air Force Base.

Early Hearing Sought In Isle School Desegregation Suit

HOUSTON — An early hearing will be requested in the suit to desegregate Galveston's public schools and test the constitutionality of the Texas law depriving school districts of state aid if they effect desegregation without first holding an election, Atty Thomas Dent, counsel for the plaintiffs told the Informer Wednesday.

This announcement was made after the mother of two of the children involved was plagued with threatening telephone calls and stated that her children had been made parties to the litigation without her knowledge or consent.

Mrs Barbara Marsh, 23 of 3105 Avenue L, said that she started getting threatening calls Thursday and "It got so bad I just quit answering the telephone. My 10 year old daughter Cynthia, answered it once and somebody told her if she wanted to live to be 11 she better stay out of white schools." Mrs March's children Cynthia and Jacquelin, do not attend public schools, but are students at Holy Rosary Catholic School at 31st Street and Avenue L, three blocks from their home. Mrs Marsh said that the girls had always attended Holy Rosary School and "I intend that they should always go to that school."

SUIT UNKOWN

John Marsh, the girls' father, was also listed in the suit, Mrs Marsh said he had the children's names listed without her knowledge and didn't know anything about it until she saw it in the papers. "After I saw it," the mother related, "I expected those telephone calls." Mrs Marsh said she had asked her husband about the suit but he "didn't answer."

She stated that she and her husband are not separated, but there is a divorce action pending and that she was granted custody of the children at a preliminary hearing. The expectant mother said "The only thing I'm interested in is to get my children out the suit. I didn't get into something and then try to get out, but I don't want any more phone calls like that."

Mrs Clarence Gardner of 12 Palm Terrace, said she had received about "three nasty calls" Mrs Gardner mother of Clara Marie, Beverly Ann and Sharon Lynn, said she was unaware that her husband had listed the children as plaintiffs. She termed the calls "nothing I would call threatening — I think they were just a bunch of kids."

"I want my children to have every advantage, but I don't want my children to get into anything dangerous," said Mrs Gardner.

NO THREATS

James Robinson, a service station attendant whose children head the list in the suit, said he had not received any threatening calls and so far as he knew, neither had any of the others. Stating that he had had no repercussions from the suit, Robinson said "I hardly think about it unless someone mentions it. I don't see anything so drastic about it."

Some members of the Galveston School Board still had not been summoned Wednesday morning. The suit asks that an injunction be issued by Federal District Judge Ben Connally prohibiting the board from operating Galveston schools on a segregated basis.

The Galveston Board adopted a gradual desegregation plan three years ago which would begin in the first grade. It would have been put into effect in September, 1957.

GALVESTON — Galveston school officials must present an integration plan to United States District Judge Ben C. Connally of Houston within 20 days or show cause why they can't integrate, it was learned Wednesday. Members of the Galveston School Board have been served citations summoning them to court in response to a suit by Atty Thomas Dent of Galveston and Thurgood Marshall, NAACP chief counsel, to open the island city's schools on an integrated basis.

Court Orders Houston Board Integration Plan By Aug. 17

HOUSTON, Texas (ANP) — The Houston School Board, on Wednesday, was ordered by U. S. District Judge Ben C. Connally, to submit a plan for integration of public schools by Aug. 17. Houston schools, with 170,000 students, is reportedly the largest segregated system in America.

Judge Connally, in 1957, ordered the School Board to integrate "with all deliberate speed," but did not set a deadline. In Wednesday's ruling the jurist ordered the Board to file its program if it has one."

Judge Connally was asked to reopen the case of two Negro parents who sought to enter their children in "white" schools at opening of the Fall term in September.

What the board had done was to recommend last month a city-wide referendum so citizens could vote on the question.

Vigorously opposing the referendum and recommending that the board follow the court order was Mrs. Charles White who, last fall, was the first colored person to be elected to the board.

SHORTLY AFTERWARDS the parents of two colored children asked Judge Connally to reopen the case. They specifically requested that he set a deadline for compliance this time since the local board's interpretation of "deliberate speed" was more deliberate than speedy.

With 170,000 students, Houston has the largest segregated school system in the nation. Parents of the two children hope that this will be changed when school opens in the fall.

MEANWHILE, IN Little Rock, Gov. Orval Faubus continued to be heard. Last week he said he would ask the Supreme Court to set aside a lower court decision which rendered two of his pet segregation laws invalid.

Under one of the laws, Gov. Faubus shut down all four high schools in Little Rock last year; under the second, he transferred the money that would have been used for the schools' operation to other uses.

On June 18, a three-judge Federal court held that the laws were unconstitutional. This decision came only after the state Supreme Court had ruled the laws were valid.

(In contrast, the Virginia Supreme Court early this year ruled that a clutch of "anti-NAACP laws" drafted by the state legislature were unconstitutional.)

Ignoring the Virginia situation, Mr. Faubus declared:

"The people of this state and of this nation have a great deal more confidence in the rulings of state courts than they do in any ruling of the federal courts."

* * *

THE NAACP kept the pressure on in Alexandria, Va. when it asked the federal district court last week to order the Arlington County School Board to adopt "an adequate and comprehensive plan" for school desegregation.

They requested that Judge Albert V. Bryan order the county to submit the plan by July 27 and to put in into effect immediately.

The NAACP also asked the judge to restrain the board from refusing to admit 22 colored children to the schools they applied for. The students have twice been rejected by the board.

ATTORNEYS for the association asked that the board be prohibited from "regulating the admission or assignment on the basis of racial considerations."

They said that the action of the school board in twice rejecting the students "is continuing and will continue the unlawful policy and practices of racial segregation in the public schools."

The NAACP attorneys in the case are: Oliver W. Hill, chief Virginia legal counsel; Spottswood W. Robinson 3rd, James M. Nabrit 3rd; Frank D. Reeves and Otto L. Tucker.

THE NEW YORK school situation seemed to be settling down last week after an initial flurry of protests over the transfer of colored children from over-crowded Brooklyn schools to vacant classrooms in the Glendale-Ridgewood section of Queens.

School superintendent John J. Theobald stood firm on his decision to transfer the students.

The wave of protests and demonstration by pro-segregationists subsided almost as quickly as it arose. Newspaper criticism plus the leadership of pastors and community leaders established a pattern of cooperation in the area instead of the disorder that was hinted.

DR. FRANK S. HORNE, director of the New York Commission on Intergroup Relations, announced:

"We now have firm ground to report that civic and church leaders in the Glendale-Ridgewood area will see to it that the transfer of 364 pupils from nearby overcrowded Brooklyn schools will take place smoothly, and in a way that will be a credit to any good American community."

Ministers, school principals and other leaders met with the Council. One minister reported that the dissention was being aroused by some real estate operators interested in the possible profits of changing neighborhoods.

IN BALTIMORE, Dr. George B. Brain of Bellevue, Wash. has been appointed superintendent of public instruction. He replaces Dr. John H. Fischer who resigned to take the offered position of dean of Columbia University's Teachers College.

Dr. Fischer is best known to the nation for the role he played in the desegregation of Baltimore schools. Despite attempted sabotage of the operation by demonstrators.

Dr. rain, at 39, is experienced in school administration. His appointment was attacked in some sources because, as an outsider, he had not been "steeped in Baltimore tradition." (Until Dr. Fischer, another outsider, came, Baltimore's tradition was one of segregation.)

Judge Sets Aug. 17 deadline for action

By CHESTER M. HAMPTON

HOUSTON, Texas — The school desegregation spotlight swung to Houston last week when Federal Judge Ben C. Connally ordered the school board to show him its plans to desegregate the system. He set an August 17 deadline on the order.

In 1957, Judge Connally originally ordered the system to integrate with "all deliberate speed." Two years later, the board had taken no possible ac-

RULING IS ASKED ON MIXING LAW

School Board in Dallas Files Appeal

EASTLAND, Tex. (AP) — The Dallas school board asked the 11th Texas appeals court to tell it what is the law on school integration.

Federal courts have ordered the district to mix Negro and white pupils "with all deliberate speed." A state law deprives a district of state aid if integration is carried out unless residents approve it in a referendum.

Mark Martin, lawyer for the board, informed the appellate court the district "has the courage and willingness to follow the law" on integration, adding:

"It simply calls on the court to declare what the law is."

Martin asked the appeals court to send back to a lower court the board's plea for guidance and a trial on merits of the case.

Both federal and state courts have disclaimed jurisdiction. The board asked the appeals court to force the lower court to accept and decide the case. It could be months before a decision is reached.

Martin argued that the new state law does not apply to the Dallas district, which a federal court ordered integrated before the Legislature passed the bill.

The board's attorneys have pointed out that should the board follow state law, board members could face federal contempt of court action.

Should the board follow federal rulings and integrate, the system would lose $2,600,000 a year in state aid and accreditation, and board members would face fines up to $1000 each.

Investigate, Segregate, McFarland Tells Principals

HOUSTON — Supt John W. McFarland indicated to a group administrators Monday night that racial grounds will be the last resort for denying Negro students entry to white schools and white students entry to Negro schools.

McFarland said Negroes who try to attend white schools this fall will be rejected on racial grounds alone only if they meet all other requirements for admission.

"If a white student should apply for admission to a school for Negroes or if a Negro student were to apply to a school for whites, the principal should check carefully to see if the student fulfills all the requirements other than race for admission.

The directive said if the student fails to fulfill all the requirements for admission, he should be rejected without mentioning race or color. If the student should fulfill the requirements. McFarland said the student should be informed that the Houston Independent School District is still segregated and should be informed of the proper school to which he should apply.

This directive was, no doubt, a move to prevent Negroes from applying at all-white schools. Such an incident occurred this summer.

On Tuesday July 21 Carole Reynaud, a 13-year-old Miller Jr High School student, sought admission to Sidney Lanier Jr High.

At that time school officials said the applicant didn't have an approval card and a certificate from her principal. They insisted that she wasn't refused because of her race.

However, Mrs Viola Williams of 2512 Wheeler St, Carole's mother, said that when her daughter applied at Lanier "she was armed with everything but white skin."

Carole reportedly attended James D Ryan Jr High School the first summer term, and applied at the white school because -- accord[illegible] school regulations [illegible] to enro[illegible] rdens Jr High [illegible] ete her summer studies. Kashmere, is on the extreme northwest section of the city some 13 miles from the Williams' residence.

Houston Asks Time For Desegregation

HOUSTON (AP) — Houston school trustees told a federal judge Monday immediate desegregation of the South's largest segregated school system could not be made "without irreparable injury to all the school district."

The board pleaded for more time to comply with Judge Ben Connally's 1957 order to "desegregate with all possible speed.'

It said it has two integration plans under study. Neither, it said, could be adopted without holding a referendum election or the district would stand to lose five million dollars annually in state aid.

CITE SHORTAGES

The report also cited classroom shortages and what it called the academic lag of Negro students behind whites.

The board acted in response to an order by Judge Connally two months ago to submit a progress report on its compliance to his 1957 ruling. The five-volume report ran 373 pages.

One plan submitted two years ago would start integration in the first grade and advance one grade annually beginning in September 1960.

The second plan, submitted by board attorney Joe Reynolds at a secret session last December, calls for desegregation on an area basis.

A PETITION MATTER

At least 20 per cent of the district's residents—or 47,000 voters—would have to sign petitions requesting the election before it could be called. Petitions circulated by the district have drawn about 4,000 signatures in recent weeks.

About 25 per cent of the district's 170,000 students are Negro.

"The administration recognized the constitutional principles involved in this case cannot be ignored," the report said. "But at the same time the administration feels that immediate desegregation would so impair and damage the school district as to be detrimental to all the school children."

Desegregation In San Antonio Surpasses Other Texas Cities

SAN ANTONIO — The San Antonio Independent School District has advanced farther in integration than any other of the large cities of Texas. A total of 1,568 Negro students have been integrated into formerly all-white schools, and 30 whites have been integrated in formerly all Negro schools.

In the 1958-59 session 1,069 pupils had been integrated. The figure of 1,568 for the number integrated at the beginning of the 1959-60 session shows about 50 per cent increase and a very healthy rate of progress in the Bexar County area.

The Tynan Elementary school at the latest reckonng had 263 Negroes out of a total attendance of 339 students. Fannin Elementary had 183 Negroes out of a total attendance of 285; and Pershing Elementary School had 192 out of a total of 561. Emerson Junior High had a total of 181 Negro pupils out of a total of 723 students.

In the senior high schools there are 155 Negroes integrated in a total attendance of 1,147 at Brackenridge; 78 Negroes in attendance at Tech out of total of 1,700; Jefferson now has 52 Negroes out of a total of 2,218, and Highlands has 43 out of 2,38.

SAVES MONEY

The president of the school district board issued a statement, saying that if it were not for integration, the district would have had to enlarge Wheatley High School, an all-Negro school and the superintendent said that the district would have had to increase junior schools also, if it had not been for integration.

Of increased interest was the fact that these changes had taken place without any untoward incident in San Antonio.

Houston Seeks More Time For Desegregation

Houston (ANP) — Houston school officials told U. S. Judge Ben Connally that immediate desegregation of the South's largest segregated school system would cause "irreparable injury to all school districts." Consequently, the officials' lawyers pleaded for more time to comply with a 1957 desegregation order.

School authorities indicated that two integration plans are "under study," and neither could be adopted without a referendum election—without which, the school district would lose $5 million annually in state educational aid.

One plans would start integration in the first grade adn advnce one grade each yesr, beginning in September, 1960. The other would desegregated by areas, rather than grade

Fort Worth Reports Two Integration Incidents

FORT WORTH. Two efforts on the part of Negro parents to see their children enjoy full citizenship rights to an education were noted here Tuesday as the Fort Worth school system opened its doors for fall classes.

Two Negro couples made efforts to have their children receive their citizenship rights by seeking admission to the Fort Worth school system on the basis of equality of opportunity, but were denied this right. School officials advised that the Fort Worth school system would continue on a segregated basis at the present time.

One couple was T-Sgt. Weirless [illegible] of Carswell Air Force Base [illegible], who sought to obtain admission for their daughter, Arenroll as a student in the [illegible] school. They were denied the right to have their child enter the school, however.

[illegible] not affiliated with any organization except the U. S. Air Force. Flax told the school officials Flax is a native of Louisiana.

The second couple was Mr. and Mrs. Herbert C. Teal, who made effort to enroll their six children in the Peter Smith Elementary school. They soon departed after being told by Principal Joe McGee that the Peter Smith Elementary school board had voted to continue for another year on a segregated basis.

"If that's the way it is, that's the way it's got to be," was the terse comment which Teal made as he and his wife departed.

NAACP Head Speaks Out

The president of the Fort Worth branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Dr. G. D. Flemmings was outspoken in his denunciation of the schools for the denial of the Negro parents and children their constitutional rights to an education on the same basis that granted white students.

Flemmings termed the refusal to enroll Negro children as "unfortunate" and called the action of refusal to enroll Negro children in the two schools "a deliberate attempt to violate the order of the Supreme Court."

Principal McGee contended that the school custodian, Roy Dunaway, had recognized the Teals as the same family which had made effort to have their children enroll in this school four years ago.

Meanwhile, Dr. Flemings claimed that the effort to enroll was "a new thing to me," but he congratulated the Teals for making effort to enroll their children and viewed this is a "forward movement."

Principal McGee said the Teal family was not much concerned about their children enrolling at the Peter Smith school. "They seemed to expect it," said McGee.

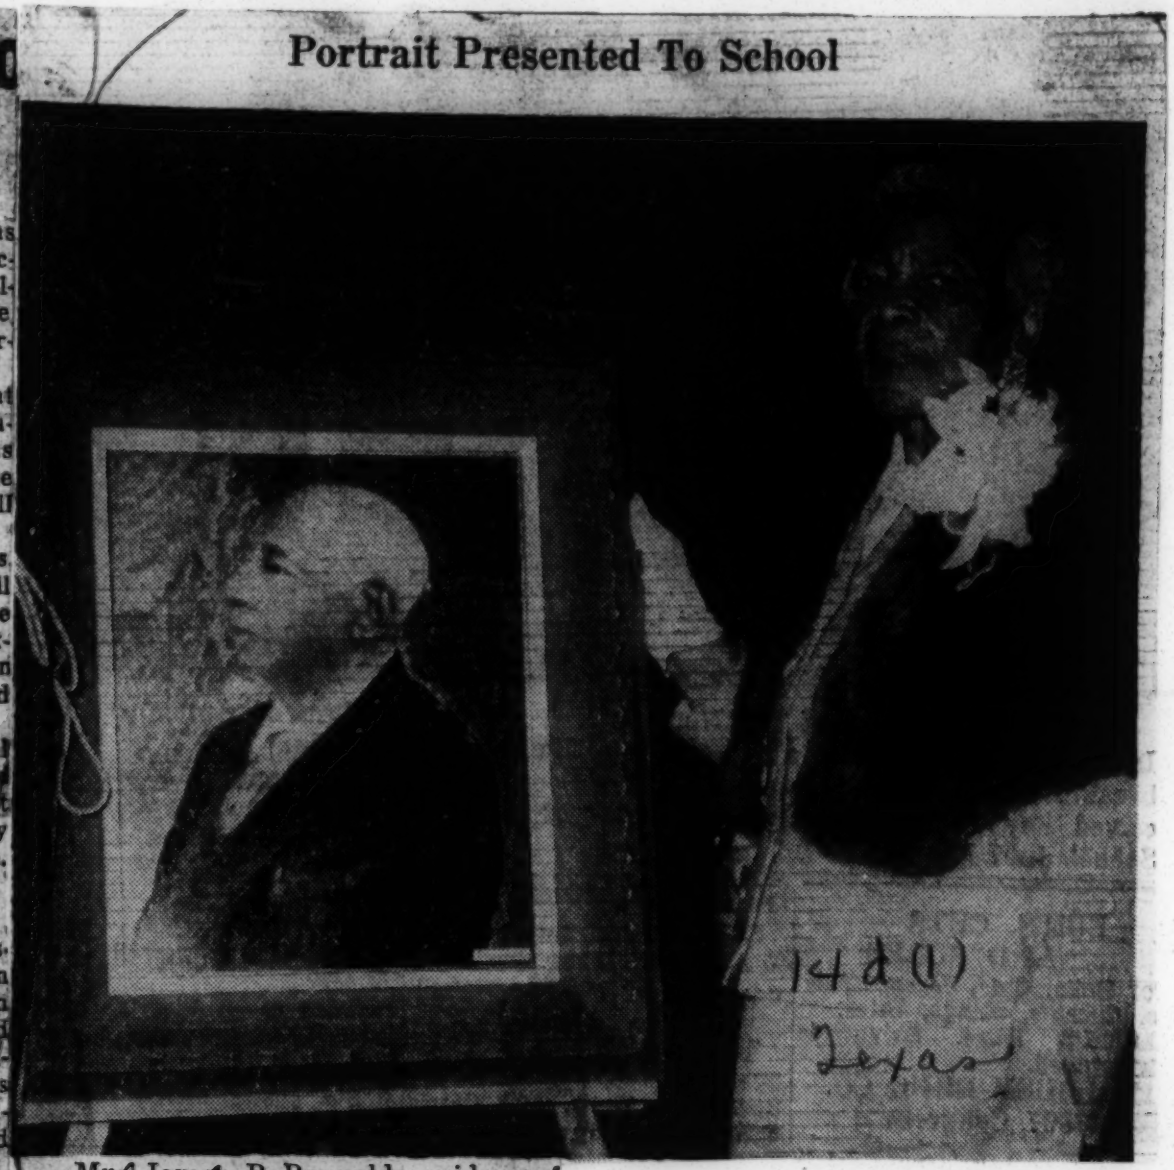
No Houston Incident

It was pointed out that at Houston, the 185,000 student Houston Independent School district, which is the nation's largest segregated system, school had opened without incident, despite the reports that Negroes would seek enrollment at several schools attended by white students.

The Houston Public School system, like that of Dallas, is already under orders from the Federal courts to integrate "with all deliberate speed."

However, both Dallas and Houston are making desperate efforts to continue operation on a segregated basis during the present school term.

Portrait Presented To School



Mrs. James R. Reynolds, widow of the late Prof. James R Reynolds, for whom the new Reynolds Elementary School was named, unveils a portrait of her late husband which was presented to the school as a gift of the Reynolds family. The unveiling was a highlight of the American Education Week activities at the school which is located in the Reedwood addition. Prof Arthur Gaines serves as its principal.

Told to get ready—

Dallas is granted integration delay

DALLAS, Tex., July 31—(AP)—A federal judge yesterday refused to order integration of Dallas public schools this Fall but he told the school board to "put your house in order" for integration which he said will surely come.

"You are going to integrate your schools. The question is when," 82-year-old Judge T. Whitfield Davidson said.

THE HEARING was held on a petition filed by attorneys for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People asking for immediate integration. During yesterday's testimony, however, they indicated they would be willing to wait until 1960.

Dallas school leaders have been in court 10 times over the school integration issue since the U. S. Supreme Court handed down its decision on school segregation more than five years ago.

THE NAACP attorneys charged that while the school board president, Dr. Edwin Rippy, was quoted as saying the board would abide by the Supreme Court ruling, the board has announced no plans for integration.

At yesterday's hearing, Dr. Rippy said the school board will follow all court directives. But he told the court that state and federal laws conflict. He said the 147-school district could lose more than $2½ million in state aid money a year under a law passed by the state legislature two years ago. This law calls for the loss of state aid for schools which integrate without an election.

NAACP lawyers declined after the hearing to discuss possible further moves.

Judge Davidson, who opened the day-long hearing by stating his love for Southern traditions but promising a fair hearing, ended the court session with what sounded like a lecture to Negro spectators.

"As long as he (the Negro) begins imitating his white brother he is not at his best," the aged jurist said. "If you want to rise in life, there is a way . . . that is to excel."

During the hearing, Dr. Rippy testified that if integration comes "we favor a plan . . . of starting with the first grade."

LATER HE said the school board expects to continue its long-range policy of clarifying state and federal laws before disclosing any further plans or setting a date for integration.

Of the estimated 122,000 pupils in the district, about 22,000 are Negroes.

More than 100 school districts in Texas, embracing approximately one-quarter of the state's estimated two million scholastics, voluntarily integrated their schools. Although the state law halted plans for integration in several cities, several smaller districts have integrated schools after holding the required elections.

Dallas ordered to start move to integration

DALLAS, Aug. 7—(AP)—U. S. Dist. Judge T. Whitfield Davidson yesterday directed the Dallas school board to take steps toward a vote on integration of public schools.

Davidson signed an order prepared by the school board's attorney directing the board to circulate petitions calling for an election on the issue.

The order also formally denied a request by the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People for integration this Fall.

STATE LAW REQUIRES a halt to state aid for any district which integrates without approval of a majority of qualified voters.

The law also specifies that such an election can be called only after petitions are signed by 20 per cent of the district's voters. This would require 32,000 signatures in Dallas.

A spokesman for the NAACP said the organization will not take part in a campaign for signatures or in an election.

NAACP Field Secretary Edwin C. Washington Jr. said the group takes the position "that a man's rights should not be put to a vote once they have been declared by the court."

Mixed Classes For September Request Denied

DALLAS.—U. S. District Judge T. Whitfield Davidson directed the Dallas school board Tuesday to take steps toward a vote on integation of public schools here.

Davidson signed an order prepared by the school board's attorney directing the board to circulate petitions calling for a vote on the issue.

The order also formally denied a request by the Nation Association for the Advancement of Colored People for integration this fall. Davidson turned down the request orally at a hearing last week.

It's State Law

School officials consider the vote necessary under a state law which requires a halt to state aid for any district which integrates without approval of a majority of its qualified voters.

The law also specifies that such an election can be called only after petitions are signed by 20 per cent of the district's voters. This would require 32,000 signatures in Dallas.

A spokesman for the NAACP said the organization will not take part in a campaign for signatures or in an election if one is called.

And school officials said they feel it will be necessary to ask Davidson to clarify his order to indicate whether the board should simply make the petitions available or should actively circulate them for signatures.

More Confusion

The Dallas Morning News speculated Wednesday that in view of the NAACP and school board statements, the expected difficulty in obtaining 32,000 signatures and the small likelihood of the issue passing if it comes to a vote, Davidson's order may "add more confusion to the already complex situation."

Dr. Edwin Rippy, president of the board, said "We will probably have to ask Judge Davidson to instruct us further. I think the board could get the petitions drawn up and even pass them around to P-TAs, but I don't think the leg work of getting them signed should be done by school officials."

NAACP field secretary Edwin C. Washington jr. said the group takes the position "that a man's rights should not be put to a vote once they have been declared by the court."

Davidson's order retained jurisdiction and recessed the hearing until the first Monday in April 1960.

Cool-Off In Mixing Bout Seen

DALLAS, Tex. (AP) — Each day's delay in integrating Dallas schools lessens the likelihood of violence when segregation does end, the Dallas School Board said Monday.

"General tensions of the citizens on both sides of the segregation problem have been and are lessening and mellowing, and the likelihood of strife is becoming less by the day," the board said in a brief prepared by its attorney, Henry W. Strasburger.

The board directed Strasburger to file the brief in U.S. District Court in answer to requests by Negroes seeking integration of the city's schools this fall.

Judge T. Whitfield Davidson will hear the Negroes' plea Thursday.

The petition said until the conflict between state and federal laws has been decided, desegregation is impractical. Texas law requires an end to state aid for local schools when a district is integrated without approval of a majority of its voters.

Dallas would lose an estimated $2,500,000 per year if allocation of state funds was stopped.

LECTURES BOARD

U.S. Judge Delays Dallas Integration

DALLAS, Tex. (UPI) — Negro attorneys pondered ways today to overcome a federal judge's refusal to order immediate desegregation of Dallas public schools or set up any sort of integration timetable.

Federal Judge T. Whitfield Davidson, 82, advised the school board to "put your house in order for integration" and postponed a final ruling until "closer to the fall of 1960."

"I held we can't sufficiently forecast at this distance what the condit ons will be, so I have postponed a decision regarding integration in 1960 until later," the judge explained.

He said he felt his decision was to the "best interest of all" and remarked that his own family had "owned plenty of slaves" and that the U. S. Supreme Court "has us (the South) over a barrel."

Thurgood Marshall, chief counsel for the NAACP, conceded at Thursday's hearing that to begin desegregation this fall might be difficult. He sought to show there would be little administrative difficulty in starting a desegregation program in the fall of 1960.

The NAACP motion had asked for immediate integration.

Dr. W. T. White, superintendent of schools in Dallas, testified that the board has no plan formulated but is making studies of desegregation programs and ideas. He said desegregation would be "simple" on an administrative level, but had to be considered with the "temper of the community."

Little Rock Integration May Set Pace And Pattern

DALLAS, Tex. — (UPI) — The leader of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in the Southwest said Saturday that developments in the public schools of Little Rock, Ark. next month will determine the future of integration in the South.

The NAACP leader is Clarence Laws, the organization's Southwest field secretary. Laws was on the scene in Little Rock in 1957 and 1958 and will be back when Little Rock's schools open Sept. 8. He has just returned from a survey of the situation.

"This is the showdown," Laws said. "Little Rock is the testing ground for the South.

"Whatever happens at Little Rock this fall will set the pace and pattern from here on and could go a long way toward making or breaking the entire desegration program in the South."

'GET TOUGH'

He called upon the U. S. Justice Department to "get tough," even to the extent of throwing Gov. Orval E. Faubus of Arkansas into jail if he tries to prevent integration in Little Rock.

He said he doubts that U. S. marshals can handle any "real trouble" which Faubus seems to have "invited" by telling "those inclined toward violence they can do what they will without interference from him."

Laws referred to a statement by Faubus that federal troops will have to enforce intergration in Little Rock next month with "live ammunition" and that he will not use the militia or state police to put down disorder.

"The President moved in troops in 1957 and I wouldn't be surprised if he had to again," Laws said.

In 1957 President Eisenhower ordered 1,000 troops of the 101st Airborne Division into Little Rock to protect nine Negro students against mob violence.

CLOSED SCHOOLS

In 1958, Faubus closed Little Rock's four public high schools. Hundreds of white students attended private school or went to schools in other districts or out-of-state. A total of 3,700 NeNgro and white students were registered in public schools in September, 1958.

This year, since federal courts have declared the laws under which Faubus closed the schools unconstitutional, the Little Rock school board plans to open the schools on an integrated basis.

Fifty-five Negroes have registered in three white schools. The school board intends to use a pupil placement law to assign Negroes and keep a large number from attending any one school. Laws said more Negroes will register in white schools.

Negro Nursed Judge Delays, Dallas Mixing

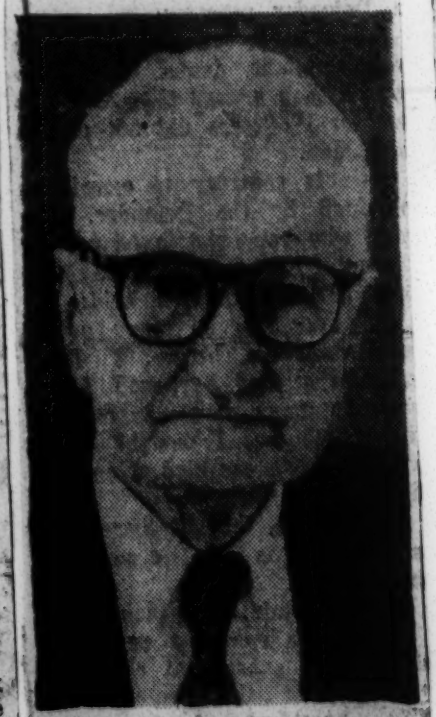
By RICHARD THOMAS

DALLAS, Tex. — (UPI) — A federal district judge who noted that he drew his first nourishment from the breast of a Negro woman rejected Thursday a demand by the NAACP for immediate integration of Dallas' public schools.

"At the same time, the judge, 82-year-old T. Whitfield Davidson, warned the Dallas School Board to "put your house in order for integration."

"It may be further and further in the future, but it is ahead," he said during a 37-minute discussion preceding his oral order.

The NAACP which has been



JUDGE T. W. DAVIDSON

into court 11 times trying to get the public schools of Dallas integrated, had demanded immediate integration and brought Thurgood Marshall, chief of counsel for the NAACP, to Dallas to help with the case.

The demand for immediate integration was in a motion filed May 20. During arguments before Judge Davidson Friday, Marshall offered to forget about immediate integration if the school board would produce an integration plan by September, 1960.

Asked to clarify his decision after he adjourned court, Judge Davidson said:

VERY VAGUE

"The plaintiff's (NAACP) attorneys adroitly did not insist on integration now. They allowed one year in their argument to accomplish it.

"I held we can't sufficiently forecast at this distance what the conditions will be, so I have postponed a decision regarding integration in 1960 until later.

"It may come soon or it may come late. But the Supreme Court has us (the South) over a barrel; there is no place to go."

Before we heard the first witness, Judge Davidson said: "The first nutrition I ever received came from the bosom of a Negro woman, the Negro woman who attended me in the first days of my life."

In discussing the case before he handed down his opinion, Judge Davidson advised Negroes: "If you want to rise in life, there is a way — by excellence."

"Excellence is important," he said, "and it doesn't take compulsory integration to bring these things about. The races distrust each other. The sooner that distrust can be dispelled, the sooner integration can be accomplished."

'PUT HOUSE IN ORDER'

Dallas Integration This Fall Denied

DALLAS, Tex., July 30 (AP) — A federal judge today refused to order integration of Dallas schools this fall. But he told the school board to "put your house in order" for integration which he said will surely come.

Eighty-two-year-old Judge T. Whitfield Davidson opened the day-long hearing by stating his love for Southern traditions but promising a fair hearing. He closed the hearing with what sounded like a lecture to Negro spectators.

"As long as he (the Negro) begins imitating his white brother he is not at his best," said the gray-haired jurist. "If you want to rise in life, there is a way ... that is to excel."

"A year from now may be sufficient time to integrate ... we will not name any date or issue any order.

Further Study

"The school board should further study this question and perhaps take further action, maybe an election."

Thurgood Marshall, chief counsel for the National Assn. for Advancement of Colored People, threw his pencil on the table. A strong look of disappointment crossed his face.

Marshall and other Negro attorneys had surprised the courtroom by indicating they were willing to wait until 1960 for integration. They represented Negro parents who had petitioned for integration this fall.

Of the estimated 122,000 pupils in the district, about 22,000 are Negroes.

Dr. W. T. White, school superintendent, declined to outline for Marshall any Dallas integration plans, saying that was the school board's duty.

20 to 25 Years

White said he still believes, as he did earlier, that it will take 20 to 25 years to integrate.

The judge, in his lengthy remarks at the close, said the Negro should recognize "that the white man has a right to maintain his racial integrity and it can't be done so easily in integrated schools."

Davidson at the outset told the spectators he has received many letters about the case. Remarking that there may be some interest in his own background, he said he loves "old South" tradition, that his forebears fought for the Confederacy, and that he received his first nourishment from a Negro woman's breast.

"There is no animosity, no hatred of any kind in my heart," he said.

Dallas school leaders have been in court 10 times because of a conflict between federal integration orders and state law. School districts which integrate without an election stand to lose state money. Such elections are held only if 20 per cent of voters ask for them.

The Dallas district would lose $2,620,000 in state money a year if it integrated without an election.

Dallas school leaders have been in court 10 times over the school integration issue since the U.S. Supreme Court handed down its decision on school segregation more than five years ago.

The NAACP attorneys charged that while the school board president, Dr. Edwin Rippy, was quoted as saying the board would abide by the Supreme Court ruling, the board has announced no plans for integration.

He said the 147-school district could lose more than 2½ million dollars in state aid money a year under a law passed by the state legislature two years ago. This law calls for the loss of state aid for schools which integrate without an election.

Integration At Dallas Held Off

"You are going to integrate your schools. The question is when," 82-year-old Judge T. Whitfield Davidson said.

Houston Ordered to Mix Schools

HOUSTON, Tex. (NNPA)—The Houston school boa was given its first specific proposals last week for enfi segregation in public schools here, although Federal Jud Ben C. Connally ordered that the Houston public schoo be desegregated "with all deliberate speed" more than yea ago.

In issuing the order on Oct. 15, 1957, Judge Connally emphasized that any "inordinate delay or evasion" would not be tolerated.

The proposals for desegregation were made by school board attorney Joe Reynolds during a surprise session Monday night, closed to the public.

But the general public here is still in the dark as to what proposals Attorney Reynolds made. The board members agreed to keep mum, and not to inform Houstonians what is intended to be done in following the orders of Judge Connally to desegregate the 167 public schools here.

MRS. FRANK DWYER, board president, who has spoken out against desegregation ever since she has been a member of the board, said:

"Mr. Reynolds just gave us some proposals on steps we might take toward desegregation. He explained to us what the federal and state laws on it were. He thought that we should have the problem discussed to us and that we should start studying the problem more."

MRS. CHARLES E. WHITE, who will become a member the Houston school board n year, was not present at meeting. But Mrs. H. W. Cull a white Board member-elect, campaigned against desegre tion, was present. Asked a this, Mrs. Dwyer replied:

"The only reason that Mrs. Cullen was in the conference was because she was here. She was not invited to come to the meeting. Mrs White could have just as easily come to the meeting and she would have been invited into the conference."

San Angelo Students Behave Or Get Out; School System Called Best In The U. S.

By G. K. HODENFIELD

SAN ANGELO, Tex. (AP) — There's a no-nonsense approach to education in San Angelo. It's based on the theory and practice that students go to school to learn, not just have a good time.

"We don't lose 'em," says Supt. George B. Wadzeck. "We make them work, and we don't stand for any foolishness. If a student can't behave, we kick him out. And before he can get back in, he has to appear before the Board of Education with his parents."

At the same time, Wadzeck expresses his philosophy of education thusly: "We cater to the kids. We want them here."

This may sound like the man is trying to run in two different directions. He isn't. Wadzeck knows exactly what he wants: the best public school system in the United States.

Basically, it's a simple idea. You make school an attractive place to spend the day. You outline a course of studies that encourages every student in every grade to do his level best. And you offer the students responsibility, and insist that they accept it.

Washington School, where all of San Angelo's seventh graders have their classes, is a good example of the technique of an iron fist in a velvet glove.

There are no bells and buzzers at Washington. Classes vary in length instead of holding to rigid 45 or 50-minute schedules. There are 10-15 minute breaks both afternoon and morning, when the students can go to a school snack bar for a soft drink or a candy bar. There are no supervised study halls.

In most public schools this would be an invitation to bedlam. Not here. The students move quietly through the halls between classes. The snack bar breaks are sociable, but not noisy. The off-hour study halls are quiet. The students know they have a good deal, and they know what they have to do to keep it.

If a student is tardy, he loses his break privileges that day. If he is caught carrying cigarettes he is suspended for three days; likewise if he is caught with anything that could be used as a weapon—a knife, chain, wrench.

Since he has six hours of academic studies per day, suspension means he has 18 hours of school work to make up when he gets back. And Principal Dave Sands is no softy; he insists that the work be done.

For more serious offenses, expulsion is automatic.

"We make the kids accept responsibility," says Sands. "And the way they accept it shows that too many educators are underestimating the young people of this country."

Central High School, opened last September, is the sort of school plant you have to see to believe — an 11-building, campus-type layout that appeals to the eye and stimulates the imagination.

Consider the library. Like all the other buildings, it is completely air conditioned. It has carpeting on the floor, indirect lighting, sofas, easy chairs, coffee tables with vases of flowers, magazine and newspaper racks, a building-long picture window of glareproof glass that overlooks a patio and a view of the tree-lined North Concho River.

This is, indeed, catering to the kids.

"We want the kids to use the library," says Wadzeck. "We want to encourage them to come here whenever they're free. Every student at Central gets a special course in how to use the library. If we can get them here, they'll take advantage of the library, they'll study, they'll learn."

But suppose they come to the library just to sit around in comfort and gossip?

"Any abuse of the library means loss of their library privileges," says the superintendent. "More than that, they are sent to supervised study halls for double sessions. They don't like that. But we have little trouble—these kids know we don't stand for any foolishness."

Last spring 25 seniors tried a little foolishness. They painted "Seniors, '57" on the high school walls. All 25 were suspended. Twenty-one were allowed to return for graduation, but could take no part in the ceremonies. The other four were out for good.

"They had the wrong attitude," says Wadzeck.

The no-nonsense approach is applied everywhere in the San Angelo schools.

One day Wadzeck read in the paper that a teacher had been fired by another Texas school system for being too rough on the kids, giving them too much homework. Wadzeck phoned the teacher and hired him on the spot.

"We cater to the kids." That's San Angelo's answer to a disturbing problem in American education—the drop-out.

"With our program there should be virtually no drop-outs," says Robert H. Mayfield, curriculum project director.

"You can't tabulate accidents that don't happen, and you can't tabulate drop-outs who don't drop out. But we do know this: we have more students in school now during the critical drop-out years than ever before."

"We want them here." You see the results in the new high school. Although it is located near the center of the city, 95 per cent of the students stay on the campus from the time they arrive until they go home. At Washington, the seventh graders are kept in school or on the grounds all day long.

Central High sounds like a posh place to go to school.

But the things that look like frills are functional. The cost was $2.50 per square foot cheaper than for a similar size traditional school plant.

The air conditioning adds $10,000 a year to the utilities bill, but it saves $27,000 a year in janitorial costs. The school can be used comfortably in the hottest summer weather.

The 11 buildings take up more space than one big building. But any one building, such as the gym, library or theater can be used outside the normal school day without adding to the operating costs of the others.

The vast expanses of glareproof glass might seem to be expensive frills. The over-riding fact was protection of pupils' eyesight through reduction or elimination of glare. Furthermore, it was cheaper that way because of the elimination of ventilation openings and other structural details.

San Angelo was able to provide a gym and a swimming pool for the same cost that would normally go into a gym alone. This was done by putting them below ground level; it's cheaper to dig down than to build up.

Porcelain and plastic are used extensively. Beauty is only part of the reason, it also cuts down on maintenance.

Another note of practicality: There are no walls or partitions in Central High that bear weight. The buildings can be enlarged at any time with no great trouble or expense.

Classes at Central High are staggered. So are the lunch periods. The result is that the campus resembles that of a small college. To carry the college atmosphere a step further, the cafeteria includes a section which is partitioned off and equipped with booths. Students who don't want the regular hot lunch can go there for a hamburger and a malted.

"If they can get it at Sloppy Joe's, they can get it here," says Wadzeck.

"When our kids go on to college, they'll never notice the transition. We treat them like young adults, and they react like young adults. We give them the best education they can absorb, we spoon-feed it to them if we have to. But we have no time for hoodlums, and they know it.

"That's probably why we don't have any hoodlums."

Next: How they did it.

Integration Reply Asked Of Houston

HOUSTON, Tex., July 1 (AP) — Federal Judge Ben C. Connally today ordered the Houston School Board to submit by Aug. 17 a plan for integration of public schools.

The 170,000-student system is the largest segregated system in the nation.

Conally ordered the board "to file its program, if it has one."

In 1957, Connally ordered the system to integrate "with all deliberate speed" but did not set a deadline.

Parents of two Negro children last month asked Connally to reopen the case and set a deadline. Attorneys said they hoped to obtain an order that would integrate the schools at the opening of the term in September.

The parents filed their suit originally in 1956. The two Negro children had been unsuccessful in attempts to enter schools for whites.

Houston Board Must Submit An Integration Plan

HOUSTON, Texas — (ANP) — The Houston School Board, on Wednesday, was ordered by U. S. District Judge Ben C. Connally, to submit a plan for integration of public schools by Aug. 17. Houston schools, with 170,000 students, is reportedly the largest segregated system in America.

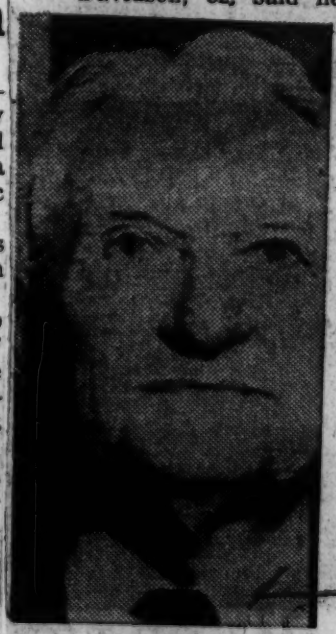
Judge Connally, in 1957, ordered the School Board to integrate "with all deliberate speed," but did not set a deadline. In Wednesday's ruling the jurist ordered the Board "to file its program if it has one."

Judge Connally was asked to reopen the case of two Negro parents who sought to enter their children in "white" schools. The parents' lawyers said they hoped to obtain an order that would integrate the schools at opening of the Fall term in September.

Texas School Integration Suit Judge Bars Seat Bias

DALLAS, Tex. (AP)—Federal Judge T. Whitfield Davidson, hearing a school integration suit here, said his first nourishment came from the breast of a Negro woman.

Davidson, 82, said he thought there might be some interest in his Southern background. He instructed the marshals that no partiality be shown in seating the races in the crowded courtroom.



JUDGE DAVIDSON

"We are conscious of the great case," he said from the bench.

The judge said his father was a Confederate soldier who was at appomattox with Gen. Robert E. Lee.

"My family owned many slaves," he continued. 'My grandmother tended to them just like she did her own children.

"I love all the traditions of the Old South. The Negro is an important part of those traditions. He has made great progress. I think he has gained his greatest progress by taking the advice of Booker T. Washington 'by doing his job well.' . . .

"The first nutrition I ever had came from the bosom of a Negro woman. It was from the Negro woman who attended me in the first few days of my life.

"I have had dealings with Negroes all my life. The Southern white gentleman does not feel unkindly toward the Negro."

Aldine Schools Remain Closed

Board Still At Stalemate

HOUSTON — On the Aldine School front — the schools remained closed Wednesday; a legal battle waged between two trustees, and some of the teachers, who are the bread winner in the family, have been forced to file applications for work outside of the classrooms.

It has been learned that some of the teachers in the district, which has four Negro schools (three in Acres Home), have sought employment elsewhere. Teachers walked out April 30, after returning from a walk-out April 15 because the district could not meet its payroll. Both white and Negro teachers have voted not to work until they are paid.

The Harris County School Board loaned the Aldine district a grant of $25,000. At the same time school officials are still trying to sell $200,000 in time warrants provided through emergency state legislation.

Word coming out from Supt. W. W Thorne's office late Wednesday revealed there was no break in the Aldine School impasse. Officials said they are still working to get the schools re-opened, but could not say how long it will take.

Negro schools in the district are Carver High, Carver Elementary, Bethune Elementary and Bordersville Elementary School. The Bordersville School is located in Humble and the other three schools are in Acres Home.

Segregation Of Married Pupils Urged

DALLAS, Tex., May 7 (UPI) The Dallas Parent-Teachers Association Council alarmed over an increase in teen-age marriages and pregnancies among school children, has called for sepate schools for married students.

The PT-A acted after a survey disclosed a sharp increase in the number of school marriages and revealed one 12-year-old and two 13-year-old married students.

The report also said 144 girls had been dropped from school because of pregnancy.

Officials reported 480 marriages this year, compared with 386 in 1957, up 41 per cent. The figure was about 5 per cent of the total high school enrollment.

Superintendent of Schools W. T. White disclosed that married students still in school had 72 children.

Dallas Threatens Short School Year If NAACP Wins

DALLAS, (Texas) — (UPI) — Dallas School Superintendent W. T White said this week that the Dallas public schools may have to shorten their school year by as much as six weeks if the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People wins a suit for immediate integration.

The NAACP filed a motion May 20 in federal court for immediate integration to "get the board off center and moving" on an April 16, 1958, integration order.

Dr. White said if the Dallas schools had to integrate immediately, the district would lose 2.5 mililon dollars in state aid under a Texas law that puts integration up to the voters.

The school district is now a party to a suit in state appeals court in an attempt to resolve differences in state laws and federal orders to integrate.

Not only would the district lose the two and a half million dollars in state aid, school officials would be subjected to fines and the district woud lose accreditation if it integrates without a favorable vote of the people, Dr. White added.

Both Dallas and Houston, the largest segregated city in the nation, were named in the litigation filed at Dallas and Houston, the latter also under federal orders to integrate.

The motions were filed by Thurgood Marshall, chief counsel for the NAACP.

The action in Dallas asked Federal Judge T. Whitfield Davidson for a hearing on Monday. However, Judge Davidson, holding court in Fort Worth, said he doubted if a hearing could be scheduled that soon.

Davidson also pointed out the current school term is nearly over and the timing of the hearing is not now extremely important.

Surprise Move On Schools In Dallas, Houston

BY PRESTON McGRAW

DALLAS, Texas — (UPI) — Attorneys filed two surprise motions in Federal court late Wednesday asking for the immediate integration of Dallas and Houston public schools.

Houston, with an enrollment topping 157,000, has the largest segregated school system in the nation.

The two-pronged attack, aimed at forcing Houston and Dallas school boards to speed compliance with already existing federal integration decisions, was launched Wednesday in Federal court by attorneys for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP).

Schedule Hearing Monday

U. S. District Judge Ben Connally in Houston ordered a hearing Monday on the Houston motion. Federal District Judge T. Whitfield Davidson of Dallas was in Fort Worth and was not expected to receive the Dallas motion until later today. It was filed in his clerk's office.

The Dallas motion also asked for a hearing Monday.

The Houston petition asked Connally to order and enforce immediate integration on the basis of his order of two years ago. The Dallas petition is similar. It asks Davidson to put an order of April 16, 1958 into immediate effect.

Dr. Edwin L. Rippy, Dallas school board president, said "we will simply have to sit back and see what Judge Davidson's opinion will be on this matter."

School Boards In Middle

The two school boards are caught between conflicting state and federal laws. In 1957, the Texas legislature ruled integration of public schools must be approved in a local option election, or state aid would be withdrawn.

This would mean the loss of hundreds of thousands of dollars to both school systems if they immediately followed federal dictates.

A case in state appeals court to determine the conflict is set for Sept. 30. Rippy said he feels the state law is unconstitutional and won't stand up in court.

"I say it with regret because I am a strong believer in state's rights and I believe the local option plan is a good one," Dr. Rippy said."

There was no immediate reaction from segregation forces. There is a loosely knit Citizens Council chapter in both cities. State officials have indicated in the past they have more to fear on the explosive race issue from the Ku Klux Klan.

Former Texas Attorney General John Ben Shepperd launched a campaign four years ago that stamped out what he termed an "effort to revive the Ku Klux Klan in Texas.

Last week, however, there was evidence that the terrorist organization was making another effort to increase its membership and become more active. Billboards and posters were thrown up along major highways in Texas and Arkansas urging "God fearing" men to join.

The signs carried a Post Office box number in Texarkana, the border city on the Texas and Arkansas line.

John E. Golden of Hooks, Texas, said he was responsible for the sign. He refued to identify the Klan head and said he knew of "no definite plans at present" other than getting the "right kind of personnel in our organization."

The motion filed in Dallas said "that both by positive action and inaction the school board has required and permitted the schools in Dallas to operate on a racially segregated basis for a period of time longer than necessary."

There are 1,800 school districts in Texas. Out of these, 123 have desegregated policies for a total of 315,000 white students and 3,600 Negro students in mixed classes.

Governor Orval Faubus of Arkansas has recently made a speaking tour through Texas sharply criticizing the Supreme court, NAACP and President Eisenhower for policies that has thrown his state into the integration spotlight. He spoke at Tyler, then visited Dallas and cancelled a speaking engagement at Houston. He drew tremendous ovations.

Parents of 28 Negroes filed the original Dallas integration suit in 1955 after their children were turned away from white public schools. Judge William A. Atwell, now retired, threw the case out of court, but the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals ordered him to hear the case.

In November, 1956 he criticized the Supreme court and ruled Dallas schools did not have to integrate immediately. "If there are civil rights, there also are civil wrongs," he said.

He was overruled by the Appeals court, and on September 5, 1957 Atwell ruled Dallas schools must integrate at mid-term. Appeals have tied the order in litigation since then.

This order is one of the ones the NAACP wants put into immediate effect.

Trustees Charged With Doing Nothing To End Segregation

HOUSTON — Thurgood Marshall of New York, the NAACP's legal giant, has entered the Houston Public School Desegregation case. Thus, for the second time in nineteen months, members of the Houston School Board find themselves defendants accused of hampering and making no effort in desegregating the public schools in their charge.

On October 16, 1957, Federal District Judge Ben C. Connally ordered the Houston district to integrate its schools "with all deliberate speed," but the magistrate set no specific date. He warned however, that "any inordinate delay or evasion," would not be countenanced.

In a petition filed in federal district court here Wednesday, it was charged that since Judge Connally issued his edict, the Houston Independent School District has "continued to require and permit the elementary and secondary schools to operate on a racially segregated basis."

The petition was filed at 2:10 p.m. Wednesday in the federal district clerk's office by Houston Attorney Weldon H. Berry, one of the four lawyers hired to represent two Negro students —Delores Ross and Beneva Delois Williams — who are seeking admittance into white schools on a non-segregated basis.

In addition to Mr Berry and Mr Marshall, the plaintiffs are also represented by W. J. Durham and U. Simpson Tate, both of Dallas.

Since the 1957 hearing, the Houston School Board has done little, if anything, to carry out Judge Connally's orders. On December 8, 1958, the board, in a closed session, said it was meeting to consider desegregation plans proposed by Attorney Joe Reynolds, the board's lawyer.

Attorney Reynolds' plan recommends that an election be called to ascertain whether or not Houston voters prefer integration or desegregation. According to the Reynolds plan, if the citizens voted for desegregation, then a liberal transfer would be initiated, whereby no white pupil would be forced to attend a mixed school; and the same would hold true for Negro children.

But to this date the board has not acted on this plan, nor have the trustees acted on any plan, what-so-ever.

The petition listed as defendants the seven school board members, including Mrs Charles E. White, the lone Negro board member. This, of course, is an ironical twist, since it has been well established that Mrs White favors integration and is against any form of discrimination of Houston children, whether black or white.

Dr John W. McFarland, superintendent of Houston Schools is also listed as one of the defendants.

The plaintiffs, Delores and Beneva Delois, are the daughters of Mr and Mrs Bennie Benjamin and Mrs Marion Williams, respectively.

NAACP lawyers are asking that the defendants be made to "comply forthwith with the Court's judgement by immediately operating all schools under their supervision in the Houston Independent School District on a nonracial, nondiscriminatory basis."

Open New Attack On Texas Schools Bias

DALLAS, Texas — (UPI) — Negroes are seeking immediate integration of Dallas and Houston public schools. Houston, with an enrollment topping 157,000, has the largest segregated school system in the nation.

The two-pronged attack, aimed at forcing Houston and Dallas school boards to speed compliance with already existing federal integration decisions, was launched this week in federal court by attorneys for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

U. S. District Judge Ben Connally in Houston ordered a hearing Monday on the Houston motion. Federal district Judge T. Whitfield Davidson of Dallas was in Fort Worth and was not expected to receive the Dallas motion until later.

ASK LATER DATE

The Dallas motion also asked for a hearing Monday. The Dallas school board indicated it may ask Judge Davidson to set a later hearing date.

Thurgood Marshall, chief counsel for NAACP, signed both petitions. Three Houston attorneys took the motion before Connally at the same time that three Dallas attorneys, including U. Simpson Tate, chief legal NAACP counsel in the Southwest, filed a petition in Davidson's court.

"Purpose of the (Dallas) motion is obvious," a Negro spokesman said. "It is to get the school board off a dead center course and get it moving. It was ordered to do something but hasn't done anything in a year and a half."

The Houston petition asked Connally to order and enforce immediate integration on the basis of his order of two years ago. The Dallas petition is similar. It asks Davidson to put an order of April 16, 1958 into immediate effect.

Houston Board Backs Election On Segregation

HOUSTON, Tex., June 10 (AP) — The Houston School Board voted 4-1 yesterday to call an election soon to let voters decide whether they want public schools desegregated.

The action was taken on the advice of Board attorney Joe Reynolds because of a recent court petition for another hearing by Houston Negroes who seek school desegregation.

Reynolds advised the Board to comply with Texas laws. These laws require an affirmative integration vote of school district citizens—otherwise the district loses State aid if it integrates.

Mrs. Charles White denounced the recommendation, saying all State laws in opposition to the United States Supreme Court's desegregation ruling already have been ruled null and void. Mrs. White is a Negro.

Houston Will Vote On Desegregation

School Board Decides To Call Election Soon

HOUSTON, Texas, June 9. — (AP) — The Houston School Board voted 4-1 Tuesday to call an election soon to let voters decide whether they want public schools desegregated.

The action was taken on the advice of board attorney Joe Reynolds because of a recent court petition for another hearing by Houston Negroes who seek desegregation.

Mr. Reynolds advised the board to comply with Texas laws. These laws require an affirmative integration vote of school district citizens — otherwise the district loses state aid if it integrates.

Business Manager H. L. Mills said state aid amounts to five million dollars annually.

"If we lose that five million dollars," said Mr. Mills, "I don't think we could go ahead with school and maintain our salary schedule."

Mrs. Charles White denounced the recommendation, saying all state laws in opposition to the United States Supreme Court's desegregation ruling already have been ruled null and void. Mrs. White is a Negro.

"I suggest the board sit down together to work out plans for following Federal Judge (Don) Connally's order rather than to go to this great expense to circumvent it," she said.

The district has been under Federal court order to desegregate "with all deliberate speed" for two years.

Mrs. White fights loan and tax hike

HOUSTON, Texas — Mrs. Charles E. White last week withdrew her support from two school board propositions — to hike school taxes and float a $32 million loan.

Mrs. White, the first of her race to ever be elected to the local board, said she withdrew her support partly because the board "to this date has made no positive steps to implement the Supreme Court decision against segregated public schools."

By her action Mrs. White joined the fight of the city's colored leaders.

Spokesmen for colored people contend that the two proposals are "another attempt of the school board to maintain segregation by building a sufficient number of schools to minimize the effects of desegregation."

MRS. WHITE stood alone against six white members of the board during the group's weekly meeting, which is televised every Monday night. The other six members voted to endorse the two propositions.

In a prepared statement, read before thousands of televiewers, Mrs. White said:

"I voted with the board on March 23 to bring to the citizens the question of the tax raise and the bond issue, realizing the importance of a teacher raise and the need of new buildings, renovation and equipment.

"I am still most sympathetic with this point of view. However, the action of the board since that time has shaken my confidence in whether the money will be spent most advantageously for all children in the districts.

"THESE ACTIONS have made it necessary for me to reconsider the issues.

"First, the board has refused to give further consideration to the need of some students for bus transportation.

"Second, direct quotations in the newspapers from some board members lead us to believe that they feel hunger helps a child develop character.

"Thirdly, more than a year and a half ago the board accepted the decision of Judge Ben Connally to integrate with deliberate speed and made no appeal. As to this date no positive steps have been taken to implement the decision.

"In the light of these facts I cannot in good faith ask the public to support these propositions. I can only suggest that each prayerfully consider all issues involved and vote his conviction as to what is morally right for the school system."

Integration In Dallas Schools Delayed A Year

BY BRYCE MILLER

DALLAS, Tex. — (UPI) — NAACP attorneys pondered ways this week to overcome a federal judge's refusal to order immediate desegregation of Dallas public schools or set up any sort of integration timetable.

Federal Judge T. Whitfield Davidson, 82, Friday, July 31, advised the school board to "put your house in order for integration" and postponed a final ruling until "closer to the fall of 1960."

"I hold we can't sufficiently forecast at this distance what the conditions will be, so I have postponed a decision regarding integration in 1960 until later," the judge explained.

He said he felt his decision was to the "best interest of all" and remarked that his family had "owned plenty of slaves" and that the U.S. Supreme court "has us (the south) over a barrel."

Thurgood Marshall, chief counsel for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), conceded at Thursday's hearing that to begin desegregation this fall might be difficult. He sought to show there would be little administrative difficulty in starting a desegregation program in the fall of 1960.

The NAACP motion had asked for immediate integration.

Dallas School Head Greets Marshall

Dr. Edwin L. Rippy, (left) Dallas School Board president, pauses to shake the hand of NAACP chief counsel Thurgood Marshall at the end of a federal court hearing to test the immediate integration of Dallas public schools. Judge Whitfield Davidson denied the NAACP's request, and refused to set any date for future compliance with the Supreme Court's ruling against segregation of pupils in public schools.

In the "hostile" southland, this picture is considered a rarity. NAACP attorneys in the past have, for the most part, been slurred, ignored and sometimes abused by white leaders striving to hold on to racial segregation and the resulting discriminations. (UPI Photo)

Dallas School Board Between Two Fires

EASTLAND, Tex. (AP) — The Dallas School Board, caught between a federal court order to integrate schools and a state law which stops state aid for schools which do integrate, seeks in a higher court here a way out of the difficulty.

A state law effective Aug. 23, 1957, cannot apply to the Dallas situation, the board contends, because a federal court order to integrate had been issued earlier. The state law cannot be retroactive, the board argued.

There is a clause in the state law which exempts districts which had integrated before the law was effective. Dallas integration had been ordered but not accomplished, which raised a point in the exemption clause application.

Of the 119,000 pupils in Dallas schools, about 22,000 are Negroes.

The board says in its case before the 11th Court of Civil Appeals that board members would be subject to contempt action by the federal court if integration were not carried out, or lose about 2½ million dollars in annual state aid if the schools were integrated.

Board members also would be subject to fines under the state law.

Dallas Wins Integration Time Fight

U.S. Judge Denies Negro Bid To Mix Schools Next Fall

DALLAS, Tex. (AP)—A federal judge refused Thursday to order intgration of Dallas schools this fall. But he told the school board to "put your house in order" for integration which he said will surely come.

Judge T. Whitfield Davidson, 82, opened the day-long hearing by stating his love for Southern traditions but promising a fair hearing. He closed the hearing with what sounded like a lecture to Negro spectators.

"As long as he—the Negro—begins imitating his white brother he is not at his best," said the gray-haired judge. "If you want to rise in life, there is a way. That is to excel."

"A year from now may be sufficient time to integrate. We will not name any date or issue any order.

"The school board should further study this question and perhaps take further action, maybe an election."

THREW DOWN PENCIL

Thurgood Marshall, chief counsel for the National Assn. for Advancement of Colored People, threw his pencil on the table. A strong look of disappointment crossed his face.

Marshall and other Negro attorneys had surprised the courtroom by indicating they were willing to wait until 1960 for integration. They represented Negro parents who had petitioned for integration this fall.

Of the estimated 122,000 pupils in the district, about 22,000 are Negroes.

SCHOOL BOARD DUTY

Dr. W. T. White, school superintendent, declined to outline for Marshall any Dallas integration plans, saying that this was the school board's duty.

White said he still believes as he did earlier that it will take 20 to 25 years to integrate.

The judge, in his lengthy remarks at the close, said the Negro should recognize "that the white man has a right to maintain his racial integrity and it can't be done so esaily in integrated schools."

Dallas school leaders have been in court 10 times because of a conflict between federal integration orders and state law. School districts which integrate without an election stand to loose state money. Such elections are held only if 20 per cent of voters ask for them.

Negroes Of Littlefield Ask All (Integrated) Negro School

LITTLEFIELD — A three-man group, led by a Methodist deacon, has asked that a school for earlier grades be built in their section" of town and the chairman of the school board has said he and other members want more information before acting on the matter.

Littlefield desegregated its classes in 1956 without a loud word spoken. There are 177 Negroes abong 2,000 pupils in primary, elementary, junior high and high schools here.

C. J. Stewart, the deacon, said they wanted the school to save little ones the danger of walking across the railroad. The deacon's point might be well taken, but the chairman of the board seemed more interested in maintaining the excellent desegregation record that this little West Texas town has established than he is the deacon's project.

He said if the board decided to act on the matter, it probably would be a question of zoning rather than segregation. He explained that all Negroes live in the part of town where the school is wanted.

to attend the integrated school. He also wanted a school in the Negro area to serve as a focal point for youth recreation.

When Joe Johnson, chairman of a meeting which about 75 Negroes attended, asked Tuesday night how many wanted to continue sending their children to the integrated school, almost everyone stood. None stood when he asked how many wanted a school in their community.

Littlefield, a community of 9,000, integrated its schools without incident in 1956. There are 177 Negroes attending school with about 1,800 white students.

Negroes In Texas Prefer Own School

But They're Not For Return Of Segregation

LITTLEFIELD, Texas, Nov. 13.—(AP)—Negro leaders in this West Texas town do not want a return of segregated schools but they want a separate elementary school in their community.

"Actually we're not asking for a segregated school. Integration in 1956 was nicely carried out," the minister said.

Rev. Walter Griffin, pastor of another Negro church, was one of three persons who requested the opening of an elementary school in the Negro community.

He said the request was made so the Negro section would have a focal point for social activities and because small children have to cross a railroad track to attend the integrated elementary school.

There are 177 Negroes among the 2,000 pupils in the primary, elementary, junior high and high schools in this city of 9,000.

Negroes Vote To Keep Mixed School

LITTLEFIELD, Tex. (AP)—Negroes in this West Texas city voted Tuesday night to continue sending their children to an integrated elementary school.

The Rev. Walter Griffin, a Negro leader, last week asked the school board for an elementary school in the Negro district so children would not have to cross railroad tracks.

Texas Negroes Have More Brains

We have noticed that a group of concerned Negroes in Texas have asked the local authorities to build a new Negro school and bring an end to racially integrated classrooms.

These Negroes want a return to the friendly atmosphere of the past and want schools operated by Negro teachers for Negro children.

There is clear evidence of a lot more horse sense among a group of Texas Negroes than in all the political government monstrosity which is Washington.

And several fanatic state capitals like Albany, New York and others in the East could be thrown in for good measure, and still the colored thinking in Texas would be the most sensible by far.

Resegregation Is Sought By Texas Negroes

LITTLEFIELD, Tex. (AP) — Negro leaders here say integration is hurtin their children's social life and works a hardship on them. So the adults asked for a school in the Negro district again.

The Rev. Walter Griffin, pastor of a Negro church in this West Texas farming center of 9,000, said a group of citizens in the Negro district asked if he would find out whether it would be feasible to build an elementary school in the Negro section.

Griffin said the integration in 1956 "was nicely carried out. There has been no trouble. It's just that the people I speak for feel it would be better for the Negro community if we had a school in the community."

The Terrible Thing--All Schools To Close In Prince Edward County

(Richmond News Leader)

CLEAR across the country today, editorial writers and vocal politicians will select their very choicest adjectives, as a housewife picks the ripest fruit, to fling at Prince Edward County, Virginia. The schools of Prince Edward are national news, and the county's decision to close those schools is a national story. By nightfall, the barrage of abuse, insult, scorn and stupidity will be well underway.

Before the noise gets overwhelming, it may be useful to say a few things quietly.

Yes, this is a terrible thing. If the county's decision stands up (and we have in mind here only the uncertainties of Virginia law), it will mean the closing of three high schools and 18 elementary schools. For nearly 3,000 pupils—1,300 white children and almost 1,700 Negro children—it will mean a halt to public education. For 70 Negro teachers and principals, it will mean a search for new positions. For the county's white children and white teachers, the autumn will bring both the challenge and the hardship of a new private school operation.

IF ANY of our Northern critics believe Prince Edward reached this melancholy decision in any mood of defiance or bigotry or "race hatred," such critics are woefully mistaken. There is not as much "race hatred" in the whole of Prince Edward County as there is in one precinct of Philadelphia or Detroit. The county is not defying any court: The county was ordered not to deny any child admission to a public school by reason of race, and the county will obey that order to the letter. In September, no child will be denied admission to a public school for any reason. There will be no public schools.

WE WOULD say to our uncomprehending brethren of the North that in the summer of 1959, in Prince Edward County, Virginia, there was nothing else the board of supervisors could have done but what the board did yesterday. The county had sought by every honorable means to avoid this step. White parents, whose children are numerically the minority group, taxed themselves heavily to build a new Negro high school in the hope that such an institution might satisfy legitimate demands of Negro residents. The county was fully prepared to take other steps, at the elementary level, to achieve a public school system that would honestly fulfill the needs of both races.

But it swiftly became apparent eight years ago, that the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People was not interested in the education of Negro children in Prince Edward County. The NAACP's chief interest was not even in putting an end to segregation. The aim was compulsory integration — the intimate race-mixing of white and colored children in the classrooms, playgrounds, and buses of the county — and nothing less than this would suffice.

Prince Edward County resisted this demand as best it could. The county won in the District Court, won again in the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, and then lost (the whole country lost) in the historic decision of May 17, 1954. Five years of further litigation followed, and for a time it appeared the county had won an extension to 1965. Then a few weeks ago, that wise and compassionate decision by an able district judge, Sterling Hutcheson, was rudely overthrown by a new Fourth Circuit Court that bears no discernible resemblance to the former great court of John Parker and Armistead Dobie. The court angrily ordered an immediate beginning of integration. This fall! And while Prince Edward County is devoted, as only a rural county can be, to the cause of public schools, the county is not willing to pay for public schools at any price.

Perhaps the county could yet seek further delays in one more petition for appeal to the Supreme Court in Washington. In theory, perhaps this is what the county ought to do. But the people of Prince Edward have lived nearly 10 years in a state of suspense, apprehension and uncertainty; they have not the slightest reason to suppose that Earl Warren and his colleagues have learned anything in this time; they could expect only one more adverse decree. They are weary of litigation. The breaking point is at hand.

THIS NEWSPAPER aligns itself solidly behind the decision of Prince Edward. We hope, in the course of time, to see some educational opportunities provided for all the children of the county. Meanwhile, we recommend to our readers, without reservation of any sort, the Prince Edward Educational Corporation. We know the people at the head of this wholly private academic organization; they are good, honest and upright people. Contributions or pledges may be addressed to the corporation simply at Farmville.

Let us say once more: Yes, the county's decision is a terrible thing. At a time when education is so vitally necessary to Western civilization, the closing of even a one-room country school is a pity. Yet the county's decision, made necessary by centuries of custom and by the very pattern of the county's life itself, is not nearly so terrible as the wicked and shameless act of the Supreme Court of the United States which led up to it. By abandoning every precept of constitutional construction, and arrogating power brutally to itself, the court brought this tragedy about. The people of the county, white and Negro alike, merit our sympathy. The court merits only contempt.

SO THE LIGHTS of public education blink out in Prince Edward County. The NAACP has won its lawsuit, and the Negroes have lost their schools. It is a victory for no one. It is tragedy for everyone. But the greatest tragedy of all is the tragedy least understood outside the South—the destruction by judicial tyranny of the very safeguards once written into law to prevent such tragedies from coming to pass.

Despite predicted violence Va. integration front calm

NORFOLK, Va. — Despite threats of violence token integration has proceeded peaceful since the barriers of segregation were kicked down at 11 formerly all-white Virginia schools in four areas three months ago.

As close as can be learned, the colored pupils are — for the most part — fairing like their counterparts. Some are doing well, some average, some below average, and a few are failing in their classroom work.

For example: Supt. Q. D. Gasque reports that the 21 colored pupils at Warren County High School are taking 99 classes and passing in 88.

He said that white pupils at the school usually had about six percent failures, as compared with the almost 10 percent failures among the colored pupils at Warren.

When the court ordered the colored children admitted to the school, white pupils failed to return. Many of them have been attending classes in a make-shift private school set up by segregationists.

SUPT. J. J. BREWBAKER declined to disclose such information concerning the 17 colored pupils in six Norfolk schools. He said:

"I have never felt it was quite fair to disclose their grades. Some are making good grades and some are not doing so well . . . They all have adjustment problems."

Supt. Ray E. Williams reported that none of the four children in Arlington schools are failing and Supt. T. C. Williams noted that the nine pupils in Alexandria, for the most part, are doing "fairly well." He did point out that they are not doing as well as a whole as they did in colored schools.

ALL FOUR of the superintendents reported that there have been no incidents.

There have been no social problems in Alexandria, reports Williams. He added that no

29 Negro Pupils Seek Admission To All-White Charlottesville Schools

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va., June 26 (AP)—Twenty-nine Negroes, assigned earlier this month to Negro schools for the coming school year, have asked the Charlottesville School Board to assign them to schools for white children.

Fendall R. Ellis, school superintendent, said the applications will be acted on next week. Names of any Negroes admitted to white schools will be made public then, he said.

The applications were received by the Board yesterday, the final day allowed by the court-approved assignment plan for appeals to placements made June 12.

In the earlier assignment, 11 Negroes were admitted to previously all-white schools for the term starting in September—nine to Venable Elementary School and two to Lane High School.

Seventeen new applications were to Venable, one to McGuffey Elementary, three to Johnson and eight to Lane.

Ellis said all but two were on forms prepared and circulated by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Of the 21 elementary school applicants, 19 live in school districts established in the assignment plan to serve the Jefferson (Negro) School, Ellis said. These will probably be rejected under the plan's proximity criterion.

There is no district set-up for high schools, and Ellis noted that two applicants to Lane live closer to Lane than to Burley, the Negro high school. He added, however, that "proximity is only one factor" among the criteria set up in the assignment plan and approved by Federal District Judge John Paul.

Charlottesville last year was ordered to admit 10 Negroes to Venable and two to Lane. The two schools were closed under the State's now-defunct massive resistance laws and were reopened in February on a segregated basis. The Negroes originally ordered admitted received special tutoring the second semester to bring them to their proper grade level.

Nine of the Negroes assigned to all-white schools earlier in the month were among the 12 ordered admitted by the Federal Court. Two of the others ordered admitted finished elementary school work in the tutoring classes and were assigned to Burley High. One of these two reapplied for admission to Lane, Ellis said.

The 12th Negro ordered admitted to a white school last year has since finished her high school work in tutoring classes.

restrictions have been placed on social events as has been done in other areas.

Although there are no restrictions placed on the Front Royal school no social events have taken place either.

None of the areas have placed restrictions on extracurricular activities. In general, colored pupils have shied away from this part of school life.

PTA Official Backs Almond Supporters

Asks Nomination Of Indorsers of School Policy

A plea for support of those legislators who voted for Gov. Almond's school program has been issued to Virginia PTA groups by a State PTA official.

Hugh M. Davis of Richmond, State PTA legislative chairman, sent a memorandum to PTAs throughout the State urging them to back candidates in next Tuesday's Democratic primary who supported Gov. Almond's Perrow plan.

The memorandum notes that attempts are being made in a number of contests to defeat those legislators who stood with Gov. Almond in adopting a school program that allows localities to decide whether they want to operate integrated schools, or withdraw local support from education.

Advocates of a return to massive resistance, which last year closed school in three communities, are attacking the Governor and his supporters as being weak on the race issue.

Lightsey Appeal

Mr. Davis' plea was followed by an appeal from the head of the Northern Virginia District of the Virginia Parent-Teacher Association to support specific candidates in this area.

William M. Lightsey urged Northern Virginia voters to support Armistead L. Boothe of Alexandria, Delegates Harrison Mann, Kathryn Stone and William L. Winston in Arlington; Delegate John C. Webb, Fairfax, and State Senator Blake T. Newton in Prince William County.

Mr. Lightsey also said that "voters should determine the positions of every candidate on this paramount issue because some candidates who are not incumbents have no voting record but support the Perrow program."

Praises Perrow Plan

Mr. Davis said in his memorandum that the Perrow program appears to be the best solution yet proposed for the school racial program because it continues public schools in areas not faced with desegregation and permits other communities to operate public schools with limited integration if they desire.

"It is felt that members of the General Assembly who worked to pass this legislation should be commended and supported. At times, the legislation passed by the narrow margin of one vote in the Senate," Mr. Davis wrote.

"In some campaigns throughout the State, efforts are being made to defeat members of the General Assembly who voted for this means of preserving our schools.

"The PTA is nonpartisan and does not support political parties or particular candidates. It does, however, support principles and issues.

"In this case we have a clear-cut obligation to support those persons who favor inproving and strengthening our schools."

Negro Steps In Court Hit By Va. Bar

RICHMOND, Va. (AP) — Methods used by the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People in promoting school desegregation cases in Virginia have been challenged in a suit filed by the Virginia State Bar.

A petition filed Monday in Richmond Chancery Court by Aubrey R. Bowles Jr., counsel for the State Bar, asked the court to bar the NAACP and two related organizations from "practicing law, directly or indirectly, in the commonwealth.'

Named as defendants with the NAACP were the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fnud, Inc., and the Virginia State Conference of NAACP Branches.

In the two cases at issue, the State Bar contended the organizations — and the litigants or clients — inspired, directed, controlled and financed the litigation. The State Bar is an official arm of the state government responsible for helping the courts administer the practice of law.

Norfolk Negroes Won't Apply For Integration Yet

NEWPORT NEWS, Va. (AP) — Counsel for Negroes seeking admission to white schools here told a federal judge Tuesday no applications for entrance to the schools would be filed before the start of the September term.

This apparently means schools in this Atlantic Coast port will operate on their traditional segregated basis this coming year.

The Negroes' counsel told U.S. Judge Walter E. Hoffman at a pre-trial conference of their decision not to apply before the school term starting Sept. 8.

Under a prior order of the court, the school board is required to file not later than Nov. 12, 1959, a plan for the admission of pupils in the public schools without regard to race.

FRONT ROYAL AS SYMBOL OF THE SOUTH

(Charleston News & Courier)

Speaking in Front Royal, Va., Sen. Strom Thurmond referred to that community as "the very symbol of the South's determination to preserve and maintain states' rights."

By setting up a private educational foundation when deprived by federal court of control over local schools, Front Royal gave convincing demonstration of individual independence and initiative in an age of regimentation.

"Not only," said Sen. Thurmond "did you preserve the right of self-control of the education of your children, but your actions also contributed immeasurably to the morale of your fellow Southerners, not only in Virginia, but far beyond the borders of this commonwealth, throughout the South."

Even as Front Royal raised the spirits of Southerners last fall, Sen. Thurmond's confident speech must have encouraged the spirit of resolution in Virginia.

The old Dominion can use some of the Thurmond confidence. Sen. Harry F. Byrd must have been aware of that when he invited the South Carolinian to speak in Front Royal.

Virginians will go to the polls July 14 to elect a new General Assembly. The opposing forces in the last General Assembly were almost evenly balanced. Gov. J. Lindsay Almond's so-called moderates held supremacy over the bolder pro-Byrd group in the legislature by only a handful of votes.

Aggressive campaigning by the pro-Byrd, hard-line resisters, could result in control of the legislature and stiffening of state resistance to integration. Southerners can only hope that the Thurmond message of confidence and bold action was taken to heart by Virginians who heard and read his address.

Charlottesville to Try Segregation by Sex

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va., July 10 (AP) — Segregation by sex will be tried in some school classes here when desegregation begins next fall.

The city's School Board approved the experiment last night and simultaneously, recommended the enrollment of a 12th Negro in white schools in September.

Twenty-eight other Negro transfer applications which came before the board last night were rejected. The board said it would forward its recommendations on the applications to the State Pupil Placement Board in Richmond.

Earlier this year, the School Board had recommended the admission of 11 Negroes to the city's white schools—two to Lane High School and the other nine to Venable Elementary School.

Last night's action brought to three the number of Negroes approved by the board for enrollment at Lane High. The applicant, not named, would be enrolled in the eighth grade.

School Supt. Fendall R. Ellis made the proposal for segregation by sex. He said that as an "experiment," boys and girls would be separated at certain class levels in every city school next session. Levels at which the segregation by sex is carried out are to be determined later, with the prospect that the levels will differ at the various schools.

The school board authorized Mr. Ellis to try out the plan for one year. He is to report to the board on its results next year.

Mr. Ellis said the segregation by sex "won't be a wholesale thing and is strictly an experiment." The grades to be segregated by sex are to be determined by city school principals.

Of the 29 Negro transfer applications presented to the school board, eight asked admission to Lane High, 17 to Venable, three to Johnson Elementary, and one to McGuffey Elementary.

Meanwhile, the Lane High-Albemarle High football game this fall has been canceled, apparently because Albemarle will not participate in athletics with integrated schools.

The cancellation was made by mutual agreement of the two principals last Wednesday. Lane within several hours filled the date by scheduling George Washington of Alexandria.

Two Negroes have been assigned to Lane for the term opening in September.

...Poises For Integration

RICHMOND, Va. (AP)—Virginia moved Friday toward the state's first public school integration next week with Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. resisting last ditch moves in the Legislature to block it.

Advocates of continued massive resistance to any classroom race mixing sought without success to get Almond's backing for legislative moves to open more segregated time.

Almond's aides reported he was standing firm on the program he offered the Assembly when he conceded Wednesday massive resistance had run its legal course. He offered the Assembly a program of transition to a system of partial private schooling to minimize integration as much as possible. Moreover, the opposition conceded the governor had the votes in the Assembly to hold the line the way he wanted it. Almond's supporters were claiming 70 votes in the 100-member House and a majority of the 40-man Senate.

NORFOLK READY

The seaport city of Norfolk went ahead with arrangements to reopen Monday the six high and junior high schools closed by the state last September when a federal court directed the admission of 17 Negro pupils. Ten thousand white pupils were displaced by the closures.

Safety Director Calvin H. Dalby said the city did not intend to make a show of police force at the schools Monday. He did not enlarge on this. But he called the attention of newsmen to earlier statements he and Police Chief Harold Anderson have made. Both [illegible] obviously they do not expect [illegible] but police have been trained since last summer to be prepared for possible emergencies.

In Urban Arlington County on this side of the Potomac River from Washington, school authorities planned for the admission of four Negro pupils to Stratford Junior High School which is attended by 1,076 white pupils. But counsel for the Arlington School Board explored a final avenue of delay by turning to Chief Justice Earl Warren of the U.S. Supreme Court in the wake of Thursday's turndown by a U.S. Appeals court judge.

WANTED REPLY

The chief justice told the attorney Frank Ball, to list his grounds for a stay and said he wanted a reply from counsel for the four Negro pupils by 11 a.m. Saturday. Warren promised to act promptly.

Legislators seeking some action stronger than Almond's request for repeal of the compulsory school attendance law and his tuition grant bill offered new proposals and saw a couple of early ones quickly killed in committee.

THREATENED RIFT

Leaders on both sides said the course of the Assembly—before it recesses to let a study commission draft a long-range transitional program—probably would include a compromise to ward off a threatened serious rift in the state Democratic organization. They didn't expect the compromise would be anything strong enough to defer the integration in Norfolk and Arlington.

One late effort, a proposal by delegate Sam Pope of Southampton County, would segregate pupils by sex where they couldn't be segregated by race. A legislator said Almond turned this one down, too.

ATTENDANCE LAW

In floor action, the House gave quick approval to the Almond administration's bills to repeal the compulsory school attendance law set up a three-million-dollar program for the payment of tuition grants of $250 per pupil for private schooling and make it a felony for anyone over 14 to threaten or communicate a threat of a bombing. There have been 90 school-bombing hoaxes in the state since October, plus scattered others at theaters and churches.

Leaders on both sides said it appeared the Assembly would remain in session through Monday and perhaps later before taking the recess the governor suggested. Members said they wanted to be on hand at least past Monday's deadline for integration in Arlington and Norfolk.

Virginia and U.S. Courts Hit at Bias

By CHARLES E. MAHON,
United Press International.

RICHMOND, Jan. 19.—Virginia laws providing "massive resistance" to school integration were struck down today in separate rulings by the state Supreme Court of Appeals and a three-judge federal court.

The state court ruled that private school tuition payments could not be made to those pupils whose public schools were closed by integration.

The federal panel said all pupils were to be afforded equal protection of Virginia laws and that [illegible] public schools could not be singled out for closing because of integration orders.

The federal court, noting the closures, said they were "tragic."

'Evasive Schmes' Hit.

It said neither the Norfolk school board, nor nay other defendants, including state officials, could resort to "evasive schemes which are discriminatory or are designed to evade the court (desegregation) orders."

Nine Virginia schools have been closed, affecting 13,000 children, since September because of the state's laws forbidding integrated facilities.

Petition Denied.

The state court ruled first—denying a petition by the attorney general to force the comptroller general to use a law granting tuition money for private instruction to pupils thrown out of schools by integration closings.

Hard on the heels of the state action, a three-judge federal panel at Norfolk declared unconstitutional one of the state's "massive resistance" laws used to close some schools there.

The state court, in a 5-2 decision, ruled that one of the laws to close integrated schools automatically and to cut off state funds to integrated schools violates the Virginia constitution.

Key Law Ruled Out.

The federal court, in its unanimous ruling, specifically struck down the school closure law, considered the keystone in Gov. J. Lindsay Almond's determined efforts to resist integration. Gov. Almond was expected to appoint a legislative commission to draft new legislation for a General Assembly session.

The possibility existed that today's two rulings could result in limited integration during the interim before the legislature can meet.

Gov. Almond himself arranged the test case of the state laws, many of which were drawn up while the governor was attorney general.

Two Courts Torpedo Virginia Bias Laws; Mixed Schools Near

RICHMOND, Va., Jan. 19 (AP).—Virginia's legal barriers against racial integration, under which nine white schools have been shuttered since September, toppled today in the State Supreme Court.

The unappealable 5-to-2 decision brought the immediate prospect of some classroom race mixing before the Legislature can attempt to erect new blockades.

VOICES 'FAITH' IN COURT

It also brought from Gov. J. Lindsay Almond, Jr., an expression of "faith in the ability and judgment" of the seven members of the State court, plus the announcement he would confer with other State leaders on the best future course to take.

The State Supreme Court opinion followed by minutes the decision of a three-judge Federal Court in Norfolk striking down the State law under which six Norfolk schools have been kept closed. The Federal Court said it wasn't attempting to tell Virginia—aside from State constitutional requirements—it had to operate public schools.

But as long as the State did operate such a system, it added, the closing of some schools, or even grades of the schools, violated the rights of a citizen to equal protection under the law.

OPERATION MANDATORY

The State Supreme Court, however, ruled that Virginia still was subject to a requirement of the State constitution to operate a public school system throughout the State.

This was the nub of the Almond Administration's test of the so-called massive resistance laws before the court.

The Administration argued that when the Supreme Court of the United States knocked out the school segregation section of the Virginia constitution it also invalidated the requirement for public school operation. Attorney Gen. A. S. Harrison, Jr., contended the two sections were interdependent and inseparable. The 1954 U. S. opinion left Virginia with the authority to operate or not operate schools as it saw fit, the Administration argued.

"The provisions of the Constitution do not permit the matter to be so summarily disposed of," said the 22-page majority opinion by Chief Justice John W. Eggleston. " . . . The language (requiring public free schools) is clear and positive in its terms and provisions . . . We are not permitted to speculate on what the framers of that section might have meant to say, but are of necessity, controlled by what they did say."

The court then proceeded to throw out the school closing law which has been invoked in Norfolk affecting 10,000 pupils; Charlottesville, affecting 1700, and Warren County High at Front Royal, 1000. Almost all of the displaced pupils in Warren and Charlottesville have been attending makeshift private classes in churches and other community buildings. About 4500 of the displaced Norfolk pupils are in private classes or tutoring groups.

STRESSES LOCAL RULE

The court held the closure and State seizure violated a constitutional section vesting supervision of local schools in local school boards.

It also held the Governor had no authority to set up a substitute State school system for pupils displaced by State school closure under Federal integration orders.

Fourth Va. Community

Mixing Is Ordered In Warren County

RICHMOND, Va. (AP) — A fourth Virginia community—rural Warren County in the northwest—was ordered Tuesday by a federal judge to open its white classrooms to 22 Negro pupils next week.

Even as U.S. Dist. Judge John Paul issued a Feb. 18 desegregation order for the reopening of closed Warren High at Front Royal, the city of Alexandria, 50 miles to the east, held racially mixed classes in three schools for the first time.

Judge Paul ruled in the Warren case after a brief hearing in his court at Harrisonburg. He turned down the plea of school board Atty. W. J. Phillips that the reopening of the school be put off until next September.

Phillips argued it would be harmful to switch at this time the 780 pupils who have been given classes in a makeshift private school system. He said he could promise the high school would be open on a desegregated basis in September.

But Paul acceded to the arguments of Oliver W. Hill, counsel for the Negro pupils, that his 22 clients, as well as about 100 white pupils, who are not taking the private schooling, deserve immediate consideration. Hill noted, too, that state and federal courts have invalidated the law under which the high school was closed last September to fend off the admission of Negroes.

Paul said at one point he felt the school board was seeking to delay the reopening in the hope of finding a way out. He noted the Virginia legislature would reconvene March 31 to try to enact a program to contain or minimize the spread of integration.

"The legislature may devise," he said, "some futile laws as they did in 1956 (the massive resistance plan that fell in the courts). My feeling is that you want to wait until next fall in the hope that some way to avoid integration will be found."

Paul said at first the school should be reopened Monday, Feb. 16. But he extended this to Wednesday when he was advised pupils in the private program were in the midst of mid-year examinations.

On integrated basis—

Virginia school ordered to reopen

BALTIMORE, Feb. 16—(AP)—A federal appeals judge today refused to postpone the ordered reopening of the Warren County, Virginia, public high school on an integrated basis.

Chief Judge Simon E. Sobeloff of the Fourth U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals, rejected contention by the county school board that best interests of both white and Negro students would be served if the private school system were retained until next September.

William J. Phillips, speaking for the school board, said flatly, "we're defeated on segregation. We know it. We don't favor integration, but we've been defeated."

HE ADDED, however, that to transfer all students from the present private school setup back to the county's high school at Front Royal would be injurious to their curricula and possibly cause them to lose credits for the year.

Sobeloff gave his decision immediately after the hour-long hearing.

After saying that he was denying the school board's plea for a postponement to integration, he said, "I think by any standard that what Warren county has been doing is indefensible . . . I have heard nothing that would justify altering the lower court's ruling."

IN FRONT ROYAL, Va., Q. D. Gasque, Warren County school superintendent, said after Sobeloff's ruling that registration would be held at the high school Wednesday morning. He indicated, however, that he did not expect many pupils to show up.

Firm plans on a future course will be made after school officials see how many pupils register, Gasque said. He said that at present there is no plan to carry the appeal higher.

Gasque also said there is a good possibility there won't be many teachers on hand when the school reopens.

Virginians Hit At Gov. Almond

FRONT ROYAL, Va. (AP)— A group of citizens who say they believe Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. "let us down" on the school integration issue will ask that he be dropped as principal speaker for the June 9 graduation exercises of the Warren County private high school.

A spokesman for a "Citizens Committee" of 35 said a petition will be presented to this week's meeting of the Warren County Education Foundation, which sponsors the segregated private school here, requesting that the invitation be withdrawn.

In Richmond, Almond advised the foundation today he preferred "not to speak" at the exercises if his presence "would cause the slightest embarrassment."

Va. Judge Orders More Negroes To All-White Schools

ALEXANDRIA, VA (IGN) Segregation sustained another heavy blow here Wednesday when a federal judge ordered the admission of nine Negro children to formerly all-white schools.

One of Virginia's oldest cities, Alexandria, is the ancestral home of George Washington and located near the Potomac River, adjacent to recently integrated Arlington.

Federal Judge Albert V Bryan, in instructing the City School Board to enroll the nine students in two elementary schools and a high school, said further delay would involve many problems, and turned down a request for postponement.

Fourteen students had previously applied for admission to four schools. The judge sustained the board's rejection of five students, three because they live closer to the Negro school than the white school they sought admission to and two because of inadequate scholastic rating.

While the judge was gravelling justice into the Alexandria school system Negro students who entered previously all-white schools at Norfolk and Arlington had another peaceful day in classes. Police were still on the scene in Arlington, but the number was sharply cut as the wheels of democracy smoothly rolled on.

Not a single incident had been reported in the two cities up to Thursday.

Elsewhere on the Virginia front Charlottesville reopened two schools on a segregated basis. The city was granted a delay until next September based on a promise to draft a new desegregation plan.

Warren County officials said Mr. Ellis said the segregation by sex "won't be a wholesale thing and is strictly an experiment."

Of the twenty-nine Negro transfer applications presented to the School Board last night, eight asked admission to Lane High, seventeen to Venable, three to Johnson elementary and one to McGuffey Elementary School.

SCHOOLS PLANNING SEX SEGREGATION

Charlottesville Will Separate Boys and Girls as Racial Integration Begins

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va., July 10 (AP)—Segregation by sex will be tried at some class levels in Charlottesville schools when the city begins racial desegregation next fall.

The City School Board approved the experiment last night and at the same time recommended the enrollment of a twelfth Negro in white schools in September.

Twenty-eight other Negro transfer applications that came before the board last night were rejected. The board said it would forward its recommendations in a resolution to the State Pupil Placement Board in Richmond.

Earlier this year, the School Board recommended the admission of eleven Negroes to the city's white schools—two to Lane High School and the other nine to Venable Elementary School.

Last night's action raised to three the number of Negroes approved by the board for enrollment at Lane High. The applicant, not named, would be enrolled in the eighth grade.

Superintendent Fendall R. Ellis made the proposal for segregation by sex. He said that, as an experiment, boys and girls would be separated at certain class levels in every city school next session. Levels at which the segregation by sex is carried out will be determined later by the city school principals.

The School Board authorized Mr. Ellis to try the plan for one year. He is to report to the board on its results next year.

Almond may go to people in racial row

RICHMOND, Va., May 9 (AP)—Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr., indicated Saturday he may turn to the fireside chat technique to try to win wider acceptance of his view that public schools cannot be retained without a degree of racial integration.

ALMOND SAID he had been considering going on a statewide radio-TV hookup to explain "the bitter truth" of the choice the state has been forced to make.

In the governor's view the choice lies only between integration, contained or minimized as much as possible, or no public school system—either state or local.

Plans for a direct report to the people apparently are only in the discussion stage.

But Almond made no bones about his feeling that those who still contend the state can operate integration-free public schools if it would only assert its authority are doing Virginia a disservice. The broadcast would aim partly at rebutting such a view of state authority.

"THE PEOPLE must be made to understand that no state has the power to stand against the final decree of the federal courts. The only way to prevent any integration is by complete abolition of the public schools," he said. "To resort to that course, smacks of surrender."

The governor contended he had exhausted every honorable, legal means to ward off the race mixing that came to Arlington, Norfolk and Alexandria and apparently will come to Charlottesville and — perhaps — Warren County next Fall.

21 Negroes in Virginia Integrate 7 Schools As Police Stand Guard

No Disorder At Norfolk, Arlington

By DOUGLAS B. CORNELL

RICHMOND, Va. (AP) — Virginia glumly gave way to racial integration Monday and hesitantly took 21 Negro children into seven white schools.

The Negro pupils came and went unmolested at schools in Norfolk and Arlington County. In each community, a few white children refused to attend school with them, picked up their books and left.

IKE PLEASED

Special police details turned out to maintain order. But they didn't have to work at it. There were no commotions, serious incidents or even any cat-calls—only the usual loud chatter of bubbling teen-agers.

White House press secretary James C. Hagerty said in Washington that President Eisenhower had been following the integration process in Virginia quite closely and "thinks it is a fine thing that it has been orderly."

BOMB WARNING

Arlington school officials reported after classes were over for the day that an anonymous telephone call, apparently from a woman, had come through about noon saying a bomb had been planted in Stratford Junior High and timed to go off at 1:30 p. m.

A quick search turned up nothing. In the belief the call was a hoax, authorities ruled out evacuating the building.

THREE SENT HOME

Firecrackers flipped out a window were the nearest thing to a bombing. Three white boys were sent home for that. A white girl was sent home, too, for uncomplimentary remarks about the school principal.

Between the white pupils and handful of Negroes who joined them there apparently was a minimum of ill-will.

Yet it was with grimness and discontent that the Old Dominion watched the ancient ramparts of segregation start tumbling down in a state which once paced the Southland in massive resistance to the mixing of races in the schools.

Through the gaps 17 Negro youngsters filed into six junior and senior high schools in Norfolk, the state's largest city. Another four entered Stratford Junior High in Arlington County, a prosperous suburb of Washington.

So, for the first time in Virginia's history, Negroes and whites began attending public schools together, limited though the scale of integration might be at the outset.

Here, in this capital of the Confederacy during a war fought over another racial issue, the Legislature rang out with continued cries of segregationists.

"This," said Del. Sam E. Pope, "is one of the blackest days Virginia has faced since reconstruction."

"The rape of our constitutional rights is an accomplished fact," said Sen. Mills E. Godwin," also from the southside, the area most heavily populated with Negroes.

Segregationists in the Legislature still hunted hopefully, but with slim chances of success, for some new device to bring integration to a halt. One rallying point, a new school closure bill, was defeated in the Senate.

Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. and legislators alike voiced gratification that the transition to integration was peaceful at Norfolk and Arlington. That was just what school and community authorities had predicted—with crossed fingers.

NO VIOLENCE REPORTED

Both at Norfolk and in Arlington, 200 miles to the north, extra police were on duty just in case. But both inside and outside the buildings no violence or even unpleasantness were reported.

The Negro newcomers offered no complaints at their treatment. Demonstrations against them were lacking, even though camaraderie was lacking too.

Yet bespectacled Lewis Cousins, the one Negro admitted to Maury High in Norfolk, said he "made a few friends, mostly in the halls."

CLOSED IN SEPTEMBER

Norfolk's six secondary schools had been closed since last September. They never opened them after federal courts ordered the 17 Negroes admitted and Virginia brought into play a now dead law to close them automatically.

In the interval, most pupils went into other public or private schools or tutored classes.

The expected enrollment last fall would have been 9,950. Monday's belated enrollments totaled 6,443—about 1,000 less than school officials had expected. Whether this difference measures the extent of protest against integration was impossible to say.

The Norfolk schools were open only half a day, for enrolling the pupils and assigning them to classes. Classes begin Tuesday. A number of white children said it was good to be back, even with integration, although they still would prefer segregated schools.

In every instance, the arrival and departure of the Negroes at the schools of Virginia's metropolis-seaport were without incident. Police watched unobtrusively, mainly from cruise cars.

In Arlington, precautions were far more elaborate but equally unneeded. A hundred police, ready

The county school administration said 73 of the 1,076 white pupils were absent—fewer than usual and that no particular tension was present.

Fighting On, Say Virginia Papers

By The Associated Press

Southern editorial reaction to the admission of 21 Negroes into schools at Norfolk and Arlington, Va., Monday ranged from relief that there were no major incidents to a statement that Americans outside the South have lost sight of the law.

The Richmond, Va., News Leader said, "We do not see this sociological venture as good, but as a positive evil. Virginia does not submit in obedience to what we conceive to be law; Virginia submits only in recognition of superior force."

"CONTINUE TO RESIST"

"The rest of the country has condoned the act of usurpation by the Supreme Court," the editorial continued. "Blinded by an emotional dust storm Americans outside the South have lost sight of the law. Virginia will continue to resist a social experiment that seems to her people unwise, ill-timed and violently executed. Virginia will survive. The South will survive."

The Birmingham, Ala., News declared, "All Southerners have especial reason to be proud of the peaceful conduct of Virginians," but the editorial said, "It was an uneasy peace still. For here once more was the sad, sad sight of school children trying to go about the business of schooling themselves in the presence of policemen."

CITIES "PROPER" WAY

The Chattanooga, Tenn., News-Free Press said, "Virginia does not represent a pattern of defeat for the South but a pattern of solution. There is one proper way to protest forced integration and to avoid it. That way is for those who do not wish to surrender to it simply to absent themselves from those places where it will occur. This sort of quiet avoidance should be encouraged by the assurance that state grants will be available to finance educational opportunity in a manner that will be desirable and acceptable."

In Florida, the Tampa Tribune asserted, "By exhausting all possible legal defenses, Virginia demonstrated to the South that segregation cannot be legally maintained in publicly operated schools."

WITHOUT VIOLENCE

The Tribune also wrote, "Virginia has shown that with officials who respect law and order and who demand similar respect from the people, a measure of school integration can be accomplished, if necessary, without the violence and educational turmoil which have left their scars on other southern cities."

Virginia County Closes Public Schools

FARMVILLE, Va.—(UPI)—The 21 public schools of rural Prince Edward County closed officially Wednesday in the most drastic move taken by a southern locality to avoid the effects of an integration decree.

The schools in effect closed indefinitely when the school term ended early in June but the closure became formal Wednesday when the county began operating under its new budget.

The school closures end public education for more than 1,600 Negro students and 1,300 whites in the "southside" Virginia county, a defendant in the Supreme Court's historic 1954 desegregation ruling. The action puts 70 white and 70 Negro teachers out of work.

The county Board of Supervisors voted a month ago to close the schools in defiance of an integration order handed down by the Fourth U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which canceled a seven-year integration delay granted by Federal Judge Sterling Hutcheson of Richmond.

The supervisors made their action final last Friday by adopting a budget for the fiscal year starting Wednesday with no money included for education.

The same day, the Supreme Court refused a petition by the county school board asking a delay of the integration order pending a full appeal.

The supervisors, at odds with the school board which considered the shutdowns too severe, refused even to wait for the Supreme Court's ruling before adopting the budget.

Promises Made To Educate Whites On Private Plan

The white teachers have been promised employment by the Prince Edward School Foundation which plans to educate the white students in makeshift facilities including churches and lodge halls.

No plans have been made to educate the Negroes, and most of the Negro teachers plan to seek employment rather than await the outcome of a suit promised by NAACP Attorney Oliver W. Hill in an effort to force the county to appropriate school money and operate integrated classes.

Prince Edward To Close Schools

FARMVILLE, Va.—(UPI)—Strongly segregationist Prince Edward county decided Friday, June 26, to close down all its public schools in final defiance against U. S. Supreme court-ordered integration.

The move came shortly before the U. S. Supreme Court turned down a last-ditch plea from the Prince Edward school board for a delay of integration pending one last appeal.

The county board of supervisors thus climaxed an eight-year-old racial crisis by formally and finally deciding to close all 21 public schools in the county. It was the first such final action in the nation.

The county board of supervisors thus climaxed an eight-year-old racial crisis by formally and finally deciding to close all 21 public schools in the county. It was the first such final action in the nation.

Only an 11th hour appeal from the NAACP, promised by Attorney Oliver W. Hill of Richmond, could keep the more than 1,600 Negro students and 1,300 whites in the county from having their public education ended.

The whites will switch to private makeshift schools, planned years ago, but there is no prospect for further formal education for the Negroes.

The supervisors voted the school closures last month rather than bow to the circuit court order but final approval of the plan did not come until Friday.

The Prince Edward case started in 1951 when a Negro teenager told a federal judge his high school was inferior to that attended by white students.

sign that they're not complete grown up at the sexual level."

Henrietta Additon, former New York deputy police commissioner and a founder of the Police Athletic League (PAL) organized to keep New York youngsters constructively occupied, said:

"This is a very serious thing, but I doubt that racial tension is involved. The feeling in such cases seems to be that if they all do it together, then they'll all be punished the same.

"If there's some irresponsible one in the crowd, he may suggest such a thing and another with about the same mentality seconds the idea. Without much thought the others follow.

"It is a menace to the community, such a thing. It puts ideas into other badly adjusted minds."

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People—NAACP—said, through Henry Lee Moon, director of public relations:

"These boys are entitled to a fair trial just as were the Tallahassee boys. We anticipate such a trial in New York City."

"We are gravely concerned about crime regradless of race or color," Moon said. "We are interested in justice—equal justice—being meted out in any case.

"We recognize there are Negroes who commit crimes and whites who commit crimes; that there are white victims and that there are Negro victims. Our concern is for equal fair play."

He said the NAACP, at this time, has no intention getting into the case.

Officials Keep Vigil At Virginia Schools

RICHMOND, Va. (AP) — Wary school officials and watchful police in both Norfolk and Arlington maintained a careful vigil Tuesday during the second day of racial integration in the schools of the two cities.

There were no reports of major incidents during the day and enrollment at Norfolk's integrated schools jumped nearly 500 over Monday as the worries of parents apparently eased a bit overnight.

The school officials and police, however, were unconvinced that the dangers of trouble and disturbance were over in a State that submitted unwillingly to federal court mandates for integration.

In diminished numbers and with little to do but look on, police still stood guard at three senior and three junior high schools in Norfolk and at Stratford Junior High in Arlington.

The school day began in both communities — 200 miles apart — without a hitch. No demonstration, no pickets, no violence — just a bit of hooting about "the niggers" from white youngsters at Norfolk's Norview High.

Ray E. Reid, Arlington school superintendent, said he thinks there still could be trouble.

"I don't think we can take too many precautions," he said.

A veteran policeman inquired: "Who knows what will happen when we leave?"

Both the lights and police were kept on again in the night at Stratford, a modern yellow brick building in a prosperous Washington suburb.

Alexandria, another Virginia community a few miles away, will learn in a day or two whether a federal court will decree admission of 14 Negroes to its public school system.

The school board turned them [illegible]. Legal arguments on the action ended Tuesday before U.S. Dist. Judge Albert V. Bryan. The judge promised a ruling in a day or two. Whichever way it goes, the decision almost certainly will be appealed to the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

For Norfolk, it was the first day of racial mixing in actual classes.

Virginia Seeks Plan To Limit School Mixing

RICHMOND, Va. (AP) — Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr.'s Commission on Education named a 10-man executive committee Wednesday to do the spadework in the search for a plan to contain or minimize the spread of integration in Virginia's public schools.

State Sen. Mosby G. Perrow Jr., of Lynchburg, commission chairman, announced the executive committee appointment at the conclusion of an organizational meeting at the state capitol.

LONG SESSION

The nearly four - hour session was devoted largely to Almond's outlining of his views and recommendations and the attorney general's discussion of legal aspects of the problem. Both the governor and Atty. Gen. A. S. Harrison Jr. answered numerous questions raised by commission members. Neither would discuss with newsmen just what had been placed before the commission.

Perrow and other commission members also were tight - lipped as to what had gone on in the closely guarded meeting room. However, prior to the group's meeting, Almond had been represented as favoring an escape hatch for localities unwilling to meet the constitutional requirement for operation of public schools, if such schools must be integrated.

Perrow said the executive committee will meet Thursday at 9 a.m. to work out the agenda and working schedule for a job of handling the study requested by the governor. He added the full commission adjourned subject to call which he said could be expected some time next week.

Meanwhile, the second day of integrated classes at three Alexandria schools proceeded quietly.

No incidents were reported at Norfolk or Arlington, where 21 Negro students entered previously all-white public schools last week.

ADMISSION DENIED

The Virginia Pupil Placement Board, meanwhile, denied 11 Negro children admission into a white Richmond school this semester.

The board said it rejected the transfer requests because they were not received until the day the new semester opened.

At Front Royal, the president of the Warren County Educational Foundation said Wednesday that his organization would be responsive to community feeling as to whether it should continue private classes when the county's only high school is reopened.

U. S. District Judge John Paul has ordered Warren County high school to open next Wednesday on an integrated basis.

Plan Permits Students to Pick School

By a Star Staff Writer

RICHMOND, Jan. 30.—Delegate Kathryn Stone of Arlington today advanced a proposal to permit the voluntary transfer of any pupil to any school in Virginia.

"The plan would stop a mass exodus of children from the public school system to private schools," she said. It would help preserve a State-wide public school system.

Mrs. Stone said she will offer the proposal to the Governor's legislative study commission which is expected to be appointed after the special session of the General Assembly adjourns.

The idea, she said, also would minimize the use of tuition grants which the General Assembly is now in the process of authorizing.

"Those parents who objected to have their child attend a desegregated school," Mrs. Stone said, "could place their child in any public school which remains segregated. The State would pay the cost only if the transfer were outside of the child's home locality."

The legislator saw quick enactment of the Governor's tuition grant legislation, but she added:

"A long-term tuition grant program would mean a steady deterioration of our State public school system and would ultimately bankrupt the taxpayers."

Under her proposal, there would be no expense if a child transferred from one school to another within his home locality.

Almond Stays Firm On School Plan

Resists Last Ditch Moves To Block Integration Monday

RICHMOND, Va., Jan. 30—(AP) Virginia moved today toward the state's first public school integration Monday with Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. resisting last ditch moves in the Legislature to block it.

Advocates of continued massive resistance to any classroom race mixing sought without success to get Almond's backing for legislative moves to win more segregated time.

Almond's aides reported he was standing firmly on the program he offered the Assembly when he conceded Wednesday massive resistance had run its legal course. He offered the assembly a program of transition to a system of partial private schooling to minimize integration as much as possible.

Moreover, the opposition conceded the governor had the votes in the Assembly to hold the line the way he wanted it. Almond's supporters were claiming 70 votes in the 100-member House and a majority of the 40-man Senate.

Norfolk went ahead with arrangements to reopen the six high and junior high schools closed by the state last September when a Federal court directed the admission of 17 Negro pupils. Ten thousand white pupils were displaced by the closures.

Safety Director Calvin H. Dalby said the city did not intend to make a show of police force at the schools Monday.

In urban Arlington County on this side of the Potomac River from Washington, school authorities planned for the admission of four Negro pupils to Stratford Junior High School which is attended by 1067 white pupils. But counsel for the Arlington School Board explored a final avenue of delay by turning to Chief Justice Warren in the wake of yesterday's turndown by a U. S. Appeals Court judge.

The chief justice told the attorney, Frank L. Ball, to list his grounds for a stay and said he wanted a reply from counsel for the four Negro pupils by 11 a.m. tomorrow. Warren promised to act promptly.

One late effort, a proposal by Del. Sam Pope would segregate pupils by sex where they couldn't be segregated by race. A legislator said Almond turned this one down, too.

In floor action the House gave quick approval to the Almond administration's bills to repeal the compulsory school attendance law, set up a $3 million program for the payment of tuition grants of $250 per pupil for private schooling and make it a felony for anyone over 14 to threaten or communicate a threat of a bombing. There have been 90 school bombing hoaxes in the state since October, plus scattered others at theatres and churches.

[illegible] Of Attendance Law Studied

Start May Be Made On Voiding Public School Requirement

By ALEX R. PRESTON
Star Staff Writer

RICHMOND, Jan. 26—A pitched legislative battle over Virginia schools was taking shape today as word leaked out from Gov. Almond's administration that Wednesday's General Assembly session has a two-fold purpose:

1. Repeal of Virginia's compulsory attendance law.

2. Enactment of new tuition grant legislation to finance private schooling for students who refuse to attend integrated schools.

Southside legislators, seeking sterner measures suc as seizure of all schools by the General Assembly are expected to try to lead the legislators in their direction.

There also is talk of setting in motion the necessary legislative machinery to repeal Section 129 of the State constitution which requires operation of public schools, although this could not be done in time to meet the approaching integration deadlines.

Limit to Goals Sought

But top leaders in the governor's administrative family let it be known that they intend to consider only the compulsory attendance and tuition grant issues at the emergency session.

Neither measure would prevent integration in those areas where school boards are ready to operate schools and admit Negroes who have won court orders to attend white classes. The two-fold legislative package, however, would allow the State to say that no child would be forced to attend integrated classes against his or her wishes.

Gov. Almond, yielding to mounting demands from South-side Virginia legislators, issued the call last night. He personally gave no hint what he proposed to lay before the session.

Time ran out in Virginia's fight to keep its schools segregated when the State's own Supreme Court and a Federal court junked the massive resistance laws.

"The urgency of the situation demands that the General Assembly be convened immediately to deal with certain specific phases of the school crissis," Gov. Almond told reporters.

He said he would submit such recommendations "as I may deem necessary to make it the public interest and consider such matters as the General Assembly may deem appropriate to the crisis."

Stopgap Action Seen

With a Federal court desegregation order due to admit four Negroes into Arlington's white Stratford Junior High School next Monday, the Legislature presumably will attempt to enact stop-gap legislation until a special commission can draft new legal barriers against integration. Norfolk also is preparing to open mixed classes, and Charlottesville has been advised to do likewise.

The Governor is expected to appoint a commission of perhaps 40 members of the Assembly late today or tomorrow to draft a new school plan.

The Governor's announcement caught most legislators by surprise. It came after a day filled with conferences with assemblymen, mostly from Southside Virginia where Negro population is highest.

Earlier, the Governor had resisted pressures by strong segregationist members of the Legislature to call a special session immediately.

Wants Considered Step

"I must be convinced," he said last Friday, "that such legislation will be effective and not futile. It cannot be approached on an overall hasty basis."

The State Supreme Court and a special three-judge Federal court last Monday invalidated the school-closing law. The State court also struck down a law withholding funds from localities where integration is ordered and said the State could not pay tuition grants for private education of children out of funds withheld from localities where schools had been closed.

The court did say, however that tuition grants could be paid from money specifically appropriated for that purpose.

The object of a quick appropriation for tuition grants would be to make money available so that no child could be compelled to attend a racially integrated school if assigned to one. This would apply particularly in the critical areas of Arlington, Norfolk, Charlottesville and Warren County where Federal court desegration orders have been handed down.

The Governor, presumably, will spell out his plan in an address to a joint session of the House of Delegates and State Senate shortly after the session begins at noon Wednesday.

Would Reconvene Later

Tentative plans indicate the Legislature will be asked to pass several measures before recessing by the end of the week. It would reconvene a few weeks later after the Legislative Commission has completed the drafting of a new program.

First bills to be considered by the special session are due to be introduced Thursday with quick committee action expected. Demands for a special session began almost immediately after the massive resistance laws fell in the courts last Monday. Starting Wednesday and daily thereafter the Governor received delegations of lawmakers in his office.

The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals on Friday upheld the decree of Federal District Judge Albert V. Bryan of Alexandria ordering the four Negroes into Stratford.

At the same time, a special three-judge Federal court issued an injunction restraining the governor and the Norfolk School Board from keeping 10,000 children out of six closed schools in Norfolk.

Attendance At Norfolk

NORFOLK, Va. (AP) — Attedance at Norfolk's six integrated schools Tuesday totaled 6,837, an increase of almost 500 over Monday's opening day attendance of 6,350.

School officials said they expect attendance to increase day by day as more pupils still attending public schools in other communities and private schools here return to their old schools.

Here is a breakdown of first day-September's segregated enrollment (first figure), the number in attendance Monday (second), and the number in attendance Tuesday (third):

Granby H.S.—2,132, 1,295, 1,337; Maury H.S.—1,943, 1,185, 1,255; Norview H.S.—2,021, 1,234, 1,361; Blair Jr.—1,254, 800, 990; Norview Jr.—1,145, 837, 870; and Northside Jr.—1,455, 1,009, 1,024.

Virginia board answers school segregation suit

WASHINGTON

The state Pupil Placement Board said last week that colored Richmonders seeking admission to the city's white schools should exhaust their administrative remedies before asking for help from the federal court here.

This was the gist of an answer to a suit on file in Federal District Court which names the Pupil Placement Board as a third - party defendant in a school racial segregation complaint.

Other defendants are the Richmond School Board and its superintendent, H. I. Willett.

The parents of three colored pupils have asked the school board to assign their children to Westhampton school at 5800 Patterson Ave. The school board claims it is powerless to assign pupils because under state law that job has been turned over to the Pupil Placement Board.

The children are Daisy June Cooper of 5401 Maria St., Wanda Irene Dabney of 5411 Marian St., and Lorna Renee Warden of 5410 Patterson Ave.

In his answer to the suit, A. B. Scott, counsel for the Pupil Placement Board, said the colored have filed no protests with his board.

"Therefore," Scott added, "no further action hould be taken by the court until these defendants (Pupil Placement Board) have had the opportunity to act in proper and complete discharge of their lawful duties and responsibilities; and the plaintiffs (colored) and each of them has exhausted their administrative remedies as and to the extent urovided by the laws of the Commonwealth Tuesday in an undetermined condition after he fell from a second floor window to the basement of his home in the 600 block Orleans Pl., NE.

Injured on the head and side Ellsworth was admitted to the hospital for cerebral concussion and contusion to the left ribs.

of Virginia."

By this, Scott meant that if the colored pupils could not get a favorable assignment recommendation from the Richmond School Board they should protest to the Pupil Placement Board.

Scott said that the Pupil Placement Board has a rule that no pupil should be transferred from one school to another in the absence of a favorable recommendation from local school officials.

NO SUCH recommendation has been made by Richmond school officials in connection with the request to assign the three to Westhampton school, Scott said.

Scott denied allegations by counsel for the colored children that the children are being denied admission to Richmonds white schools because of their race.

On the contrary, Scott said, the original Supreme Court decision on the racial segregation issued did not affirmatvely decree the mixing of the races in public schools. That decision he added, held that the right of any child to attend any particular school could not be denied on the ground of race or color.

The original Richmond suit involved six colored children, three each seeking admission to Westhampton and Nathaniel Bacon Elementary Schools. Since the suit was filed, Nathaniel Bacon has been converted to a colored school.

No date has been set for a hearing on the Federal District Court suit. The children have asked to be admitted to Westhampton by next September.

FLOYD COUNTY:

14 Virginia pupils ask desegregation

FLOYD, Va. — What's it to be in Floyd County in September — desegregation or no schools?

Either is possible.

The school board met Tuesday and county supervisors quickly agreed to put to the county budget on a month-by-month appropriation basis.

This move enables the county to close either or all three of its high schools on a 30-day notice.

In the eyes of the boardmembers and supervisors this move was necessitated by the fact that 14 of the 28 colored high school pupils have asked to be transferred to the county's three high schools.

THERE ARE no colored high schools in the county and colored pupils are transported to Christianburg Industrial Institute in Montgomery County.

Reuben Lawson of Roanoke, attorney for the applicants, announced last month that a desegregation suit will be filed if the transfer applications are not accepted.

Officials do not expect an attempt to desegregate elementary schools, inasmuch as there are several colored elementary schools in the county.

ALTHOUGH THE board received the applications Tuesday, it was not expected to take formal action. Instead, it was expected that the applications for transfer would be forwarded to the State Pupil Placement Board in Richmond for consideration.

Earlier a state legislator from Floyd County called on colleagues to bow to integration, saying that Floyd County has a high - type of colored citizens and he anticipated no racial disturbances.

RALEIGH, N.C. — North Carolina continues to lead the nation in the number of boys and girls enrolled in 4-H Clubs. The Tarheel enrollment reached 161,264, in 1958, and increase of 6,997.

Negroes Plan No Appeal Of Norfolk Ruling

NORFOLK, Va. (AP) — A federal court ruling upholding the Norfolk School Board's pupil assignment plan will not be appealed by Negro plaintiffs who had challenged the validity of the plan.

Oliver W. Hill, NACP attorney, said Thursday, "We decided after due consideration and consultation with our clients not to appeal the case."

But, Hill said, he interpreted Judge Walter E. Hoffman's ruling to mean the assignment procedures are appropriate only during the "transition" from a segregated to a desegregated school system.

"We still take the position that one child applying to a school should be admitted like any other child," Hill said. "The fact that he is a Negro should make no difference."

The assignment plan, which sets forth procedures and criteria for pupil assignments, applied only to "unusual" transfers and admissions, such as a Negro child to a white school or a white child to a Negro school.

On May 8 Hoffman agreed with the school board's contention that the admission of a Negro child to an all-white or predominantly white school will continue to be "unusual" for some time.

Hill is one of several NAACP attorneys who represented a number of Negro pupils whose applications for white schools were rejected under the assignment plan last summer.

Segregationists Still Fight In Richmond Until Monday

By HOMER BIGART

Special to The New York Times.

RICHMOND, Va., Jan. 30—Segregationists in Virginia's General Assembly stalled action today on the program of Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. for passive acceptance of token public school integration. The house also approved, 93—1, a delay assured that the emergency session of the Assembly would continue through next Monday, when desegregation comes to six schools in Norfolk and one in Arlington County.

[In Arlington County, the school board asked Chief Justice Earl Warren to stay the integration of a junior high school, ordered for Monday.]

The segregationists hope that mounting pressure over the week-end from segregationist organizations will force the Governor and the Assembly to close the schools.

Disorder Seen as Factor

Any disorders attending the integration in Norfolk and Arlington would help the segregationists gain passage of some new "close-the-schools's bills introduced today. Any violence might also lead Governor Almond to use his police powers to padlock the schools.

The House gave quick approval this morning to the Governor's "passive resistance" program. Enabling bills were adopted without debate.

These included two statutes that would encourage a voluntary boycott of integrated schools by repeal of a compulsory school attendance law and by making $3,000,000 available over the next two years for tuition grants to pupils who wanted to shift from an integrated school to a segregated non-sectarian—private school. The grants would provide a maximum of $250 for each pupil annually.

Republicans Opposed

Repeal of the compulsory attendance law was voted 80 to 3. The negative votes were cast by Republicans. The tuition grant bill was approved 94—0. The house also approved, 93—1, a bill aimed at halting school bomb threats. It would make the communication of such threats a felony with a maximum penalty of ten years' imprisonment.

The lone vote against the bill was cast by A. H. Richardson, Democrat of Dinwiddie, who said the measure might frighten persons from notifying authorities of the existence of a bomb plot.

The segregationists began their delaying tactics as soon as the House had recessed. Speaker E. Blackburn Moore of Berryville delayed for more than an hour the sending of appropriation bills to the Senate after he had signed them.

This gave the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee an excuse to postpone action today. The chairman is Dr. James Davis Hagood, a 69-year-old physician from the heart of the ardently segregationist "southside" of Virginia.

Despite pressure from Administration members, Dr. Hagood said he would refuse to call a meeting of his committee unti next week. Later, after getting an Administration pledge that the emergency session would last through Monday he agreed to hold a committee meeting tomorrow. Both houses will meet tomorrow morning.

Fund Bill to Be Studied

The delay also enabled the segregationist bloc to assure consideration by the Senate of a substitute appropriations bill that would cut public school funds to $1 and transfer the bulk of the state's school money to tuition grants.

Despite such tactics, observers said the segregationist bloc had little chance of getting the four-fifths vote required for emergency legislation.

As a face-saving gesture for segregationists, the Senate passed a resolution declaring its "unalterable opposition to the mixing of white and colored races in the public schools" and expressed "determination to continue to resist such a mixture by all legal means at its command."

Tuition Grant Speed Pledged

Integrated Areas Get High Priority

RICHMOND, Feb. 5 (AP).—When it comes to paying out State tuition grants, prompt attention will be given to those areas of Virginia affected by school integration.

Dr. Davis Y. Paschall, State superintendent of public instruction, had this to say yesterday after the State Board of Education adopted regulations for disbursement of the grants for the current school year. He said no actual priorities were specified, however.

The tuition-grant law was one of the measures passed by the recent special session of the Legislature to assure that no white child is compelled to attend an integrated school. It provides for grants of up to $250 for pupils who have no adequate public school to attend, whose welfare would best be served by attending a school other than the one to which they normally are assigned, or whose parents, guardians or custodians have what the board of education considers valid objections to the children attending their normal public school.

$250 Is Limit

The grants can be used for pubilc schooling in communities away from a student's home or private, non-sectarian schooling.

Board members wouldn't say if they would approve grants for children who attend private schools regardless of the segregation crisis. It is doubtful if grants will be approved for this purpose.

Under the regulations, parents are entitled to a grant of $250 or the per-pupil cost of public school operations in their locality, whichever amount is less.

Forms Due Soon

Dr. Paschall said application forms for the grants will be made available through the offices of local school superintendents. Forms probably will be distributed next week.

The first tuition grant applications will be considered at the board's February 26 meeting.

The Legislature appropriated $1.2 million for grants approved by the board for the current year, and an additional $1.8 million for the next school year.

Mixing Still Just A Token

Resistence Is Continuing In Virginia

FIGURES ARE SUPPLIED

By MORRIS CUNNINGHAM

From The Commercial Appeal Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON, Feb. 21.—Racial integration of the public schools is still only in the token stage in Virginia.

While the state's original "massive resistence" laws have fallen, a high degree of resistence continues.

Norfolk—Seventeen Negroes entered the city's two previously all-white junior and senior high schools Feb. 2.

Nine at Alexandria

Arlington County (across the Potomac River from Washington)—Four Negroes admitted to one junior high school Feb. 2.

Alexandria (another Washington suburb)—Nine Negroes entered one junior high and two elementary schools Feb. 10.

Front Royal—Twenty-two Negroes entered Warren County High School Feb. 18.

Only in Arlington County and Alexandria has integration proceeded without an unusual absenteeism of white students or other difficulties.

3,000 Are Absent

At Norfolk, nearly 3,000 white students are still absent—having transferred to private schools, moved away or quit school entirely. Attendance at the six integrated schools, expected to be about 10,000 is only about 7,000.

And at Front Royal, white students are carrying out a 100 per cent boycott. The high school, which formerly cared for 1,051 white students, is now providing instruction only for the Negroes. Two of the Negroes dropped out Friday and another entered, making the present total 21.

The six schools at Norfolk and one at Front Royal had been closed most of this year by a state law which automatically closed a school when a Federal court ordered Negroes admitted.

Students Switched

Many of the white students at Norfolk, and most of those at Front Royal, switched to makeshift private schools in churches and other properties during the interim.

After the state law was declared invalid, the schools were reopened and the Negroes admitted under the compulsion of Federal Court orders.

About two-thirds of the white students returned at Norfolk. None returned at Front Royal, and indications are none will during this school term.

To ease the impact of the reopening of the affected schools, Gov. J. Lindsay Almond called the Virginia General Assembly into special session in January. The Assembly repealed the state compulsory school attendance law, and provided tuition grants of up to $250 a year to students who refused to attend integrated public schools.

Committee Appointed

The General Assembly then appointed a special 40-member legislative committee to study new resistance measures and recessed until March 31.

Virginia observers are speculating that the committee may be influenced by the show of resistance at Front Royal, a Blue Ridge foothills community with few Negroes where resistance sentiment was believed to be slight.

State leaders had believed in the past that resistence was centered mostly in the area around and south of Richmond, where the Negro population is the heaviest. And balancing this was the apparent willingness of the Washington suburban areas—which have few Negroes—to accept integration.

Just what overall policy the state will now adopt is not clear. But indications are that it will be resistence.

Negro Pupils' Transfer Plea Balked In Virginia

FLOYD, Va. (AP)—The Floyd County School Board Tuesday refused to take any action on a petition requesting the transfer of 14 Negro pupils to the southwest Virginia county's three white public high schools.

In a statement issued at the end of a closed session, the board said no action was taken because the petition was not accompanied by official transfer applications from the pupils' parents or guardians and were not on the forms prescribed by Virginia law.

If proper applications are received from the Negro pupils and their parents, the board said, they will be turned over to the State Pupil Placement Board in Richmond.

The county has only 28 Negro pupils of high school age.

The county supervisors Monday cleared the way for a fund cut-off that would shut down the schools by placing the county budget on a month-by-month appropriation basis.

Floyd County at present has no high school for Negroes. Negro students of high school age are sent to Christiansburg Institute in adjacent Montgomery County. The county has facilities, however, for Negroes of elementary school age.

The board of supervisors placed the county budget on a monthly basis without debate, effective immediately. Should integration occur and should the supervisors choose to do so, they could effectively close all the county's schools on 30 days' notice by the simple expedient of declining to appropriate funds for their operation.

Roundup Of School News

Private Classes Hurt Students

RICHMOND—Already supported by 18,000 members in seven communities, the Virginia Committee for Public Schools on Saturday announced that it is beginning a drive to organize 22 more localities.

When the executive board met here Henry V. Tulloch, General Electric Company relations manager, of Waynesboro, said that parents and teachers in growing numbers are complaining that their children cannot be prepared for college and jobs by private schools hastily organized to replace public schools faced with closing to escape integration.

The committee was formed late last year when Norfolk, Front Royal, Alexandria, Charlottesville and Arlington were closed to avoid court orders to end segregation.

NORFOLK'S City Council unveiled plans for cutting down school costs and partially blocking integration in first, second and third grades in the area east of Granby street.

Meeting with the School Board, Mayor W. Fred Duckworth and council members proposed that 68 three-room schools planned for 90 pupils be built over a period of years in the areas where population increase is greatest.

Board Chairman Paul Schweitzer and Superintendent J. J. Brewbaker said that the board would study the proposals.

IN SOUTH NORFOLK students at all-white Oscar F. Smith High and South Norfolk Junior High are mumbling because of curtailment of their athletic and cultural activities normally carried on outside of school hours.

These schools have been ordered to break all contact with Norview, Maury and Granby high schools in Norfolk and all other integrated schools.

This includes avoiding attendance at Boys and Girls State, a music festival in Churchland on Saturday and a state meet for choruses in Hampton late this week. The end of meetings of South Norfolk teachers with other teachers in integrated schools also is being studied.

A PUBLIC hearing for citizens interested in helping Governor J. Lindsay Almond's Commission on Education to limit the spread of integration has been set for March 6.

Chairman Mosby G. Perrow Jr. made it clear that the commission, made up of 40 General Assembly members, would not hear any person opposed to the state administration program of transfers, private education grants, closing of public schools, pupil preference and other devices to keep the races apart in the schools.

WARREN COUNTY'S school board chairman, E. T. Shiner, noted the possibility that Warren County High, once all-white, ordered re-opened and now serving only 23 students (all colored) because of a boycott by white parents, would close before the end of the term.

He said that some funds are available only on the basis of attendance, and the school with facilities for 1,000 students could remain open only until the money is exhausted. Some 200 white former students of Warren high in Front Royal are without schooling and 800 more are in makeshift tutoring classes.

Board must accept all entry bids

By EDWARD PEEKS

WASHINGTON

Federal Judge Albert V. Bryan ruled Wednesday in favor of 14 Alexandria pupils seeking transfers to schools set aside for whites.

The outcome, however, rests on several factors, including the pending ruling of the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals on Monday on the validity of the state's so-called massive resistance laws.

Judge Bryan granted a summary judgment in favor of the pupils and ordered the Alexandria school board to report to the court by Jan. 26 on action taken on requests for transfers to four all-white schools.

He said the court will issue an injunction to restrain the school board from denying admission to public schools on the basis of race.

"The court will make the injunction effective Feb. 2," Judge Bryan said.

THAT'S THE date on which Alexandria schools begin the second semester and when the colored children expect to enroll in schools nearest their homes.

The action came in Alexandria Federal Court on a motion by lawyers for the children. Attorneys are Frank D. Reeves, Otto L. Tucker and James M. Nabrit 3rd.

Judge Bryan dismissed a counter motion by the school board calling for a three-judge Federal court to rule on the state pupil placement law on grounds that the board is without authority to assign pupils.

Action was taken without argument on either motion. The hearing was finished within 15 minutes once it was underway.

Attorneys on both sides held separate and joint conferences to cut through time-consuming procedure in court.

The hearing was set for 11 a.m., but didn't get started until 12:30.

SCHOOL BOARD and state lawyers agreed to action without argument, but didn't consent to judgment in the case.

Their motion was made by Lewis S. Pendleton Jr., special assistant to Attorney General Albertis S. Harrison, who was present. In court for the board were Commonwealth Attorney Earl Wagner and John B. Phillips.

A few parents of the children were present for the hearing, but all the pupils were in school. The courtroom wasn't crowded as it was on previous occasions in desegregation cases.

THE OUTCOME of the ruling will depend on action of the school board.

Judge Bryan said the board should decide on applications for transfer by "fair and just standards."

The children are to come back to court through their attorneys if they take issue with the board's action.

He indicated that he will make room on his crowded calendar to hear the merits of the case if controversy arises over the action of the board on transfer requests.

JUDGE BRYAN told both group of lawyers to "collaborate and prepare a decree in accord with views I have expressed."

ALABAMA LAWMAKERS VIRGINIA BOUND

A legislative subcommittee departed for Richmond, Va., Tuesday where it will make a first-hand study of the school segregation problems in that state. The lawmakers hope to get ideas for legislation which may help in preservation of racial segregation in Alabama. Roundup Of School News

Private Classes Hurt Students

RICHMOND—Already supported by 18,000 members in seven communities, the Virginia Committee for Public Schools on Saturday announced that it is beginning a drive to organize 22 more localities.

When the executive board met here Henry W. Tulloch, General Electric Company relations manager, of Waynesboro, said that parents and teachers in growing numbers are complaining that their children cannot be prepared for college and jobs by private schools hastily organized to replace public schools faced with closing to escape integration.

The committee was formed late last year when Negro schools in Norfolk, Front Royal, Alexandria, Charlottesville and Arlington were closed to avoid court orders to end segregation.

NORFOLK'S City Council unveiled plans for cutting down school costs and partially blocking integration in first, second and third grades in the area east of Granby street.

Meeting with the School Board, Mayor W. Fred Duckworth and council members proposed that 68 three-room schools planned for 90 pupils be built over a period of years in the areas where population increase is greatest.

Board Chairman Paul Schweitzer and Superintendent J. J. Brewbaker said that the board would study the proposals.

IN SOUTH NORFOLK students at all-white Oscar F. Smith High and South Norfolk Junior High are mumbling because of curtailment of their athletic and cultural activities normally carried on outside of school hours.

These schools have been ordered to break all contact with Norview, Maury and Granby high schools in Norfolk and all other integrated schools.

This includes avoiding attendance at Boys and Girls State, a music festival in Churchland on Saturday and a state meet for choruses in Hampton late this week. The end of meetings of South Norfolk teachers with other teachers in integrated schools also is being studied.

A PUBLIC hearing for citizens interested in helping Governor J. Lindsay Almond's Commission on Education to limit the spread of integration has been set for March 6.

Chairman Mosby G. Perrow Jr. made it clear that the commission, made up of 40 General Assembly members, would not hear any person opposed to the state administration program of transfers, private education grants, closing of public schools, pupil preference and other devices to keep the races apart in the schools.

WARREN COUNTY'S school board chairman, E. T. Shiner, noted the possibility that Warren County High, once all-white, ordered re-opened and now serving only 23 students (all colored) because of a boycott by white parents, would close before the end of the term.

He said that some funds are available only on the basis of attendance, and the school with facilities for 1,000 students could remain open only until the money is exhausted. Some 200 white former students of Warren high in Front Royal are without schooling and 800 more are in makeshift tutoring classes.

Board must accept all entry bids

By EDWARD PEEKS

WASHINGTON

Federal Judge Albert V. Bryan ruled Wednesday in favor of 14 Alexandria pupils seeking transfers to schools set aside for whites.

The outcome, however, rests on several factors, including the pending ruling of the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals [illegible] Monday on the validity of the state's so-called massive resistance laws.

Judge Bryan granted a summary judgment in favor of the pupils and ordered the Alexandria school board to report to the court by Jan. 26 on action taken on requests for transfers to four all-white schools.

He said the court will issue an injunction to restrain the school board from denying admission to public schools on the basis of race.

"The court will make the injunction effective Feb. 2," Judge Bryan said.

THAT'S THE date on which Alexandria schools begin the second semester and when the colored children expect to enroll in schools nearest their homes.

The action came in Alexandria Federal Court on a motion by lawyers for the children. Attorneys are Frank D. Reeves, Otto L. Tucker and James M. Nabrit 3rd.

Judge Bryan dismissed a counter motion by the school board calling for a three-judge Federal court to rule on the state pupil placement law on grounds that the board is without authority to assign pupils.

Action was taken without argument on either motion. The hearing was finished within 15 minutes once it was underway.

Attorneys on both sides held separate and joint conferences to cut through time-consuming procedure in court.

The hearing was set for 11 a.m., but didn't get started until 12:30.

SCHOOL BOARD and state lawyers agreed to action without argument, but didn't consent to judgment in the case.

Their motion was made by Lewis S. Pendleton Jr., special assistant to Attorney General Albertis S. Harrison, who was present. In court for the board were Commonwealth Attorney Earl Wagner and John B. Phillips.

A few parents of the children were present for the hearing, but all the pupils were in school. The courtroom wasn't crowded as it was on previous occasions in desegregation cases.

THE OUTCOME of the ruling will depend on action of the school board.

Judge Bryan said the board should decide on applications for transfer by "fair and just standards."

The children are to come back to court through their attorneys if they take issue with the board's action.

He indicated that he will make room on his crowded calendar to hear the merits of the case if controversy arises over the action of the board on transfer requests.

JUDGE BRYAN told both group of lawyers to "collaborate and prepare a decree in accord with views I have expressed."

Almond Says Virginia Faces Desegregation

By Robert E. Baker
Staff Reporter

Governor J. Lindsay Almond has conceded that school desegregation probably will be a fact in Virginia before the state can enact a new program to deal with it.

The state's "massive resistance" program, adopted in 1956 after a more moderate plan was quelled, has been heavily attacked in court.

The state's own test of the program is scheduled to be decided by the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals on July 19. A test of the school closing portion of the program is scheduled to be decided by a three-judge Federal Court on or about the same day.

Most lawyers and Virginians believe the laws will be declared unconstitutional. Thus far, the school closing law has succeeded in thwarting desegregation in nine schools in Norfolk, Charlottesville and Warren County by shutting them down.

Almond has said he will appoint a commission composed of members of the General Assembly to work out another program, if the present laws are thrown out. The Governor will play an important role in devising the new program.

But between the time the laws are thrown out, if they are, and a new program can be adopted by the General Assembly, there would be no laws to prevent desegregation.

In an interview with Relman Morin, reporter for the Associated Press, Almond was quoted as saying:

"Prior to that time (enactment of a new program), it's very probable that there will be Negro children in the schools in Norfolk, Charlottesville and perhaps elsewhere."

The Governor was pointing out the probability that the General Assembly may be debating the path of a new program after schools now closed in three communities have been reopened on a desegregated basis. Also, Arlington, under orders to desegregate one school in February, probably will have done so.

Ironic Turn of Events

This would be ironic in a way. The "massive resistance" program gained time for Virginia before this school year. But if Virginia had been willing to give it up last September, it could probably have gone through this school year without any desegregation.

The U. S. Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals in Baltimore virtually promised to suspend the desegregation orders for Norfolk and Front Royal until next September if Attorney General A. S. Harrison would promise in return that the State would have a program of compliance by that time. Harrison was not in a position to make the promise, and the Court refused to suspend the orders.

Whenever the General Assembly meets to enact a new program, a bitter battle is in prospect. Every seat in the House of Delegates and Senate is up for election this year, and members seeking reelection in many localities will feel that it would be unwise politically to support anything less than an more resistance.

Secondly, members from politically powerful Southside Virginia, where resistance to desegregation is most massive, will insist on more of the same. Legislators from some other places, where resistance is less massive, may fight harder this time for some sort of local option.

Various plans are being talked about. One making the rounds, with some substantial endorsement at the moment, calls for abolishing compulsory school attendance and for making available educational grants for private schooling to any child anywhere in Virginia at any time with no strings—especially racial ones—attached.

Another calls for local option, allowing the community to decide whether to desegregate or go out of the public school field. Another calls for shutting Negro schools. Another calls for a program of priority desegregation, with Southside Virginia to desegregate in the unscheduled distant future and some other areas in the near future, but most areas in between.

But the Governor is keeping mum on his plans. He has not advocated an end to public schools, but has said he does not believe the present system can survive under desegregation.

The commission he contemplates may well be a very large one, in the hopes some program can be recommended unanimously which would give it a large nucleus of support in the Assembly.

Almond frequently has said he feels like a man caught in the jaws of a vise. He is subjected to pressure from the unyielding segregationists on one side, the pressure of public school people on the other. Recently, there were indications that industrialists in the state had cautioned him that, without mass education available, Virginia's plan to entice more business will not prosper.

His refusal to invoke all provisions of the "massive resistance" laws—like the one requiring him to reopen the closed schools on a segregated basis—brought him criticism from a leading segregationist in Norfolk last week.

But through it all, the Governor and his Attorney General apparently are running the show in Richmond without close liaison or frequent contact with the architect of "massive resistance," Democratic Senator Harry F. Byrd of Berryville. The Senator has been silent, although his position favoring continued all-out resistance to desegregation is clear, firm and unchanged.

The powerful dominant Democratic organization in Virginia—the Byrd machine—may face its toughest test of togetherness in the days ahead, and if Almond can come through the ordeal without it splitting asunder, he may be its leader when he steps down from office three years from now.

Arlington Boards To Meet After Ruling

The Arlington County Board yesterday voted to meet with the School Board Jan. 20—one day after the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals will hand down its decision on the constitutionality of Virginia's "massive resistance" laws.

County Board Chairman David L. Krupsaw said he would arrange the meeting with School Board Chairman Robert A. Peck on the threatened closure of Stratford Junior High School. Four Negro children have been ordered admitted to Stratford by a Federal court, but Virginia law provides for the closing of desegregated schools.

11 Negroes Win Entry In Virginia

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. (AP)—School officials Friday assigned 11 Negroes to two white public schools for the fall term, bringing a court-approved assignment plan into play for the first time.

Nine of the 11 were plaintiffs in the Charlottesville desegregation case and were ordered into white schools by U.S. Judge John Paul.

The other two gained admission to Lane High and Venable Elementary schools by satisfying requirements of the assignment plan, which specifically excludes race as a consideration.

12 HAD STAYED OUT

Paul ordered 12 Negro children admitted to Lane and Venable last year, precipitating the closure of these schools under Virginia's massive resistance to integration laws. The 12 Negroes stayed out of school during the first semester.

When state and federal courts tossed out massive resistance early this year, federal courts granted Charlottesville a six-month delay of integration. It was granted with the understanding the school board would submit for approval a racially non-discriminatory assignment plan, and the 12 Negroes would be tutored sufficiently to bring them up to their normal grade levels by September.

TUTORING CLEARED ONE

One of the 12 Paul ordered admitted has graduated through the tutoring system.

Last March 30, Paul approved the assignment plan, the two key provisions of which are geographical school districts and pupil-teacher ratios.

PUBLIC EDUCATION BACKED BY ALMOND

Special to The New York Times.

FRONT ROYAL, Va., June 9—Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. Tuesday night urged support of public education wherever possible despite the state's integration problems.

He spoke at ceremonies for ninety-seven pupils graduating from a private school started when the public high school was closed to avoid integration last fall. Their diplomas carried the name "Warren County Educational Foundation High School."

The school was conducted for 800 pupils in three churches, a museum and a youth center.

The county's high school, opened earlier only to whites, but to both races since February, has been attended by twenty-one Negroes and no whites. It had no graduation.

Of the group that graduated today, twenty-one will attend thirteen colleges next year on the basis of having completed their credits at the emergency private school and having passed college entrance examinations.

In his speech, the Governor said "the responsibility of educating the children of Virginia must be accepted and discharged through public schools wherever possible, and through private schools where conditions will not permit the sustenance of public schools."

He warned that "abandonment of public support of education would constitute an open invitation to the Federal Government to assume that function."

Map New Jim Crow Laws For Public Schools in Virginia

RICHMOND, Va.—Gov. J. Lindsay Almond has moved to rebuild Virginia's defenses against school integration by a new legislative program to replace "massive resistance" laws struck down by federal and state courts.

Almond was naming a special legislative commission to consider new laws to keep Negro and white students from attending the same schools. He also scheduled a radio-TV report to the state to outline further plans.

Almond, an avowed segregationist, had closed nine Virginia schools last fall when the schools were ordered integrated by federal court rulings.

On Monday, both the state's highest court and a federal court panel declared the state's "massive resistance" laws unconstitutional.

The court rulings returned control of the nine closed schools in Norfolk, Charlottesville and Front Royal to the local school boards which are under federal court orders to desegregate them. Some 13,000 pupils have been affected by the closings.

In Arlington, where desegregation had been ordered in an all-white junior high school, the school board was prepared to accept four Negro students instead of closing the school.

But the board said it would seek postponement of the desegregation order requiring admission of the Negro students by February 2 until an appeal of the order can be made.

Almond said recently that if the "massive resistance" program, fashioned by Democratic leader Sen. Harry F. Byrd, was killed Virginia still would have "resources" to cope with an integration crisis which might arise while a new program is being drafted. Almond did not elaborate.

The federal court panel described the school closings as "tragic" and the move an "evasive scheme."

Laws to close any integrated public school; to shut down public schools controlled by federal troops; and to stop state funds to integrated school systems were struck down.

The state supreme court, in its 5-2 decision, also said provisions for furnishing state tuition grants to students displaced by integration, while not unconstitutional on their face, were invalid when paid with funds diverted from integration-closed schools.

The two rulings came as no surprise. Almond announced more than a month ago he was drafting a list of legislators to serve on the commission to make recommendations to the full legislature.

School Planned At Naval Base

Norfolk Integration Dispute Idles GIs' Children

2,400 OUT OF CLASSES

By United Press International

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22—The Navy disclosed Thursday that the Federal Government will provide schooling for children living on the Norfolk, Va., Naval Base [illegible] public schools are reopened in a "reasonable time."

It said plans "have been approved for action pending clarification of the local school situation."

The Navy said, "will be made if local schools are not reopened within a reasonable time."

Only Those On Base

The plan would affect only those children who live with their parents on Federal property at the Norfolk base. They are understood to be but a small number of the 2,400 children of Navy personnel in the area.

None of the Navy children have had normal schooling since public schools in Norfolk were closed in the integration dispute.

Under the Navy plan, facilities and instruction would be provided first for children living on Federal property when funds are made available by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

Legal Question

The Navy said there's a legal question whether it could provide schooling for Navy children whose parents do not reside on Federal property. The law, it pointed out, provides that Federal funds can be made available "when local school facilities are inadequate or unavailable."

The Navy estimated that 400 Navy children who previously attended three junior and three senior high schools in Norfolk were placed in schools in nearby districts when the Norfolk schools were shut down. Their parents pay tuition charges to the neighboring schools.

Bill Asks U.S. Funds For Closed Schools

House Measure Would Affect Virginia Areas

A bill to set up federally operated schools for children of servicemen and Government workers in areas where public schools are closed to avoid integration has been introduced in the House.

The measure, presented yesterday by Representative Ashley, Democrat of Ohio, would authorize the commissioner of education to operate schools in any area now eligible for Federal school aid because of Government activity.

All of Northern Virginia would be eligible, as well as Norfolk, where the State of Virginia has closed six schools, putting 10,000 students out of classes.

Broader in Scope

The bill is much broader in scope than the legislation that has been discussed in the last few days by Government officials. Those discussions have dealt primarily with attempts to provide education for children of Navy families living off bases where schools are closed.

Under Representative Ashley's bill, the Government would be called upon to run schools for all children of Federal employes and service personnel in those communities where public education has been suspended because of integration.

His office explained that the bill would expand existing Public Law 874. This is the law that currently provides financial aid for school operating expenses in so-called Federal impact areas.

Covered by Bill

Arlington, Alexandria and Fairfax County in nearby Virginia all receive aid under this bill, and therefore would be covered by Representative Ashley's bill if any of their schools close. Norfolk likewise is covered.

Funds normally disbursed to impact areas would be used instead for the substitute Federal schools, Mr. Ashley's office said.

Representative Ashley said his bill was prompted by the plight of servicemen from his state stationed in Norfolk, where six public schools already are closed and more shutdowns are threatened.

He cited the case of the 13-year-old daughter of Edward Bryan, a Navy man from Waterville, Ohio, as one of those affected. These children, he said, are "innocent victims of indefensible bigotry."

Massive Resistance

The school closings in Virginia took place in September under the State's massive resistance laws. The laws were held invalid earlier this week in Federal and State court decisions, but so far no move has been made to reopen any of the schools.

In addition to Norfolk, Front Royal and Charlottesville are affected by the closings. Even with the school-closing law gone, it is possible Gov. Almond might try to close any other schools where integration is ordered by using his police powers.

Arlington has been ordered to integrate Stratford Junior High February 2, and Alexandria faces desegregation deadline next semester.

Virginia Schools Ignore Sex Education Survey

By a Staff

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va., May 8—Failure of an ambitious statewide survey of educators and parents to learn what, if any, sex education should be taught in the public schools was reported here today.

Not enough teachers and organizations of parents answered the carefully prepared questionnaires to result in any conclusions or recommendations, reported Cyril R. Mill, of the Virginia Department of Mental Hygiene and Hospitals.

Of the ones that were returned, he said only that many were interesting and some downright indignant.

Apparently a lot of parents interpreted our questionnaire as a move to force sex education on their children," Mill told the psychology section of the Virginia Academy of Science, in 57th annual meeting here.

One thing that was learned, he said, was that the topic of venereal disease is rarely, if ever touched on in Virginia public schools.

Mill said that only 36 per cent of the high schools responded to the questoionnaire; 16 per cent of the elementary schools replied, and just 9 per cent of the parent-teacher associations responded.

Among the answers returned, he reported, highest opposition was made to the teaching of human anatomy, human reproduction, and contraceptive techniques.

Thirty per cent of the teachers who responded said they would like to include the teaching of contraceptive techniques to high school students. But nearly four of every five (79 per cent) of the parents who responded preferred that the subject not be discussed in public schools at all.

Mill said the survey was begun a year ago under sponsorship of the Virginia Council of Family Relations. He served as chairman of the special committee which conducted the survey "even though we committee members ourselves couldn't agree on how or how much sex education should be taught."

He said the survey had one beneficial effect—it made the parents and teachers think about it, anyway.

Asked what future steps were planned, he shrugged and said:

"Nothing, as far as I know."

Judge Turns Down Norfolk Negro Plea

NORFOLK, Va., May 8 (AP) United States District Judge Walter E. Hoffman today approved the Norfolk School Board's rejection of 134 Negro applications for admission to schools for white children last September.

The Board's action, Hoffman said in a memorandum, "was not arbitrary, capricious or illegal."

And, he added, the standards, criteria and procedures used by the Board in passing upon the Negro applications are "not unconstitutional on their face."

In his order approving the Board's action, Hoffman said however, his order shall not be construed as limiting the 134 Negroes or any other Negroes from applying for admission to schools for white pupils for the school year beginning next September.

At the same time the Board rejected the 134 applications it assigned 17 other Negroes to six segregated secondary schools.

More Negroes Seek Integration In Virginia

Alexandria, Va., May 1.—Twenty-seven Negroes sought admission to white schools for the first time today in Fairfax and Arlington counties and the city of Alexandria, posing the possibility of the first court action toward integration in Fairfax.

Twenty-two Negro children asked for assignments to one high school and at least five elementary schools in Fairfax County, a suburban area across the Potomac River from Washington, in preschool conferences for next fall.

It marked the first time Fairfax had been the target for a school integration attempt.

Five other Negro children asked to be assigned next September to white schools in Arlington and Alexandria which bowed to court-ordered integration last February.

Alexandria Negro attorney Otto Tucker, who was successful in getting 10 Negroes admitted to three Alexandria schools last February; said he would ask Federal Judge Albert V. Bryan to require the city school board to comply with the requests of the four new applicants.

The Alexandria board rejected the four latest applications, and assigned the Negroes to segregated schools.

Fairfax County School Supt. W. T. Woodson declined Wednesday to identify the school or the children but said today the applications had been sent to the State Pupil Placement Board, a controversial agency which assigns students on a segregated basis.

It marked the first time Negroes have sought to enroll in the white schools of Fairfax.

Almond Again Pledges Public School Support

WILLIAMSBURG, Va., June 7 (AP)—Gov. J. Lindsay Almond pledged anew today that he is determined to preserve public education in Virginia "though the way may be clogged with many difficult obstacles."

Almond told 381 graduates of the 266-year-old College of William and Mary that "public education has helped make Virginia the great State which she is and it is necessary to keep the Old Dominion on that high pinnacle."

"It (public education) must not be abandoned," the Governor said.

Almond did not refer directly to developments in the State school crisis during the past week.

Since he spoke to Longwood College graduates at Farmville last Sunday the Prince Edward County Board of Supervisors, meeting at Farmville, has voted to withdraw all financial support from the County's public school system.

In his talk at Farmville, Almond promised that Virginia will not abolish its public schools but will fight to preserve them.

"I am determined," the Governor said today in reiterating his pledge, "that all of the children of Virginia receive the educations to which they are entitled. We shall not be deterred from this endeavor."

Almond advised the graduates: "We must exercise our rights and our prerogatives as citizens to see that the structure of our government—local, state and national . . . is preserved.

"Onslaughts from without and from within must be turned back and wiped out. Let us not he blinded by psychological or sociological myths and permit ourselves to be led from constitutional principles, whether the attempt is made by ruthless agents of a foreign power or by a reckless Federal judiciary."

Almond said he was optimistic for Virginia's and the country's future because of such institutions as William and Mary and "fine young Americans such as you who are graduating today."

"We have been facing hostile and dangerous forces in this part of the world since 1607; we should have learned by now that eternal vigilance and eternal preparation is the price, not only of peace but of progress," Almond added.

Summer Pupils Limited To Avoid Integration

Alexandria Board Restricts Sessions To Students From Same Schools

The Alexandria School Board has tightened its requirements for this year's summer school session in a measure to forestall additional racial integration and court litigation.

Under a new policy, summer classes will be held at every school in the city rather than at a few central locations. Enrollment will be limited to students who attended the school during the regular session.

School Supt. T. C. Williams said yesterday the new regulations were adopted on his recommendation at a closed session of the school board last month. No public announcement of the change was made at that time.

He said the plan will enable the board to hold additional integration attempts in check—at least for this summer—since no transfers between schools will be permitted, and no new students will be admitted.

Others Affected

Also caught by the regulations, however, will be students who attended private or parochial schools during the winter. In past years, many such students have attended summer classes in the public schools because their schools do not offer summer sessions.

Of this Mr. Williams said, "We were glad to accommodate them as long as it created no additional problem for us. But the situation now is not normal, and we can't do what we normally do."

The superintendent said a few parents with children now enrolled in private or parochial schools have complained about the new summer session rules. However, he said, when he explained the reasons for the change, most of them understood and agreed.

With additional Negro students seeking admission to Alexandria's white schools, the school board debated three alternative actions regarding this year's summer session:

1. Operate summer classes at five or six central locations as had been done in the past, and thus be vulnerable to court litigation by Negro students seeking admission to white schools.

2. Operate no summer school at all.

3. Operate summer classes at each school and limit attendance to the school's regular students allowing no transfers or outside students.

Mr. Williams said, "The new policy makes summer school a continuation of the work as we have it now. And this way, the summer classes will be more convenient and readily available in the localities."

Supported by Tuition

He pointed out that the summer sessions are self-supporting from the collection of tuitions, and no tax money is used. High school students pay $18 for one classroom subject and $20 for two subjects. Elementary students pay $15 for one subject and $18 for two.

Nine Negro students already are attending regular classes in three formerly all-white Alexandria schools. They were admitted on an order issued last February by Alexandria Federal Judge Albert V. Bryan.

In April, four additional Negro students asked to be admitted to white schools. The school board denied their request and that case is now before a Federal court.

Segregation Publicity Facing A Veto

By JOHN B. McDERMOTT
Herald Political Writer

TALLAHASSEE — Gov. LeRoy Collins chimed broadly Saturday he would veto a bill calling for Florida to spend half-a-million dollars in the North publicizing the South's views on segregation.

Summarizing results of the 1959 Florida Legislature, the governor labeled the session "A good one," but said it could have been much better.

"Perhaps its biggest accomplishment was in what it did not do," he declared, referring primarily to the moderate stand taken by lawmakers on the explosive racial question.

The governor said he has not made up his mind on bills calling for summer dog racing in Miami and for the election of delegates to the national political conventions on an "unpledged basis."

He has 20 days on all bills passed in the final week of a legislative session in which he can exercise his veto power.

Collins said flatly there is one bill he will veto.

This measure was so worded as to have exempted from taxation any building under construction on Jan. 1, the official assessment day.

Had legislators realized the impact of this law, the governor said he felt certain they would not have passed it. He said a hotel, for example, could start an addition or renovation in late December and, under the bill, be totally exempt for property taxes.

Collins said this measure "could wreck" the tax system.

The governor refused to say positively what he would do about the Reedy bill, appropriating $500,000 to join with other southern states in publicizing the South's viewpoint in the North.

"However, I noticed in the press this morning that Mr. Reedy (of Lake County) was preparing an expeditionary trip to other southern states," the chief executive said with a grin.

"It might be wise for Mr. Reedy to delay that trip for a little while."

Another bill which Collins said he is sure to reject is the measure sponsored by Rep. Bernie Papy of Key West, which would permit Monroe County to sell for private use submerged and sub-marginal lands which the state wanted kept for park purposes.

The governor had vetoed a similar bill earlier.

"This new bill is just the same with a few commas and a word or two changed," he observed during his press conference.

"Maybe I'll change a few commas and word or two myself (in vetoing)," he said grinning broadly.

Collins said the legislators had done "a creditable job" on three of the four main points he had stressed in his messages to the joint Senate and House at the beginning of the session.

These were moderation in racial legislation affecting schools, development of a sound fiscal program for the state and reapportionment.

He said he was "extremely disappointed," however, in their total failure in revising Florida's antiquated constitution.

Collins singled out House Speaker Thomas D. Beasley, calling him "Horatio at the bridge," for his leadership in turning back the last gasp bid by segregation extremists to force an overtime session.

As for the state's fiscal outlook, Collins said this is the first time in years the Legislature has come through with "a green money appropriation program"—a balanced budget.

"WE CANNOT SECEDE FROM THE UNION"

Virginia Gov. Hits Closing Of Schools

FFRONT ROYAL, Va. — (UPI) — Gov. J. Lindsay Almond, once the South's Chief crusader for "massive resistance" to integration spoke out strongly tonight against abandonment of public schools.

Almond, addressing the 97 graduates of a private school group point for Warren County's refusal to support integrated schools, warned that segregated private schools were treading on thin legal ice.

"If public education is abandoned in any county or city, then public support for private education therein on a segregated bas's becomes most precarious," he said.

The governor's speech, his strongest since last fall when nine Virginia schools were closed, made it clear he considered school closures an unrealistic, ineffective and tragic way to meet the integration crisis.

He did not refer specifically to rural Prince Edward County, Va., which has decided to close its 21 public school rather than accept integration.

He praised Warren County where the entire white student body of 800 boycotted the only high school when it admitted 21 Negroes last February and remained in private classes set up last fall when the high school was shuttered.

But Almond urged Virginians to give up "wishful thinking" that integration could be avoided or the Supreme Court's desegregation ruling reversed.

"The only sure prevention of any integration anywhere in Virginia is the total abolition of every public school everywhere in Virginia," he said". . . . I tell you now that we cannot secede from the Union; we cannot overthrow the federal government, and we cannot reverse a final decree of a federal court."

The governor obviously picked Front Royal where segregationists have proudly pointed out as a southern fortress of defiance to federal court integration decrees for his major pronouncement.

"We must improve our system of education and not permit it dissolution," he said. "Its abandonment would be promotion of surrender and acceptance of surrender and and acceptance of defeat. I shall continue with all of my energy the struggle for its survival."

FOUR TURNED DOWN

19 Norfolk Negro Children Get School Transfer Tests

NORFOLK, Va. (AP) — School psychologists Thursday began testing 19 Negro children who have applied for transfer to all-white or predominantly white public schools here in September. Four other Negroes were informed their applications would not be considered.

School officials announced Wednesday the 23 Negroes applied for admission to six secondary schools to which 17 other Negroes were assigned last year, and to Norview and suburban Park elementary schools.

The school board apparently fixed June 1 as the deadline for applications by all pupils except those whose families move to Norfolk after that date. However, no date has been publicly designated.

The tests that began Thursday will continue through next week. The applicants and their parents will be interviewed in July by a school administration committee. The school board will then act on the applications.

The tests and interviews are required by the board's pupil assignment plan, which was upheld recently by the federal district court. Criteria on which assignments are based include the applicants' scholastic achievement, social adaptability, physical and moral fitness, place of residence and cultural background.

The four Negroes who were informed their applications would not be considered are rising seventh graders at Titustown Elementary School. They applied for transfer to Northside Junior High. They were notified the entire rising seventh grade will remain in the Titustown school where an eight-room addition is being built to relieve overcrowding. It will open in September.

Attendance Law Sought In Arlington

The Arlington School Board yesterday agreed to recommend that the County Board adopt a local ordinance on compulsory school attendance.

School Superintendent Ray E. Reid, who asked adoption of the resolution, said it will continue to insist on regular school attendance "wherever possible," whether the act is adopted or not.

The act states, in general, that children from 7 to years of age must attend school regularly, or receive regular instruction from a tutor or teacher approved by the State Board of Education.

But a key clause says that "the school board shall excuse from attendance at school a pupil whose parents, guardian or other person having custody of such pupil conscientiously objects to his attendance to such school as is available . . ." The ordinance was authoriged by the General Assembly to replace a State attendance law which was repealed.

School Board Chairman Robert A. Peck said that, in voting to ask the County Board to enact the ordiance, "We're not suggesting any child should have to go to school with someone he doesn't want to."

In other business, the Board appointed Helen S. Lane and James G. Stockard to serve as its representatives on a committee which will formulate a merit pay plan for presentation to the Board Nov. 1.

The Board selected Charles Walsh, Assistant Superintendent for Personnel, to represent the administrative staff on the committee, which will include at least one lay member and at least one member each from the Arlington Teachers' Association and the Arlington Education Associa-

Rural Prince Edward Whites Determined To Drop Public Schools Rather Than Integrate

By ALEX R. PRESTON
Star Staff Writer

FARMVILLE, Va., May 23—Five years after the Supreme Court's school decision, white citizens of rural Prince Edward County are ready and determined to abandon public education rather than comply with the latest Federal Court desegregation order.

Integration has come to scattered other parts of the State which once vowed Negroes never would set foot in white classrooms.

Virginia's official policy has shifted from massive resistance to contained, if reluctant, compliance.

But in Southside Prince Edward, where Negro students are in the majority, there still is no sign of any willingness among white residents to accept mixed classes—either next fall, or six years from now, which was the desegregation deadline the county won and then lost through court decrees.

Case Study

This area thus becomes an interesting case study as one of the first in which deep-South determination not to integrate comes face to face with a Federal court order to take steps in that direction.

As matters now stand, Prince Edward has been told students cannot be refused admission to public schools next September because of race.

Appeals and legal maneuvers may put off the ultimatum, as they have since May 17, 1954, when the Supreme Court issued its historic ruling against Prince Edward and four other Southern communities.

Barring such delays, however, next September is likely to find Prince Edward confronted with Negro applications that cannot be rejected.

Firm Against Integration

White residents who have faced that prospect each fall since 1954 may not be certain of the details of what will happen when the applications come—but they are sure there will be no integration and no public schools to integrate.

"I can't name you a soul who's willing to send their children to school with a Negro," said Herbert Woods, president of the Farmville High School PTA (white).

His sentiments were echoed scores of times among the white population in other PTAs, by county officials, by store clerks and on street corners.

Must Decide Course

Sometime before June 30, the Prince Edward County Board of Supervisors and the School Board will decide on one of three courses now open under Virginia's new "freedom of choice" laws:

(1) Appropriate funds for public schools, which seems unlikely;

(2) Set aside money for general educational purposes so that public school support may be shifted to scholarships for private instruction, or

(3) Shut off all money for educational purposes.

The second course apparently will be followed with appropriations made, as they have been for the last four years, on a month-to-month basis.

Would Close in Month

If the county chooses to withdraw all financial support from the field of public education, it faces the prospect of only one month of elementary public school operations. The one month would be financed with approximately $35,000 which the State is required by the Virginia Constitution to send to the locality.

"We would be compelled to operate elementary schools with that money," said School Supt. T. J. McIlwaine. "We might be able to run a month." Thus, by financial strangulation, the county feels it can call a halt to public classes on short notice.

Past Federal and State court rulings have struck down laws that flatly required schools to close to avoid integration. Untested, however, is whether a locality can be forced to put up money for schools that the people no longer want to support.

Private School Plan Likely

When public classes cease, Prince Edward's white residents stand prepared to use a four-year-old private school plan which already has set a pattern in the South for attempting to preserve segregation. Negro residents have no such plans and apparently would be without any schooling if public classes are allowed to cease.

The white private school program was drafted here within a week after the Supreme Court handed down its implementing decree for desegregation. It has been ready for use whenever an unappealable integration order confronts the county.

Blanton B. Hanbury, president of the non-profit Prince Edward Education Corp., which is the operating agency for the private classes, seemed quite resigned to putting the plan into operation next September.

"That's the way it looks to us," he commented when asked if he thought public classes would cease at that time.

Funds Pledged

The Prince Edward Education Corp. was formed at a mass meeting in May, 1955. Citizens raised $12,000 in cash and $190,000 in notes for its support.

Although the notes have expired, Mr. Hanbury said, "They are as good as gold—we can raise that amount and much more, given a week's time." These pledges were given even before the State made tax-supported scholarships available for private schooling.

Could the corporation provide education without help from the State scholarships? Mr. Hanbury was asked.

"Yes," he answered, "we are set up to stand on our feet for at least one year. After that we would have to determine our course. We have full community support."

Arrangements have been made to hold private classes in seven churches and a church - owned residence in Farmville and in scattered sections of the county.

At least three other Virginia communities—Norfolk, Warren County and Charlottesville—have put a private school plan into use with varying degrees of success.

Private classrooms were set up in these other communities after the now-dead resistance laws brought about the closing of schools where integration was ordered. When Federal and State courts killed the old school closing law, public classes resumed in all the affected communities. Only in Warren County have white students remained away from the public classes. They are still attending a private school, much as is planned here when the time comes.

Prince Edward Ruling

Two weeks ago, the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals set aside Federal District Judge Sterling Hutcheson's ruling which had given Prince Edward until 1965 to end racial segregation. Instead, the appeals court ordered desegregation this fall. It is this ruling that has shoved Prince Edward into the forefront of the integration struggle once more.

Negro leaders indicate that children of their race are preparing to make applications to specific white schools by September.

Dr. Albert Rawlings, a native of the British West Indies and graduate of Howard University, said, "I have heard of a few families who are preparing for a showdown.

"You'll find that in' town the NAACP has gone underground . . . Out in the country, they're more active. More of them own their own farms and are not as dependent upon the white people to make their living."

There is a unanimity among white citizens here not present in other integrated or integration-threatened Virginia communities like Arlington, Warren County, Charlottesville and Norfolk.

Each of the other areas has an organized "save-our-schools" movement under way, but a three-day tour of Prince Edward failed to turn up even one such advocate among white persons here.

"Last year," said Supt. McIlwaine, "the supervisors, the School Board and the white citizens showed they were opposed to spending any money for school construction of any kind."

About 4,500 white citizens—practically the entire adult white population—filed with the Circuit Court a petition declaring they prefer "to abandon public schools and educate our children in some other way if that be necessary to have separate schools."

J. Barrye Wall, jr., attorney for the Prince Edward Education Corp., mentioned this petition as an example of the feeling among white citizens.

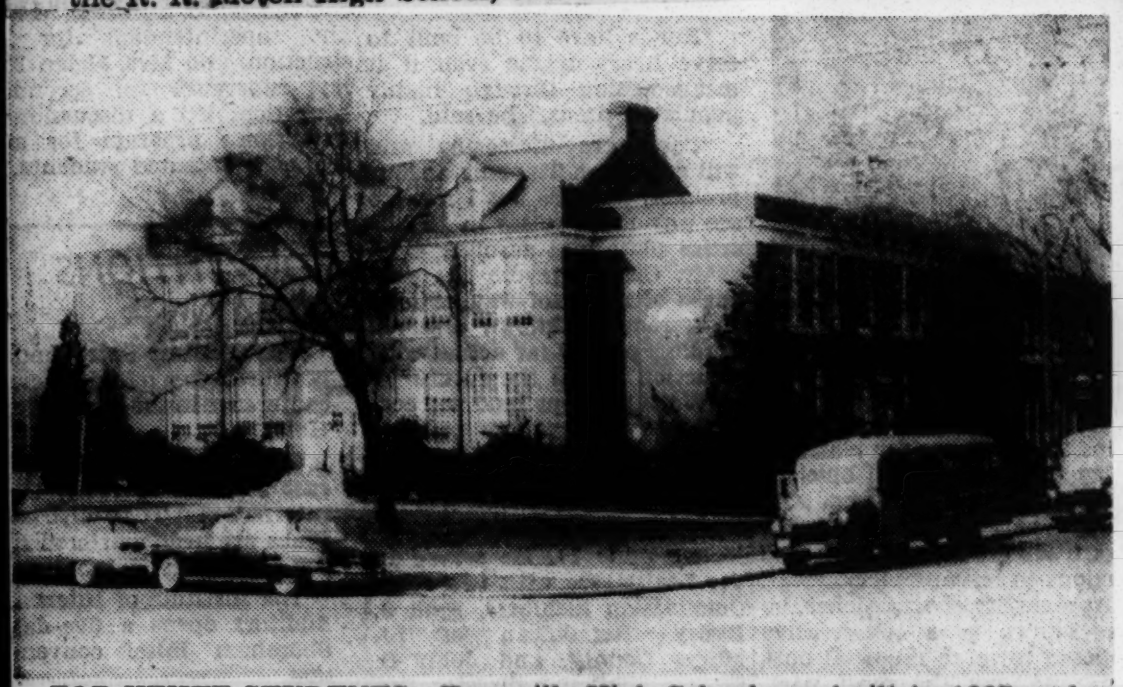
Prince Edward Factors

Other than the solid determination of its white citizens, there are other factors that set this area apart from the five other affected communities:

1. Negro children constitute 54 per cent of the total enrollment—1,747 Negroes to 1,487 white. There are slightly more white children in high school, 499 to 463, but Negroes are in the majority in elementary grades, 1,284 to 988. (The 1950 census placed the total population at 8,538 white and 6,860 Negro).

2. Negroes have the newest, most modern and costliest high school. The colored R. R. Moton High School, built in 1953 for $948,000, has a replacement value today of over $1 million, according to Supt. McIlwaine. Farmville High School for white children, was built in 1927 and 1937 at a cost of $141,000 and is valued today at $450,000. The white consolidated Worsham School, has six high school classes,

NEGRO SCHOOL NEWEST—In 1953, Prince Edward County, Va., completed construction of the R. R. Moton High School, two miles south of Farmville, for its Negro children. Costing $948,000 and valued at over $1 million today, the 22-classroom structure has 463 students.



FOR WHITE STUDENTS—Farmville High School was built in 1927 and 1937 for Prince Edward County's white children. Its total cost was $141,000 and it is valued at $450,000 today. The 14-classroom structure has an enrollment of 411.

was built in 1928 and has been altered several times with a present value of $150,000.

3. Outside Farmville, Negro and white residential patterns are scattered. Thus, the possibility of minimizing classroom mixing by districts is much more difficult here than in areas with more definitely defined white and Negro sections.

4. An estimated 90 per cent of the inhabitants have lived here all their lives. There is no transient population to speak of and relatively few "imported" citizens bringing in other customs and attitudes.

Strike by Negro Pupils

Prince Edward's present racial problems pre-date the Supreme Court decision by several years but may be said to have received their impetus from a strike by the 400 Negro students at the Moton High School on April 23, 1951.

Oliver W. Hill of Richmond, counsel for the NAACP who represented plaintiffs in the Prince Edward case, said the original Moton High School in Farmville "was filled beyond capacity" the day it opened in 1939. Temporary buildings took care of some classrooms "and the war came along and they had a good excuse for not doing anything about it," Mr. Hill added.

Mr. McIlwaine said school officials were aware of the inadequate facilities and were already well along with plans for the present $948,000 modern building when the children walked out of classrooms.

Up to that point, both Mr. McIlwaine and Mr. Hill agree, the Negroes' complaints had been based on a lack of equal facilities.

"But they just let matters drift along," Mr. Hill said. 'When the parents of the children called me and I saw how well organized they were and the fine spirit of those children, I agreed to try to help them."

The children stayed out two weeks although their teachers showed up to empty classrooms. During the walk-out, a delegation called on school officials and asked to be admitted to the white Farmville High School.

"I told them Virginia law would not allow that," Mr. McIlwaine said.

A week or so after the children returned, Mr. Hill filed, on behalf of 69 families, the suit challenging the Virginia law as violating the Federal Constitution—an action that eventually ended with the Supreme Court's 1954 decision.

After an executive session last week, the School Board announced it had instructed its attorney to appeal the latest court order.

White residents have held out some hope of buying more time with the appeal. Because the Supreme Court normally would not reconvene until October—a month after schools are due to reopen.

But Mr. Hill does not feel discouraged by that prospect. He noted that the county will have to ask the circuit court to suspend its order. Unless it is suspended, the September deadline remains in effect.

tiffs in the Charlottesville desegregation case and were ordered into white schools by United States Judge John Paul.

The other two gained admission to Lane High and Venable Elementary Schools by satisfying requirements of the pupil assignment plan, which specifically excludes race as a consideration.

Judge Paul ordered twelve Negro children admitted to Lane and Venable last year. This precipitated the closure of these schools under Virginia's program of massive resistance to integration laws. The twelve Negroes stayed out of school during the first semester.

When state and Federal courts voided the massive resistance program early this year, Federal courts granted Charlottesville a six-month delay of integration. It was granted with the understanding that the School Board would submit for approval a racially non-discriminatory assignment plan.

11 VIRGINIA NEGROES WIN IN SCHOOL FIGHT

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va., June 12 (AP)—School officials assigned eleven Negroes to two white public schools for the fall term Friday. This will bring a court-approved assignment plan into play for the first time.

The city School Board rejected the application of one Negro to a white school.

R. Stanley Goodman, board chairman, said the one applicant had been rejected "because he had a physical defect and we didn't think it would be the right thing to do" to admit him to the white school.

Nine of the eleven were plain-

Integration ruling

Virginia faces vital fork in school issue Monday

BY JOHN F. DAFFRON

RICHMOND, Va., Jan. 17—(AP)—Virginia reaches a vital fork Monday on the foggy road to the future of public education.

In one direction lies the probability of some race mixing in the classrooms, conceivably as early as next month. The other points to a continuation of the state government's unyielding resistance. This means additional school closings under state laws and thousands of other pupils turned away from schools.

The direction marker will become visible Monday. The Virginia Supreme Court will announce its decision in the test of the massive resistance laws under which the state has closed nine public schools in three communities rather than obey federal court orders to admit Negroes.

But the key point of the decision is expected to be on this point: Did the U. S. Supreme Court opinion knocking out the Virginia constitutional requirement for separate schooling for the races also kill the state's requirement to operate a system of public schools throughout the state?

The administration of Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. argued that both sections fell together.

View challenged

THIS VIEW was sharply challenged by a state-employed legal expert in the friendly test case.

If the court rules against the administration, the closure laws will be found to violate the state constitution.

Thus the main state barrier against race mixing will crumple.

If the decision goes the other way, the state could pursue a course of abandoning public education in the face of other integration orders. There is substantial sentiment for such a radical change of policy — especially in rural southside Virginia where the Negro population equals or outnumbers the white.

In addition to the state court decision, a three-judge federal court will disclose its ruling in a test of the law under which six white high and junior high schools were closed in Norfolk in September. The federal case in Norfolk—the state hasn't won a federal test on the desegregation issue except to gain more time—is on the one specific point of school closure.

Five statutes tested

FIVE STATUTES are being tested in the state court—the cutoff of state education funds to a locality that tries to operate integrated schools; tuition grant proposals that would subsidize the private education of pupils deprived of public schools or who declined to attend mixed schools; the school closure act itself; and two acts (the so-called Little Rock bills) that give the governor authority to close schools where violence might erupt or could erupt.

Far more than academic legalisms is involved in the state and federal tests. In both cases some way out is being sought in a dilemma that has deprived more than half of Norfolk's 10,000 displaced pupils of any school training since the start of the term. Also, about 1700 pupils in Charlottesville and another 1000 in Warren County have had to turn to makeshift private schools in churches and other community buildings.

What's ahead

WHAT'S AHEAD IF THE courts upend the existing legislation?

First of all, the governor said he plans to name a large commission of the Legislature to help him design new legal defenses for later construction by a special session of the General Assembly.

But won't there be the likelihood of some integration between the time the courts act and the time required for a study commission and the assembly to act?

Almond conceded it was probable some integration could take place. In addition to the three areas where schools are closed after integration orders were handed down, Arlington is under orders to admit four Negroes to a junior high school in February. Neighboring Alexandria has been told to process the applications of 14 Negroes seeking admission to white schools.

But Almond also said the upset of the laws wouldn't strip him of all authority to close schools. He told a news conference there were certain inherent police powers the governor could exercise—not arbitrarily, he said, but where there was justification. He obviously meant if there was an immediate threat to public safety.

Whatever the courts may do, Norfolk City Council has made a move to block the admission of any Negroes. Council voted—with only one dissent—to cut off local funds to all schools—white and Negro—for classes above the sixth grade. Such action would idle an additional 7000 pupils—mostly Negro.

The threat of council has already been challenged, however, in Federal Court by attorneys for white plaintiffs.

VIRGINIA HEARS RULINGS TODAY

Two Courts Due to Hand Down Decisions In School Integration Cases

RICHMOND, Va., (UPI) — Two courts will rule on the constitutionality of Virginia anti-intergration laws Monday in decisions that may change the complexion of the South's resistance to racially-mixed schools.

The Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals is scheduled to hand down a decision at 9:30 a.m. on the validity of the entire "massive resistance" legislation package in a state-instituted test of the laws.

A three-judge federal court in Norfolk promised to hand out its already-prepared decision immediately after the state court rules in a test of the law which has closed nine public schools in Virginia because they were ordered to integrate.

The laws, passed by a harried special session of the state general assembly in 1956, have served as the model for other Southern states which chose to follow the course of "massive resistance" to integration as blueprinted by Sen. Harry F. Byrd, leader of Virginia's dominant Democratic organization.

Some 13,000 Virginia school children have been displaced by the school closings. The schools were shut down automatically and placed under jurisdiction of Gov. J. Lindsay Almond last September.

Included are Norfolk's six white junior and senior high schools, with an enrollment of 10,000; Charlottesville's only white high school and one of its elementary schools, with a total of 2,000 students; and the only high school in rural Warren County, which had 1,000 students.

Widely-heralded speculation agreed almost unanimously that the federal court would overthrow the school-closing law, moving the closed schools from Almond's control back to the local school boards.

Virginia's Court To Give Decision

To Rule In Test Of Integration Resistance Laws

VITAL FORK IN ROAD

By The Associated Press

RICHMOND, Va., Jan. 17. — Virginia reaches a vital fork Monday on the foggy road to the future of public education.

In one direction lies the probability of some race mixing in the classrooms, conceivably as early as next month. The other points to a continuation of the state government's unyielding resistance. This means additional school closings under state laws.

Claims Both Fell

The direction marker will become visible Monday. The Virginia Supreme Court will announce its decision in the test of the massive resistance laws under which the state has closed nine public schools in three communities rather than obey Federal Court orders to admit a relatively few Negroes.

But the key point of the decision is expected to be on this point: Did the United States Supreme Court opinion knocking out the Virginia Constitutional requirement for separate schooling for the races also kill the state's requirement to operate a system of public schools?

The Administration of Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. argued that both sections fell together.

This view was sharply challenged by a state-employed legal expert in the friendly test case.

If the court rules against the Administration—and the possibility is readily conceded—the closure laws will be found to violate the state Constitution.

One Specific Point

If the decision goes the other way, the state could pursue a course of abandoning public education in the face of other integration orders. There is substantial sentiment for such a radical change of policy—especially in rural southside Virginia where the Negro population equals, and in some areas, outnumbers the white.

District Schools Reply To Almond Criticism

By JOHN McKELWAY
Star Staff Writer

Washington public school officials, who have long endured in silence criticism of pupil integration and dashed back yesterday at the latest critic—Virginia's Gov. Almond.

In a joint statement by Supt. Carl F. Hansen and School Board President Walter Tobriner, the Governor's strongly worded remarks were labeled a "gratuitous and intemperate attack."

The school officials made it quite clear how serious they considered the attack. They called in the local press, wire services, national magazine reporters and television cameramen to record their reply in Dr. Hansen's office at Franklin School.

"Model's" Reputation Poor

Since the integration of local public schools in the fall of 1954, various figures throughout the country have held the system up as an example of what happens under integration. But they did not picture the system as the "model" President Eisenhower had foreseen for integration. Still, the system became a model and currently labors under a poor reputation.

Despite the remarks publicly dropped about District schools, school officials and board members have never seen fit to jump into any defense of the system and its experiences under integration.

But Gov. Almond, picturing District schools in his speech Tuesday as a system "infested" with the "livid stench of sadism, sex, immorality and juvenile pregnancy," apparently was too much for local officials to take.

Defensive Statement

Said Dr. Hansen:

"It is impossible . . . to ignore the . . . statement made by Gov. Lindsay J. Almond, jr., of Virginia, on Tuesday. . . .

"This statement is a gratuitous and intemperate attack upon the innate decency of 114,000 children and youth in our public schools. It maligns the parents and teachers of those children.

"It challenges the integrity of the citizens of this great city—a city of church people, of family-minded citizens—of people of the highest moral principles, generous and concerned—Americans unwilling to stand by while children are in want of physical and moral help.

Dr. Hansen spoke of the work of the school system since integration: The successful effort to improve academic standards on most levels; the grouping of students by ability; the recognition of the gifted; dren in accordance with the highest ideals of democracy.

"It inaccurately implies that 'immorality and juvenile pregnancies' result from attendance in racially integrated schools rather than, when they do occur, from community conditions, social and economic blights, and possibly from a lack of educational backgrounds, conditions which are far too general in our national community.

"It neglects to point out that the schools seek to eliminate so far as they can the causes of human degradation, and that for many children the system of public education is their only chance for improvement.

"Since 1954, the District schools have been successful in improving academic standards on a city-wide basis on most levels though much remains to be done to overcome cultural deficiencies in many homes. They have achieved national notice for the ability grouping program instituted here. They have demonstrated the capacity to educate the bright students to levels far above the national average. (480 pupils whose achievements in reading and mathematics average 3 and 2.4 grades respectively above national norms are presently in the 7th grade honors courses.) They have introduced basic curriculums, with an expansion of remedial work, for the educationally retarded pupils. They have a continually improving program for the maladjusted, the needy, the delinquency-prone child, though many more the expansion of remedial work for the educationally retarded pupil.

On Disciplinary Problems

He added: "District schools have, in all the adjustment necessary to desegregation, experienced a minimum of disciplinary problems, though many needs in this area are still to be met."

During the conference, reporters questioned Dr. Hansen about the number of pregnancies in local schools. These figures were released: In 1955, out of 53,815 girls of all ages there were 192 pregnancies in girls under 17; in 1956, out of 54,384 girls, there were 242 pregnancies and in 1957, out of 55,818 girls, there were 209 cases.

Text of the joint statement follows:

"The basic objective of our school system is to secure and improve the educational opportunities for the children who enter the schools of the District of Columbia.

"Because of this concern for the children here, entanglements with political issues in other jurisdictions have been studiously avoided despite great provocation to the contrary.

"It is impossible, however, to ignore the following statement made by Gov. Lindsay J. Almond, jr., of Virginia, on Tuesday, January 20, 1959: . . . to those who defend or close their eyes to the livid stench of sadism, sex, immorality and juvenile delinquency infesting the mixed schools of the District of Columbia and elsewhere.'

"This statement is a gratuitous and intemperate attack upon the innate decency of 114,000 children and youth in our public schools. It maligns the parents and teachers of those children.

Integrity Held Challenged

"It challenges the integrity of the citizens of this great city—a city of church people, of family-minded citizens — of people of the highest moral principles, generous and concerned—Americans unwilling to stand by while children are in want of physical and moral help.

"It condemns the many for the misfortunes and the deviations of the few. It implies that conditions relative to morality among some children are peculiar to Washington and cannot be found in other cities as well, whether segregated or integrated.

"It subjects to profound indignity and unprovoked assault a public school system that is dedicated to the educational improvement of all the children resources are needed to get to the heart of these problems. They have, in all the adjustment necessary to desegregation, experienced a minimum of disciplinary problems, though many needs in this area are still to be met.

"Outstanding Example"

"The statement ignores a basic fact: that the public school system of the District of Columbia is an outstanding example of how education serves to improve citizenship, thus demonstrating the value of public education to the community and the Nation.

"In frankly assessing its educational problems the District schools have proved that a direct and open attack upon problems of educational and moral retardation is better than a policy of ignoring and secreting such problems.

It is regrettable that the foregoing statement has been considered necessary. The intention is not to involve the school system in the concerns of another political jurisdiction. The intention is, rather to inform Governor Almond that his statement concerning the schools is unjustified, that he does not understand the significance of the school program here, and that, further, the degrading effect of such commentary places a burden upon the children and teachers in our school system which is harmful to the efforts of the school system to provide a maximum educational opportunity for every child according to his needs and abilities."

Montgomery Boosts Negro Teacher Total

Washington D.C.

The 39 Negro teachers in Montgomery County's desegregated schools have earned efficiency rating averaging "slightly above" the county-wide average, School Board study reported yesterday.

The study also showed that the total of Negro teachers has risen from 108 to 114 in the four years since desegregation began in the County.

About 60 per cent of the Negro pupils attended four rural segregated schools and Carver High in Rockville in the year just ended.

The School Board is proceeding on a plan that would end segregation by the fall of 1960.

Four segregated elementary schools with 10 teachers were closed in 1955. The study showed that six of those teachers went to desegregated schools; three went to other segregated schools and one left the school system.

Last summer Lincoln Junior High School in Rockville was closed, and 14 of its 25 teachers went to desegregated schools, four to segregated schools, and seven elsewhere.

The Board's study shows that the 39 Negro teachers are used in nearly every grade and subject in desegregated elementary and secondary schools. Two are vice-principals.

Tuition Grant Rules Set Out In Virginia

Washington D.C.

RICHMOND, June 25 (Special) — Regulations prohibiting the use of State tuition grants for correspondence and business schools and the like were adopted by the State Board of Education here today.

The Board stipulated how the grants can be used in the coming year to educate children in private nonsectarian schools.

But, it said, the grants cannot be used in kindergartens, commercial business schools, colleges or technical schools, nor for homestudy courses, correspondence courses, extension courses or summer schools.

In addition to private, nonsectarian schools the Board ruled that the grants can be used in any public schools other than those to which the children normally would be assigned.

In each case, the regulation provides that the schools for which the grants are sought must meet minimum Board standards.

Each grant is limited to $250 or the actual cost of private school instruction, or the per pupil cost of public school operation for the preceding year, whichever of the three is the lowest. Localities are obligated to share the cost of the grant with the State on the same matching basis that public school operations are financed.

If a locality fails to put up its share of the grant, the State will pay the full cost. But the State then is authorized to withhold from the County its share of other State grants—ABC profits, for example—to make up the local portion of tuition grants.

The Board also adopted regulations providing that the grant would be paid in two equal installments during the school year, the first payment to be made as soon as approved, and the second at the end of the fifth month.

Nowhere in the regulations or in the application forms are the parents required to say why they want the grants.

But General Assembly debates on the purpose of the scholarship grants legislation made it plain that the law was designed primarily for the benefit of parents, white and Negro alike, who either objected to sending their children to desegregated schools or had no public school available for their instruction.

Integration Starts Today In Virginia

Atlanta Constitution

RICHMOND, Va. (AP)—The first public school integration in Virginia history starts Monday at Norfolk and Arlington, where plans are being readied to quell any possible violence.

City and school officials in both communities say they expect no violence.

However, a segregationist group at Arlington has announced plans for a demonstration in connection with the integrated opening of Stratford Junior High where four Negro students will enroll along with 1,076 white youngsters.

ARLINGTON FIRST

The Arlington school will open its doors at 8:45 a.m.

Arlington police said nearly 100 signs were posted Sunday on the school grounds warning against unauthorized entry. They read: "No trespassing. Authorized persons only. By order of Arlington County School Board."

A special detail of 80 policemen, in addition to the regular area patrol, will form a backdrop for the 9 a.m. opening of six secondary schools in Norfolk, closed by state order since last September. White student leaders will also assist in maintaining order.

MANY ELSEWHERE

Seventeen Negroes and nearly 7,000 white students will enroll for classes. Many of the 10,000 white students originally enrolled at the six schools are attending private schools or public schools in nearby communities and are not expected to return to Norfolk public schools this semester.

The schools will close at 12:30 p. m. after pupil registration.

As integration becomes an accomplished fact—four years and 261 days after the May 17, 1954, Supreme Court decision banning public school segregation—the Virginia Legislature will be standing by in Richmond to gauge the effect. The Legislature has reluctantly accepted token integration as inevitable.

The Arlington chapter of the Prosegregation Defenders of State Sovereignty and Individual Liberties announced its members would follow school buses en route to Stratford High Monday morning and attempt to talk white pupils out of boarding the buses. The organization's president, Jack Rathbone, said signs bearing anti-integration messages also would be available for distribution to any white students desiring them.

The Arlington chapter has about 85 members. Rathbone is a plumbing contractor.

CONGREGATING BANNED

But Arlington School Supt. Ray E. Reid said he believes "there will be a smooth transition" to integration at Stratford. Negro and white students will be forbidden to congregate outside the school, and police will block off an area half a mile wide around the school grounds.

Charles Jennings, president of the Norfolk chapter of the Defenders, said the organization had no plans for any demonstration there.

Norfolk Police Chief Harold Anderson said there will be a special detail of 80 policemen on duty Monday, in addition to 160 men on regular duty.

Anderson said he had placed the entire police department on two 12-hour shifts in lieu of the usual three 8-hour shifts.

Student leaders will join in the effort to discourage violence. Wayne Bedser, a member of the 40-member Monogram Club and the 25-member Key Club at Maury High—one of the six schools to be integrated—said members of the two clubs will be at the school Monday morning "doing everything we can to stop trouble before it can start."

J. J. Brewbaker, Norfolk's school superintendent, united with white student leaders Sunday in urging citizens to keep the peace.

Brewbaker called for "sympathetic understanding and full cooperation on the part of everyone" so the Norfolk schools may reopen "in a calm and dignified manner."

ECHOED BY STUDENTS

His plea was echoed by 63 student members of the Key Club honor society at Granby, Maury and Norview high schools in a paid advertisement appearing in Sunday morning's Norfolk Virginian-Pilot.

The students said they believed that "regardless of their personal feelings, the students of our respective schools will conduct themselves with a dignity that will bring credit to our city." They said it is "of the utmost importance to all of us that the orderly reopening is completed as smoothly and quickly as possible so that we may proceed with our immediate objective—to obtain an education."

Brewbaker said any adult seeking to enter any of the six reopening schools Monday morning will be required to identify himself and register as he enters.

Original enrollment at Norfolk's Granby High was 1,949 students; Maury, 1,803; Norview, 1,912; Norview Junior High, 1,514; Northside Junior High, 1,331, and Blair Junior High, 1,138.

Seven Negroes are to be enrolled at Norview High and five at Norview Junior High; two at Blair Junior High, and one each at Granby, Maury and Northside.

In its special emergency session, the Legislature enacted laws providing an escape for pupils who refuse to attend integrated schools. It repealed the state's compulsory school attendance act. It also appropriated three million dollars which can be doled out in tuition grants of up to $250 for the private education of students.

Virginia Quietly Integrates

Jacksonville Times-Union

BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Virginia reluctantly opened seven all-white public schools to 21 Negroes today for hte first time in the state's history. Norfolk and Arlington County were the two areas immediately involved. The transition produced no immediate incidents.

Norfolk, a coastal seaport and the state's largest city with 244,000 residents, admitted 17 Negroes to six secondary schools. The schools had been closed since September under a now-defunct state law to prevent integration ordered by federal courts.

Ten thousand white pupils were displaced.

Urban Arlington County, just south of the nations' capital, admitted four Negro pupils to Stratford Junior High which has a white student body of 1,076. The county with an area of only 24 square miles has a population above 140,00.

In central Virginia, Charlottesville's Lane High School and Venable Elementary School, closed since September, reopens Wedday on an all-white basis. A federal court granted a stay of an integration order when the school board promised to produce a plan for integration next September. Lane has a student body of 1,000; Venable 700. Two Negroes were ordered admitted to Lane, 10 to Venable. Charlottesville has a population of about 30,000.

Warren County High School at Front Royal in northern Virginia—the other school closed by the state—remained closed for the present. Twenty - two Negroes were assigned to the 1,000-pupil school by a federal court. Since closure, virtually all of the displaced puppils have been given private class work in churches and other community buildings. Warren's population is 15,000.

MIXED VIRGINIA SCHOOLS QUIET

Three More Integrate In Alexandria Today

By CHARLES E. MAHON

RICHMOND, Va. (UPI)—Virginia slipped quietly into the second week of public school integration Monday with an orderly reception predicted for nine more Negroes who enter white classrooms in Alexandria Tuesday.

Alexandria, historic suburb of Washington, will join neighboring Arlington county, and Norfolk in carrying out court-ordered integration.

Twenty-one Negro students, 17 in six previously white schools at Norfolk, and four in an Arlington Junior high, continued classes as calmly as they began one week ago.

Attendance at the three high and three junior schools in Norfolk rose by 150 students Monday over that at the end of the first week of integration. City school officials said the attendance, 7018, was 2380 shy of the enrollment when the schools closed last June. Many students are in private classes, others have moved and others have quit school. The six Norfolk schools had been closed since September.

CALM START SEEN

Arlington's Stratford Junior high reported its attendance had remained about normal since four Negroes entered the seventh grade.

City and school officials predicted a calm beginning of racially-mixed schooling in Alexandria which will be the first Virginia city to enroll Negroes in a white elementary school.

"We would hope it takes place in the same manner as in Arlington and Norfolk," school board chairman Robert C. Howard said.

Former mayor Marshall Beverly, an outspoken segregationist, echoed Howard's sentiments.

"I know the citizens will be law abiding and accept the court order," Beverly said. "But I feel they will express their feelings at the ballot box against those who have helped and encouraged integration."

Beverly is running against incumbent Armistead Boothe a moderate, for the state Senate in the Democratic primary this summer.

Police plan stringent precautions to head off any trouble.

50 OFFICERS READY

Police Chief Russell A. Hawes said more than 50 officers would be stationed at the three schools, Hammond High, Ficklin and Ramsay elementary schools. Crowds would not be permitted to gather, he said, and no parking will be permitted near the schools.

Hawes said he did not anticipate any organized trouble.

At the same time Alexandria lowers its racial bars Tuesday, a court effort will be made to force a fourth locality to reopen another school closed last fall under Virginia's "massive resistance" laws.

NAACP attorneys will ask federal district Judge John Paul to order Warren county to comply immediately with an order to enroll 22 Negro students in the county's only high school at Front Royal.

Gov. J. Lindsay Almond prepared to address a 40-member legislative commission Wednesday when it convenes in Richmond to begin work on a new long-range anti-integration program.

Virginia Yields On School Mixing

Warren Refuses to Stay Integration in the State

Combined From Wire Reports

RICHMOND, Va., Jan. 31—The dike of massive resistance to racial integration of Virginia's public schools broke Saturday.

The state's General Assembly had not shown a need for extraordinary action and: "The motion gave sweeping approval to a plan by Gov. Lindsay Almond for recall and stay of the mandate of the U.S. Court of Appeals that will permit but minimize for the 4th Circuit is denied."

integration.

Norfolk and Arlington were moving toward opening of schools Monday on an integrated basis.

The mainstay of the Almond proposals to the Assembly was a tuition grant measure that will permit children who object to attending integrated schools to obtain grants for private education from the state.

SEGREGATIONISTS introduced new measures Saturday including a bill to close all schools in the state for a week to allow time to think up new plans to block integration. The size of the pro-Almond vote on other measures seemed to doom their efforts.

In a two-sentence decision Saturday, Chief Justice Earl Warren turned down an 11th hour appeal for postponement of the admission of four Negroes to an Arlington school Monday. The County Board of Education made the request to Warren.

The four Negro pupils are scheduled to enter Stratford Junior High Monday morning.

COUNSEL FOR the school board had asked the chief justice to issue a stay. They contended it was not to the best interest of students and teachers to permit transfers in the middle of a school year.

Warren took the board request under consideration about 11 a.m. (EST) Saturday. He had promised prompt action on the request and announced his decision less than three hours later.

Warren said the school board

Perrow Unit Presses Virginia Schools Study

RICHMOND, Mar. 10 (AP)—The Perrow Commission on education convenes at the State Capitol today in a renewed effort to formulate a feasible, long-range course for Virginia in the school integration dispute.

The Virginia Supreme Court's refusal to reconsider the constitutional question involved in its ruling voiding the State's key no-integration laws touched off new speculation during the week-end in regard to possible avenues of study for the commission.

Increased pressure for an amendment to soften the mandate of Section 129 of the State Constitution seemed to be the immediate impact of the court's refusal. Section 129 requires the General Assembly to maintain an "efficient system of public free schools throughout the State."

During the week end, authorities reportedly close to the commission were questioning whether such an amendment was necessary.

Sessions are Closed

As is past sessions, today's proceedings will be closed to press and public.

One of the commission members, State Senator Edward L. Breeden of Norfolk, said last night that recommendations by the commission's nine subcommittees "should be released to the press, blow by blow."

Senator Breeden said it "would be good to have public reaction before a final report is made." He said he already has "urged" State Senator Mosby G. Perrow, jr., of Lynchburg, commission chairman, to let the public in on basic proposals as they become available.

Prominent in the discussion of revising Section 129 is a plan to write in some kind of local-option choice, permitting a locality to withdraw from the public school system if the citizens voted to do so rather than accept any integration.

Those questioning the need for such an amendment focused attention on Section 135 which requires the General Assembly to appropriate only certain sums for public schools, totaling only about $10 million per year.

School Grants Eyed

There were reports that resistance-minded commission members may urge a policy whereby the State would cut down its appropriations to the bare minimum outlined in Section 135, then make additional appropriations to send the localities the same amount they now receive for schools—but without labeling or restricting it to public school purposes.

Under this program a locality, if choosing all-out resistance, might reduce its public school operations largely to a system of doling out tuition grants for eligible white and Negro children alike.

Some sources argued this would provide an escape hatch for localities bent on massive resistance.

An all-week session of the 40-man commission was imminent. The group was under the mounting pressure of a deadline. The General Assembly reconvenes March 31.

Gov. Almond, in naming the commission last month, said he hoped the legislators would have specific recommendations ready by that date.

Almond Warns Of Federal Schools Peril

Some Integration Called Necessary To Keep State Rule

FRONT ROYAL, Va. (AP)—Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. bluntly told Virginians Tuesday night they must accept some measure of integration in state-operated public schools or sooner or later give up control of public education to the federal government.

Speaking to undemonstrative but attentive students and parents of a private school that came into being as a result of desegregation of their county's only high school, the governor declared:

"We would do well to consider which is better and which we would prefer—public education administered as a function of the federal government, or public education administered as best we can with state and local support, control and regulation."

TAKES HIS STAND

The governor told the 97 graduates of the Warren County Education Foundation High School, "I have taken my stand. We must save, sustain and support the cause of public education in Virginia." He added

"I call upon all Virginians who believe in the soundness and righteousness of that position to rally to my support before it is too late."

The governor received a standing ovation when he was introduced, another when he finished.

SCHOOL CLOSED

He spoke in a locality where the only public high school, white Warren County High, was closed down last September under now defunct state massive resistance laws to integration.

When those statutes were struck down by both federal and state courts in January, Warren County High was ordered reopened on an integrated basis.

Twenty-one Negro pupils enrolled. More than 700 white children continued their education in private classrooms.

The governor said the time has come to "master and not to mourn" the racial problem.

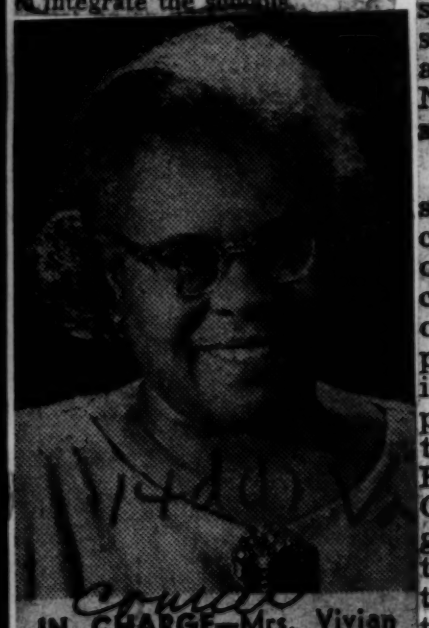
There could be no more costly mistake, he added, than to "succumb to the blandishment of those who would have Virginia abandon public education and thereby consign a generation of children to the darkness of illiteracy . . . and the dungeons of delinquency."

Alexandria loses new school appeal

BALTIMORE, Feb. 1—(AP)—A federal appeal judge Saturday refused to delay the admission of nine negroes to white public schools in Alexandria, Va., next Tuesday.

Chief Judge Simon E. Sobeloff of the U. S. Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals made his ruling after hearing pleas by the Alexandria School Board it needed more time to prepare for integration.

U. S. District Judge Albert V. Bryan Friday turned down an appeal by the school board for a delay in his previous order to integrate the schools.



IN CHARGE—Mrs. Vivian Carter Mason, president-emeritus of the National Council of Negro Women, will be seen on "Most Class of '59," Wednesday, Jan. 21 (CBS Television Network), 4 - 4:30 P.M. EST. Mrs. Mason is in charge of 17 children who were barred from attending white schools in Norfolk, Va.

Political Interference With The Public Schools

BY LEGAL authority and by good practice and precedent, long respected, the operation, control, and maintenance of public education, including the employment of teachers, have been vested in school boards of the state's cities, towns, and counties. These have been, and are, to a remarkable degree, composed of able, public-spirited, and dedicated citizens of both sexes—who serve without pay. In at least three Virginia communities, Negro citizens have been or are now serving on such boards.

In varying degrees in the numerous school districts, some element of political pressure or interference inevitably occurs. In these days of tension, crisis, and misunderstanding it is obvious and highly regrettable that such political interference is rapidly spreading and increasing in intensity. The probably worst instance, and internationally known, took place in Little Rock, Ark. under the aegis of Governor ORVAL FAUBUS. He used the men and guns of the Arkansas National Guard to abort the rulings of the courts, until President EISENHOWER federalized the guard, supplemented it with Army units, and put them under orders to support the authority of the courts. The ordered integration of Central High School followed, then its closure under FAUBUS' version of closing out the public schools.

Possibly, the second most deplorable example of political interference took place in Norfolk. Here, the City Council under the prodding of the mayor, Mr. W. FRED DUCKWORTH, demonstrated several tactics of political interference with our notably able and law-abiding School Board. The Council first sought to put school appropriations on a month-to-month basis; then it threatened not to operate any secondary schools if any one or more of them were desegregated; and, finally, thwarted in these designs by orders of Federal District Court, on the initiative this time of aroused white plaintiffs, Council offically "got out of" the school business. Councilman ROY B. MARTIN, it deserves to be noted, voted against closing public schools.

Nevertheless, Council has continued to seek to gain the end of, or the containment of, integration by acts of intimidation. In Mr. DUCKWORTH'S words appropriations for schools are going to be tightly controlled, and "it will take almost an act of Congress" to get Council to vote funds for new school construction and ordinary operations.

In an amazing act of falling back to the thinking of the days of the little red schoolhouse, with its one room and pot-bellied wood stove, City Council proposed the building of no more modern-day large schools but only small three-room facilities to serve small neighborhood units. The clear purpose was to insure racially separate schools through the historic pattern of residential segregation.

For understandable reasons, with political power hanging over it like the sword of DAMOCLES, the School Board responded by naming a committee of teachers, principals, and administrators, two of them Negroes, to study and report on the three-room schools proposal.

After a hurried and clearly inadequate survey, this committee rendered a report that sought to escape the threat of political reprisal and yet reiterated the requirements for schools of larger size. The people of Norfolk did not too sharply criticize the recommendations of this committee of the board, knowing the circumstances under which it was created and worked.

Most recent instance of "dirty politics" comes from South Norfolk, whose School Superintendent WILLIAM J. STORY and Mayor L. L. BRIGGS JR. are among the most vocal of segregationists. Mayor BRIGGS has assailed as "radical agitators" any Negro leaders who support compliance with the law of the land as to school desegregation. Supt. STORY has warned the Negro teachers in South Norfolk that no contracts for the next school year will be offered to them "until we see what the NAACP is going to do. . . " about expressed intentions to secure some integration in his city.

This is the use of infensible economic and political pressures. Our teachers, school administrators, and pupils deserve a better fate. The hard-won integrity and efficiency of our system of free public education is at stake. The voters ought not to forget that hard fact when they cast ballots in upcoming elections.

Virginians digest report on schools

RICHMOND, VA., April 3—(AP)—An atmosphere of calm before the storm triggered over the state capitol today.

While a group of youngsters conducted a model legislature, members of the Virginia General Assembly, as home for the week-end, designed the contents of a huge report on the state's school crisis by the Perrow Commission.

And Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. worked on the message he will deliver when the assembly reconvenes Monday. It seemed Almond will come up with a strong speech endorsing the freedom of choice plan recommended by the majority of the study commission.

AN INDICATION of legislative struggles to come could be found in reaction to the Perrow Commission's majority report, which ranged from commendation to condemnation.

There were suggestions the commission's majority would introduce legislation more drastic than the majority proposals for dealing with racial integration in the public schools. Something akin to the old massive resistance line appeared to be cooking.

Proposals recommended by the commission majority would:

Permit governing bodies of cities and counties to cut off local school funds and reduce their school systems to a token operation, financed by appropriations specified by the state constitution.

PROVIDE FOR scholarship grants of up to $250 for pupils attending nonsecretarian private schools for any reason.

Provide for referenda by which voters could authorize the sale of school property deemed surplus.

Re-enact the compulsory school attendance law, with certain changes.

Restore pupil assignment functions to localities.

The recommendations summed up to a plan giving localities a choice between integration or no public schools at all.

For School Integration to Allow Other Negro Pupils To Enroll in September

New York — The agreement reached for desegregating the public schools of Charlottesville, Va., "suggests a path for peace and mutual respect which both white and colored Virginians can pursue with benefits to the commonwealth," NAACP Executive Secretary Roy Wilkins said here today in a letter to Dr. Philip Wyatt, president of the Virginia State Conference of NAACP branches.

Congratulating the Virginia NAACP and its counsel, Oliver W. Hill, on the manner in which agreement was reached on the school desegregation plan submitted by officials of Charlottesville, Mr. Wilkins recalled that ever since the Supreme Court decision of May 17, 1954, the NAACP has advocated that the proper officials in the affected areas and Negro citizens agree mutually on a plan of desegregation suitable to the communities involved and the problems existing therein."

Negro Students

Under the Charlottesville plan, not only the 12 Negro students already approved for admission to previously all-white schools under a federal district court order but also other Negro students will be permitted to enroll in desegregated schools in September. The plan was approved by Federal District Judge John Paul on March 30 in conference with Mr. Hill and John S. Battle, Jr., attorney for the City of Charlottesville.

Last Resort

The NAACP view, Mr. Wilkins asserted, "has been (and remains) that law suits should be the last resort and should be employed only when localities and states present such resistance and defiance as to leave citizens who seek their constitutional rights no alternative."

All that Negro citizens seek for their children, Mr. Wilkins said, is "that equality in educational opportunity" afforded by "a public school system that is not organized or administered on the basis of race. They seek this objective peaceably but firmly. They realize fully that a great social transition is in being and that this change requires not only patience, but honesty and fairness as well."

VIRGINIA DEBATES SHIFT ON SCHOOLS

Compromise Likely as State Nears Vote on Measure to Bar Integration

Special to The New York Times.

RICHMOND, Va., April 11—Compromise was in the air this week-end as a showdown approached on an anti-integration program for the state.

A group which believed the Perrow Commission on Education had strayed too far from the now-invalidated massive resistance laws proposed a constitutional revision this week.

This would drop provisions for "an efficient system of public free schools throughout the state" and substitute authorization for localities to establish public schools with state financial aid. As in the commission's report, segregated private schooling would be encouraged as an alternative.

The Legislative commission had rejected a proposal to repeal the education provision. But its decision, reached after a close vote two weeks ago, had opposed particularly revision by a constitutional convention with broad powers. It had also advocated further study of possible amendments "to provide for local autonomy or otherwise."

The commission's critics suggested instead specific revision by the slower method of approval by two successive sessions of the Legislature and a public referendum.

This timetable led observers to the belief that Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr., supporting the Perrow commission recommendations, might accept this suggestion.

In return, however, it was anticipated that he and backers of the Perrow commission's majority report would hold out for its proposal for local pupil placement under state-wide criteria.

This was opposed by the critics, who would retain pupil placement at the state level instead.

The Governor, in a message Monday to the Legislature, and the commission, in its report, both had left the door open for compromise. They had expressed willingness to hear other suggestions.

Critics of the commission's report insisted that they were seeking only to strengthen the commission's suggestion.

The critics issued a statement, saying:

"Our objection to endorsing the Perrow report lies with the assignment plan and compulsory attendance laws, which we believe may result in some integration by force in the State of Virginia."

On the other hand the commission had said its proposals would permit the preservation of public free schools and provide that "no child will be forced to attend a racially mixed school."

The Governor conferred briefly Friday with State Senator Mosby G. Perrow of Lynchburg, chairman of the special education commission, and planned talks with several other proponants before the Legislature reconvenes on Monday.

Delegates Bar School Abolition

Segregationists Lose Move; Senate Hearing Continues

RICHMOND, April 20 (AP)—The Virginia House of Delegates killed by a 53-45 vote today a segregationist bloc's constitutional resolution for abolition of the State's public school system.

But it moved along toward Tuesday passage an administration-backed bill for an advisory referendum on schools.

Danville Del. C. Stuart Wheatley had proposed the resolution to amend the constitution's mandate for the State to maintain a public school system.

Supporters of the resolution for the most part included legislates who have opposed the Almond-Perrow program for containment of racial integration in the schools.

The Senate, meanwhile, sitting as a committe of the whole heard more than 40 witnesses in a 6-hour public hearing on the controversial local assignment bill, which already passed the House.

Action on amendments and the bill were expected at a night session.

Administration forces voted the committee-of-the-whole consideration of the vital bill Friday in parliamentary move to keep the legislation out of the hostile hands of the Senate Education Committee. The move, piloted by Sen. Mosby G. Perrow Jr. of Lynchburg, succeeded on a 20-19 vote.

Arguments for and against the local assignment plan followed pretty much the pattern of testimony heard earlier by the House Education Committee and by the Senate Education Committee.

The latter killed its own version of local assignment, a key provision of the Perrow Commission's recommendations for a program aimed at containing and minimizing desegregation in the public schools.

The House passed without dissenting vote and sent to the Senate five other bills in the Perrow Commission package which Gov. J. Lindsay Almond asked the Assembly to enact into law.

These measures deal with tuition charged children attending public schools in another school district, local appropriations and levies, appropriating state funds for scholarships for children attending nonsectarian private schools, providing for such state-local scholarships up to $250, and repeal of the defunct school closing law.

Races Prefer Segregation, Board Finds

RICHMOND, Va., (AP) — The State Pupil Placement Board said Tuesday its experience in 2½ years of operation "is a convincing demonstration that voluntary segregation is the wish and desire of the overwhelming majority of both races."

The board said this is borne out by the fact that no appeal has ever been filed with it, though the board has placed almost 420,000 students in Virginia public schools. In no case has a Negro child been assigned to a white school, or vice versa.

VALIDITY QUESTIONED

Constitutionality of the legislation setting up the placement board has been questioned, but never finally established.

Under state law, the board has sole authority to assign students to public schools. Local school boards are divested of this power. However, in several instances in desegregation cases, federal judges have advised Negro plaintiffs they need not fill out placement applications, thereby bypassing the placement board.

In issuing a statement explaining its opposition and policies, the board said it always has recognized it could not "forbid a Negro child from entering an all white school on the sole ground of race or color."

NO COURT CONCERN

But, the board added, the Supreme Court did not "decree integration." "It is recognized by tion of the races in the public schools is of no concern to any court . . . ," the statement continued.

"Upon these two basic propositions, the board is under no duty to take any positive action to mix or accelerate the mixing of the races in the public schools. The board does not intend to propose any plan for the mixing of the races in the public

VIRGINIA

'Limited Integration' For Virginia Forecast In Talk Here; S. C. Warned

Virginia apparently will have "limited integration" in several cities, the St. Andrew's Citizens' Council was told last night.

Micah Jenkins, St. Andrew's Parish businessman, was highly critical of the waning resistance. He warned that South Carolina must act immediately to set up legal safeguards if it is to avoid situations plaguing Virginia and Arkansas. Jenkins recently attended meetings at Farmville, Va.

Jenkins asked those at the council meeting: "I want to know how many people here tonight believe in any type or form of integration?"

He added: "There is no such thing as limited integration. A little bit of integration is like a little bit of pregnancy—it either exists or it doesn't exist."

Jenkins, who has served as chairman of both state and Charleston County Citizens' Councils, was highly critical of what he called a change in Southern newspaper editorial policies.

Newspapers, including those in Charleston as well as in Virginia and other places, have changed their policies from hard-core resistance to acceptance of "limited integration" as inevitable, he declared.

Jenkins based his views on the Virginia situation from the meetings at Farmville. He said the only force apparently now possible to save Virginia schools from mixing the races was for the governor to use his police powers. He said he appealed to the governor "to hold the line."

He said Gov. J. Lindsay Almond up alone as much as possible. It's another way of instilling confidence in the club, and I like to do that."

On Scalzi's team, the players make their own rules governing off-the-field, training and curfews.

"Only if they prove to me that they need somebody to be a father to them do I step in. I haven't had to do that often."

The rumor was making the rounds that Scalzi is an umpire baiter, a fellow who gives the men in blue a rough time.

Scalzi laughed.

"The word gets around, doesn't it?" he said, but added in a more serious tone:

"I'm afraid of that."

But he didn't sound as if he planned to quit the practice. Maybe it's another superstition.

has indicated reluctance to use his police powers to prevent integration of schools.

Jenkins stated Virginia officials now expect an adverse ruling from the Virginia Supreme Court, declaring the closing of various schools—such as those at Charlottesville and Norfolk—unconstitutional. He predicted that the state court probably will rule that way because a three-judge federal court will sit the following day (Jan. 20). The federal judges, he said, would review the ruling and undoubtedly decide the state's school closings are illegal.

"Virginia didn't set up safeguards before it was under court orders to integrate, therefore anything that Virginia does is considered evasive," Jenkins asserted.

Virginia Poises For Integration

RICHMOND, Va. (AP)—Virginia moved Friday toward the state's first public school integration next week with Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. resisting last ditch moves in the Legislature to block it.

Advocates of continued massive resistance to any classroom race mixing sought without success to get Almond's backing for legislative moves to win more segregated time.

Almond's aides reported he was standing firm on the program he offered the Assembly when he conceded Wednesday massive resistance had run its legal course. He offered the Assembly a program of transition to a system of partial private schooling to minimize integration as much as possible. Moreover, the opposition conceded the governor had the votes in the Assembly to hold the line the way he wanted it. Almond's supporters were claiming 70 votes in the 100-member House and a majority of the 40-man Senate.

NORFOLK READY

The seaport city of Norfolk went ahead with arrangements to reopen Monday the six high and junior high schools closed by the state last September when a federal court directed the admission of 17 Negro pupils. Ten thousand white pupils were displaced by the closures.

Safety Director Calvin H. Dalby said the city did not intend to make a show of police force at the schools Monday. He did not enlarge on this. But he called the attention of newsmen to earlier statements he and Police Chief Harold Anderson have made. Both said previously they do not expect any violence but police have been trained since last summer to be prepared for possible emergencies.

In Urban Arlington County on this side of the Potomac River from Washington, school authorities planned for the admission of four Negro pupils to Stratford Junior High School which is attended by 1,076 white pupils. But counsel for the Arlington School Board explored a final avenue of delay by turning to Chief Justice Earl Warren of the U.S. Supreme Court in the wake of Thursday's turndown by a U.S. appeals court judge.

WANTED REPLY

The chief justice told the attorney Frank Ball, to list his grounds for a stay and said he wanted a reply from counsel for the four Negro pupils by 10 a.m. Saturday. Warren promised to act promptly.

Legislators seeking some action stronger than Almond's request for repeal of the compulsory school attendance law and his tuition grant bill offered new proposals and saw a couple of early ones quickly killed in committee.

THREATENED RIFT

Leaders on both sides said the course of the Assembly—before it recesses to let a study commission draft a long-range transitional program—probably would include a compromise to ward off a threatened serious rift in the state Democratic organization. They didn't expect the compromise would be anything strong enough to defer the integration in Norfolk and Arlington.

One late effort, a proposal by delegate Sam Pope of Southampton County, would segregate pupils by sex where they couldn't be segregated by race. A legislator said Almond turned this one down, too.

ATTENDANCE LAW

In floor action, the House gave quick approval to the Almond administration's bills to repeal the compulsory school attendance law set up a three-million-dollar program for the payment of tuition grants of $250 per pupil for private schooling and make it a felony for anyone over 14 to threaten or communicate a threat of a bombing. There have been 90 school-bombing hoaxes in the state since October, plus scattered others at theaters and churches.

Leaders on both sides said it appeared the Assembly would remain in session through Monday and perhaps later before taking the recess the governor suggested. Members said they wanted to be on hand at least past Monday's deadline for integration in Arlington and Norfolk.

ALMOND WARNS SEGREGATIONISTS

Tells Bloc in Legislature He Will Veto Bills Offered to Stall Integration

By HOMER BIGART

Special to The New York Times.

RICHMOND, Va., Jan. 29—Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. warned a group of diehard segregationists from the General Assembly today that he would veto a package of bills they had hastily introduced to frustrate school integration next Monday.

What kept the diehard segregationists under frantic pressure on the second day of the Assembly's emergency session was the certainty that six previously all-white schools in Norfolk and one in Arlington would receive a handful Negro pupils Monday unless the General Assembly acted to hold the line of total segregation.

Governor Almond, who is trying to shift the state's anti-integration policy from "massive" to "passive" resistance, reportedly told the segregationists that he could not support slap-dash measures to thwart the Federal courts and that he would veto such acts if they reached him.

Governor Stances Firm

The diehards, mostly from tobacco countries of "southside" Virginia, held two caucasus in the old Senate hall and sent a steady stream of petitioners to the Governor's office. They were unable apparently to shake his conviction that token integration next week was inevitable.

They were able, however, to prevail on House and Senate leaders to recess the afternoon session so they could introduce before adjournment tonight a apackage of new bills that went far beyond the Governor's moderate plan of passive resistance.

The Senate recessed after thirty minutes of lighthearted tributes to Southern womanhood and an apple called Virginia Beauty that adorned each guest, the gift of a southwest Virginia apple grower.

Then the Southside segregationists went into a long huddle.

Among the bills introduced late today was one to strain the limits of evasion. It cited the recent Chicago parochial school fire as a reason for requiring all Virginia schools to be closed and remain closed until they were inspected and approved by the state's chief fire marshal.

Another would make it a felony for any school board or school official to enroll a student without approval of the Pupil Placement Board, a three-man board set up in 1956 to prevent the enrollment of Negroes in white schools and which still exists despite the collapse of Virginia's "massive resistance" laws. Persons guilty of bypassing the Pupil Placement Board would be subject to a $5,000 fine or eighteen months' imprisonment.

Passage Held Unlikely

Neither of these measures was likely to obtain the four-fifths majority required for adoption of emergency legislation.

Also introduced was a measure to prevent the plundering of millions of dollars the state is planning to make available in tuition grants for pupils who want to quit an integrated public school and enter a nonsectarian private school. The bill makes it a misdemeanor for anyone to obtain a tuition grant for any purpose other than the education of a child.

Other measures awaiting introduction would:

¶Call for a referendum on repeal or amendment of a constitutional requirement that Virginia maintain an "efficient free public school system."

¶Close the public school in which integration occurred until the people of that locality had voted in a referendum on whether to open the closed school.

¶Close an integrated school until the general assembly could investigate to determine whether the school could operate efficiently at the start of the next semester.

Alabama Weighs Step

MONTGOMERY, Ala., Jan. 29 (UPI)—Gov. John Patterson conceded today Alabama's segregation laws might be "insufficient" in the light of recent court decisions affecting Virginia.

Governor Patterson said he was watching the Virginia situation "very closely."

"Gov. Lindsay Almond Jr. is in the front line of the segregation fight," he said. "In view of recent Federal and state court rulings affecting Virginia, my office is making a reappraisal of Alabama's segregation laws.

"It might be that Alabama's segregation laws are insufficient and we may have to enact some new laws. If the race agitators continue we may have to enact a private school plan."

The new Governor said, however, he preferred "going slow" on any new segregation legislation.

Norfolk Divided and Bitter As It Faces Desegregation

Pro-Segregation City Council Has Made No Plans for Mixed Classes—Tempers High and Disorders Are Feared

By HOMER BIGART

Special to The New York Times.

NORFOLK, Jan. 23—This city remains sharply divided and embittered as it faces the imminent prospect of school integration.

On one side stand the pro-segregationist City Council and perhaps a substantial majority of Norfolk residents. They would prefer to abandon the public school system rather than admit Negroes to white schools.

The opposing faction consists of the school board, the teachers, and a "moderate" element of parents and students. They fear that permanent closing of the public schools would be a harsher blow than acceptance of token integration as ordered by the Federal courts.

The school board wants to reopen on Feb. 2 the city's six closed schools. Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. ordered them closed last September to avoid mixing seventeen Negro students with 9,900 white children.

But the city administration threatens to cut off funds for all classes above the sixth grade, beginning Feb. 2. This would affect an additional 1,914 white and 5,259 Negro children in thirty-six schools, increasing to more than 17,000 the number of children deprived of public schooling.

On Monday Federal Judge Walter E. Hoffman will hear a suit brought by eighty-nine white children and parents challenging the validity of state laws under which the council would close the schools.

These laws, enacted last year, empower localities to adopt "tentative" budgets for school operation, thus enabling them to cut off funds at the end of a school term.

The laws were not part of the "massive resistance" statutes that were overturned by the State Supreme Court of Appeals and a Federal Court last Monday.

Almond Not Hopeful

An injunction against the City Council would just about kill the capability for further evasion of integration. Governor Almond himself believes that no effective legal defenses could be devised before Feb. 2.

Yet the Norfolk administration has taken no steps to prepare the public for peaceful acceptance of the inevitable. Tempers run high. Opinions are so rigid that a parent-teachers association canceled a talk by W. I. McKendree, president of the Norfolk P-T. A. Council and a leading segregationist, because he was "too controversial a figure."

In this dubious climate, most observers believe that some disorder would mar the reopening of the closed schools. They are particularly worried about Norview High School, the city's newest and biggest.

Norview High School lies at the edge of a lower-middle class residential district that has skidded rapidly since World War II. After the war Negro families began moving into previously all-white blocks. There were some bombing incidents. In recent years racial animosity has apparently diminished but the Norview neighborhood is still regarded as "violence-prone."

Because of a large Negro population living in the immediate vicinity, the Norview Hhigh School has been ordered to take seven of the seventeen Negroes who have been admitted to Norview Junior High School.

"I don't feel there will be too much trouble," said John J. Brewbaker, Norfolk superintendent of schools. "But it would have been better if we had opened last September."

Atmosphere of Violence

The Rev. James Brewer, a Unitarian minister who heads the Committee for Public Schools, said that an "atmosphere of violence" was building up and and that the situation was "very dangerous."

"But fear of violence should not stop the schools from opening," he said. "The possibility of trouble is a reality we have to face."

Meanwhile, Mayor F. Fred Duckworth was under mounting pressure from conservative business leaders to reopen the schools.

Most of the business community agrees with Henry Clay Hofheimer, industrialist and president of the Chamber of Commerce, that abolition of the public school system would force an exodus of Navy personnel, discourage new industry and eventually confront the city with economic ruin.

Mr. Hofheimer said that Norfolk's economy was so dominated by the Navy base that any downward fluctuation in Navy personnel had sharp repercussions on business. He was worried lest continued lack of school facilities would force many Navy families to request transfer to other bases.

Judge Says He Approves Va. Plan

Negro Attorney Agrees To Pupil Assignments

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. (AP)—Federal District Judge John Paul said Tuesday he will approve Charlottesville's school assignment plan after an informal hearing in a few weeks with attorneys on both sides of the city's desegregation case.

Judge Paul said by telephone from Harrisonburg that Oliver W. Hill, Richmond attorney representing the Negro plaintiffs, had no objections to the assignment plan, adopted by the school board Feb. 12.

The judge said he had received Hill's decision in a telephone call. Hill said he would not seek court hearings on objections or for further clarification of the plan's provisions.

Hill told Paul he and school board attorney John S. Battle Jr. will pick a date for an informal conference with Paul before the plan is finally approved. The plan was submitted to Paul Feb. 18 by Battle on behalf of the school board.

Paul said then that he would approve it unless the plaintiffs had some objections to its provisions and wanted a public hearing.

The plan assigns to white schools 12 Negro pupils ordered admitted last fall. It set up school districts and allows the superintendent wide latitude in making pupil assignments on basis of things other than race. Transfers of white and Negro pupils would be made through an administrative procedure set up by the superintendent.

COURT QUESTIONS NEGRO PUPIL TEST

Appeals Bench Notes That Arlington Doesn't Give Such Exams to Whites

Special to The New York Times.

RICHMOND, Va., March 10—A Federal appeals court raised the question today whether local pupil placement tests could be applied only to Negroes.

The United States Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals did not rule on the question, but noted that there had been such a procedure in the Arlington County desegregation case.

The court directed the county school board to restudy the applications of twenty-six Negroes denied admission to white schools. It called on the board to act with sufficient speed to permit a court review before the agency of the 1959-60 school year, if possible.

In January, in the same case, it directed the admission of four Negro pupils to previously all-white Stratford Junior High School. They have been attending since Feeb. 2.

Whites Not Tested

Regarding the twenty-six cases, the court said today:

"We find evidence in the record that their applications for transfer were subject to tests that were not applied to the applications of white students asking transfers."

Lawyers studying the opinion declined direct question, but pointed out that notice of the situation, raised in several previous cases, had been officially taken by an appeals court for probably the first time in Virginia. One lawyer noted that the state had not encouraged local pupil assignment plans, partly because such plans generally did not include a standard qualification test for both races.

Another lawyer said that the ruling had made no firm decision on the use of tests for placement, but raised a point for later clarification.

The transfer requests had been rejected by both the State Pupil Placement Board and the County School Board.

During a hearing in Federal District Court at Alexandria, school offiicals testified that the rejections had been based on five non-racial assignment standards. District Judge Albert Bryan upheld the board's standards involving attendance areas, school over-crowing and the academic qualifications of the Negroes.

But he said that the criterion of psychological problems had not been sufficiently explored to justify a judgment.

He then ordered admission of the four pupils who had been rejected by the School Board on the basis of a fifth criterion—that they probbaly could not adapt themselves to the new situations in white schools.

The School Board's denial of the twenty-six applications had been upheld by Judge Bryan and later appealed.

In ruling on this appeal today, the Appeals Court said that when the applications were being considered by the County School Board and District Judge, the interested parties and officials were aware that integrating a school meant it would be closed under Virginia laws.

"With this threat hanging over them," the court said, "neither the County School Board nor the District Court could act with the same freedom and independence as they can now act." The laws calling for the closing of schools have been invalidated.

The judges deciding the case today were Simon E. Sobeloff of Baltimore, Morris A. Soper of Baltimore and Clement F. Haynsworth of Greensville, S. C

Dual School System Predicted in Virginia

Assignment Is Doubted By Harrison

Virginia's Attorney General Albertis S. Harrison, jr., last night predicted his State would turn to a dual school system—part public and part private—if integration becomes a reality.

In his first formal statement since the State's massive resistance laws collapsed in court, the man who has defended those laws told an Alexandria audience that pupil assignment is no answer to the problem because no plan that is legally administered will exclude Negroes.

"The people of Virginia are proud of their public schools, and are determined to preserve them, if possible," he told a dinner meeting of the Alexandria Junior Chamber of Commerce. "We know that we cannot have an effective school system throughout the State unless it can command Statewide support." Then he added:

"We know that the cause of public education would suffer if and when it became necessary for Virginia to embark on a policy which permits of a school system part public and part private. And that is the ultimate, if integration now becomes a reality in Virginia."

Strong Opposition Seen

He declared that approximately one-half of the State already has served notice its only alternative to integration is to turn to private schools.

"Even in those areas that would tolerate integration, as a last resort, and to avoid the closing of public schools, a great number of the patrons will be unwilling for their children to attend mixed schools, and will withdraw them," he continued. "It must be realized that once private schools are established in any part of Virginia, support of the public school system by the people in that section will diminish."

To turn to a dual system as predicted by Mr. Harrison, presumably the State would have to repeal section 129 of its own constitution. This is the section that requires the State to maintain an efficient public school system everywhere. The State Supreme Court of Appeals on Monday told Virginia it had to obey Section 129, even if it means operating desegregated schools.

Mr. Harrison pleaded for understanding by those in authority that "in large areas in numerous Southern States the entire public school system will be abandoned to avoid integration."

Appeals for Companion

Everywhere, he said, there are individuals who will not permit their children to attend integrated schools.

"Now this may be deplored, the people may be called racial bigots, or otherwise excoriated," he said, "but their determination and opposition will not be lessened, for they envision an intolerable situation under which they cannot live."

The silver-haired attorney general, who always has been one of massive resistance's gentlest spokesmen, appealed for compassion for the people running Virginia at this time.

"Those of us who occupy positions of responsibility in Virginia's Government have to reckon with and accept this decision of the people (to avoid integration). Even if we were disposed to try and alter their opinion, we could not. We only ask that our counterparts in Federal Government be as realistic and not shut their eyes to a critical situation that is building up."

Doubtful of Assignment Plan

Mr. Harrison spoke at length of those who think an assignment plan is the answer. In the audience was one of the State's foremost advocates of an assignment plan, Alexandria State Senator Armistead L. Boothe.

"I fear, however, that to depend on the Alabama, the North Carolina, or any other assignment plan, as a means of preventing, or of controlling integration for very long, would be pinning our hopes on a snare and a delusion," Mr. Harrison continued.

He explained the Alabama assignment plan, which United States Attorney General Rogers earlier this week said might offer an answer to the South's integration woes.

But Mr. Harrison declared that all the court has said of the Alabama plan at present is that it furnishes the legal machinery for admission of qualified Negro pupils to white schools. He said it was erroneous for anyone to conclude at this time that the Supreme Court has said a school board may apply all of the standards embraced in the Alabama plan.

Must Face Facts

"We might as well face it—there are Negroes living in every county and city in Virginia who will qualify for admission to any public school under any standards that would be approved by the courts, and no plan that is legally administered will exclude them," the attorney general added. The best that can be hoped for from an assignment plan is that it can slow down integration during a transition period, and may result in limited integration in a few cities where the races live in separate residential sections. But he warned: "It offers no hope for the counties, or even a majority of the cities."

Mr. Harrison's speech seemed to bear out the growing indications that Virginia's next move will be a new tuition-grant program to finance the education of children in areas unwilling to accept any integration in public schools. This, of necessity, would also mean that the State would have to allow abandonment of public schools in some sections.

But court developments during the past week have made it appear likely integration will come in communities already facing integration orders before the State has a chance to adopt a new program.

Almond in Middle

In the middle is Gov. Almond who is being pressured from die-hard segregationists to find some way to keep Negroes out of white schools, and on the other side by persons who want schools kept open regardless of whether they become integrated.

The latest development in the school crisis was a statement by a Virginia Congressman and a Southside State Senator urging Gov. Almond to convene the General Assembly at once to empower that body to take over and run the schools at least for the remainder of the current school year.

In Southside Appomattox, Representative Abbitt and State Senator Charles T. Moses said they believe Virginia can maintain segregated schools in spite of the court rulings against the massive resistance laws.

Mass Meeting Called

In other developments, Robert B. Crawford of Farmville announced plans to call a Statewide mass meeting of the organization he heads, the Defenders of State Sovereignty and Individual Liberties, not later than Tuesday in Richmond "to explain the situation."

And in a telegram sent to all members of the House and State Senate, Mr. Crawford said "Gov. Almond has indicated that the administration has no plan to meet the crisis of February 2."

"In this situation," he went on, "it is the absolute duty and responsibility of every member of the General Assebly to do what they alone have the power to do: convene immediately and enact such legislation as may be necessary to maintain the sovereignty of Virginia."

The officers and directors of another segregationist group, the Virginia Association of Citizens Councils, also urged repeal of the State's compulsory school laws and a quick special session of the General Assembly to consider the integration situation.

In Fredericksburg, State Republican Chairman I. Lee Potter last night renewed his party's 1957 call for adoption "of a pupil assignment plan that will comply with court decisions and keep the schools open."

In Richmond, the executive board of the Virginia Committee for Public Schools launched formal operations and said membership in its local groups throughout the State now approximates 12,000 persons.

Jack Rathbone, executive secretary of the Arlington Chapter of the Defenders of State Sovereignty and Individual Liberties, said his organization would send letters to all Stratford Junior High School students suggesting they stay away from any Negroes who are authorized to enter the school on February 2.

Mr. Rathbone said also that his group was planning to picket the school on February 2.

ALMOND FORCES SCORE VICTORY

Proposal to Take Virginia Out of Public School Business Beaten

RICHMOND, Va. (UPI) — The House of Delegates Monday defeated by eight votes a proposal to take Virginia out of the public school business.

The resolution, defeated 53-45, called for sweeping changes in the State constitution. It was the rallying point for a staunch segregationist bloc in the General Assembly opposing Gov. J. Lindsay Almond's moderate anti-integration program.

Without Program.

The vote, which came after two hours of debate, left the "massive resistable" bloc without a program of its own as Almond's "freedom of choice" proposals moved toward final enactment in the Senate.

The House also was to consider an alternate, administration-backed bill calling for a referendum next November to determine whether the people want the constitution changed. The vote would be for information only.

The segregationist proposal, introduced by Del. Stuart Wheateley of Danville, would have stricken the State constitutional provision requiring a public school system and substituted one giving each locality freedom to set up public schools or educate its children in any other way it chose.

The Virginia Supreme Court held last Jan. 19 in striking down the State's "massive resistance" laws that the State constitution required maintainance of a public school system, even if integrated.

Wheateley said his resolution was designed to remove the "straight jacket" imposed by the State court's ruling.

Preserve Our Public School System, Speakers Tell Perrow Commission

New state policy is drafted

RICHMOND

Most of the Virginians appearing before the Perrow Commission on Education Friday, asked that the state-wide public school system be preserved.

Seventy - one speakers of both races were heard by the commission during a ten-hour period. The speakers gave suggestions as to how the public school problem may be solved.

The Perrow Commission is charged with drafting a new state policy on schools, to replace the "massive resistance" program which collapsed under state and federal court rulings.

Sub-committees of the commission worked Saturday and Monday on the suggestions. The full commission is scheduled to meet on March 16, if the sub-committees have finished their work by then.

Sen. Mosby G. Perrow, Jr. of Lynchburg, the commission chairman, said some "thought-provoking" suggestions had been made during the lengthy hearing.

A summary of statements made by some of those appearing before the Commission follows:

DR. J. L. BLAIR BUCH of Richmond, speaking for the Virginia Committee of Public Schools and its 20,000 members said public schools "are absolutely essential to the economic, civil and military strength of the nation.

He recommended that local school boards be given maximum autonomy, that the Pupil Placement Act be repealed because it is inconsistent with local control, the re - enactment of compulsory attendance laws with provision for some individual exemptions.

He said his committee is opposed to a statewide segregation - by - sex law because it would be unnecessary and impossible in some localities. Localities now have authority to segregate by sex, he said.

* * *

THE REV. Charles J. Washington of Richmond, colored, representing the Baptist Ministers Conference of Richmond and Vicinity, said Virginia's segregated school system has done much good, "but has no place in a democratic society."

The Baptist members recommended that Section 129 be maintained, that compulsory attendance laws be re - enacted, and that pupil assignment powers be restored to the localities.

OLIVER W. HILL of Richmond, spoke in behalf of the Virginia state conference of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

He urged the commission to "have faith in the American concept of the right of the individual." Colored are determined, he said to "eliminate every vestige of servitude" and there "will be no let-up in the activities of colored until we are granted the full and unremitted rights of an American."

He recommended the appointment of a commission that would try to point out the contributions of the colored to American life and to "soften the emotional impact of desegregation."

As for the tuition grant program, he said, "No one in a democratic society has the right to have his private prejudices financed at public expense."

J. B. MASON of Lynchburg, building contractor, said Virginia can't operate segregated schools as long as it has an integrated treasury into which both whites and colored pay taxes. He proposed, in effect, segregation be preserved by segregating school funds, giving colored full control of their school operations and whites full control of theirs, with each system to operate from funds paid by its race's taxpayers.

MRS. W. T. MASON of Norfolk, former president of the National Council of Colored Women, warned that Soviet Russia's compulsory, 10-year system is making great strides in educating Communist youth, and that unless this nation keeps up its public school system, "we may find ourselves outwitted, out - thought and out - fought" by the Reds.

She recommended; re-enac of the compulsory attendance law, repeal the state Pupil Placement Act and return school controls to the localities, study the tax structure to correct inequities — here she said colored already pay their share of taxes — and create a biracial committee to work out the problems of transition to fully desegregated school system.

DR. J. RUPERT PICOTT of Richmond, executive - secretary of the Virginia Teachers Association, the professional society for colored teachers in Virginia, recommended:

Repeal of the Pupil Placement Act, return to local school boards of assignment functions, and reinstatement of compulsory attendance laws.

He opposed circumvention of orderly desegregation, the tuition grant program ("a dangerous precedent, which will be increasingly expensive") and a statewide sales tax unless it were used for education. Federal aid to education, without federal controls, is needed he said.

DR. ROBERT L. TAYLOR of Richmond, president of the Baptist Goodwill Ministers Conference of Virginia, said Governor Almond and other state leaders should join in telling everybody that Virginia is "absolutely powerless" to override the edict of the Supreme Court. A biracial commission should be appointed to work with authorities in areas where integration is ordered he said, and leaders of both races should cooperate in every way possible.

MRS. R. B. SAMPSON of Richmond, vice president of the State Federation of Colored Women's Clubs, said her organization urged continued public schools, with compulsory attendance. She said they would support a state sales tax "provided it is used for public education and all related purposes."

HERMAN T. BENN of Richmond, a colored lawyer, representing the Virginia Voters League, voiced opposition to any new tax burdens to support tuition grants.

THOMAS H. HENDERSON of Richmond, dean of Virginia Union University, spoke, representing only himself.

Henderson recommended: (1) steps to facilitate an orderly transition to desegregated schools, with biracial committees to advise and help local school boards; (2) abolish the state Pupil Placement Board; (3) remove "the cloud of insecurity" hanging over teachers who are on 30 - day notice contracts; 4) re-enact compulsory attendance laws.

State Sen. TED DALTON, Radford Republican, made a two - point appeal: Re - enactment of compulsory attendance laws and enactment of a North Carolina - type assignment plan

Since repeal of the attendance laws by the General Assembly a month ago, Dalton said, about 50 pupils have dropped out of school in each of three counties he represents.

If that average holds true throughout the state, he added, "then two or three thousand already have dropped out and not many of the youngsters ever know the laws have been killed. By the time springtime rolls around, there will be thousands more."

South Norfolk Schools Rehire Only One Negro

SOUTH NORFOLK, Va. April 15 (AP) — Only one Negro teacher definitely has been rehired to teach in public schools here next year.

School Supt. William J. Story, an advocate of massive resistance to racial integration, said at a school board meeting Monday night that new contracts will not be offered Negro teachers, with one exception, until he knows how many teachers will be needed in the public schools in September.

Mr. Story, who also is a member of the State Board of Education, said integration could cause white pupils to withdraw from school and he does not intend to employ more teachers than may be needed. He indicated white teachers may be assigned to teach in the Negro public schools if there are not enough classes left in white schools to occupy the white teachers.

There has been no move for integration in South Norfolk, but the neighboring city of Norfolk has had six integrated schools since February. A number of white students from Norfolk have been attending public schools in South Norfolk.

Mr. Story's remarks were directed to a delegation from the Parent-Teacher Association of the Negro George Washington Carver High School in South Norfolk. Delegation spokesman Herbert L. Skinner pleaded with the school board for some assurance that Negro teachers will have jobs in September.

School board members indicated they were leaving the matter of hiring teachers up to Mr. Story. Later at the same meeting, the board approved new contracts for 122 white teachers and the lone Negro contract.

Va. Court Bids School Restudy Ban on Negroes

ALEXANDRIA, Va., June 3 (AP).—Federal Judge Albert V. Bryan Wednesday ordered the Arlington school board to review before June 22 the applications of twenty-six Negro students denied admission to white classes.

He ordered the board to reconsider the applications "without regard to race or color and with the use only of just, reasonable and undiscriminatory criteria, fairly applied."

He told the state's pupil placement board it could intervene as a party, but he made it clear that the Arlington school board is responsible for making pupil assignments.

Objections to the school board assignments, made by the June 22 deadline, must be filed in Federal court within seven days after the filing of the school board report, he said. He set July 7 as the date to hear any objections from the Negroes' attorneys.

Pupil Board Named

RICHMOND, June 17 (AP) Attorneys for Negro pupils seeking to gain admission to white schools here filed an amended and supplemental complaint yesterday naming the Virginia Pupil Placement Board as a third defendant.

The original complaint, filed in Federal District Court here last September, named the Richmond School Board and its Superintendent, H. I. Willet, as defendants.

Last month Judge Sterling Hutcheson ruled that the Placement Board should be made a party. The complaint asks a permanent injunction restraining the local school system from any action forbidding entry of Negro children to white schools because of color.

The Farmville Story

(Editor's Note: The author is a distinguished lawyer of Columbia, a Virginian by birth and a former president of the Richland County Bar Assn.)

Tall grass grows in all the public school yards in Prince Edward County, Virginia, and weeds and briars are springing up.

Those schools are as silent as a tomb and as empty as a last year's bird nest. No children enter them. The 1,600 white children who attended them last year are now going to school in churches in the community and the 1,700 colored children are not going to school anywhere.

What brought about this condition? Prince Edward County is in Southern Virginia and it is one of the counties the NAACP selected for forced mixed schools. It is the first county having nearly equal numbers of both races where the courts have forced the issue.

Federal Judge Sterling Hutchinson heard the case. He knew the conditions and ordered that the people have ten years before they would be forced but the Circuit Court of Appeals with a majority of outside judges who did not know local conditions overruled Judge Hutchinson, and the County Commissioners levied no school taxes so there was no money to run the schools and they are now closed.

THE CLOSED SCHOOLS cry out against the intolerance of those Americans who have no race problem in their communities and who are unwilling to believe that their fellow Americans who do have such a problem are doing their best to solve it. They also cry out against judges who are so foolish as to think they can by order of court, change human nature and wipe out a race problem.

What have the people of Prince Edward County done to deserve this fate? They taxed themselves to build those schools. The population of that county is about half colored and half white. The colored people have been paying about 15 per cent of the taxes and have received about 50 per cent of the benefits. They were all getting along all right until the NAACP came in and brought their law suits.

The people decided that if they can't run their own schools they will have no public schools so they closed them. They are violating no law because there are no public schools to go to. Everybody is equal. The 1,600 white children are going to school in churches and are being taught by white teachers. The 1,700 colored children are not going to school anywhere and the 70 colored teachers have no jobs.

The NAACP have not helped either the colored children or the colored teachers. In fact the white people tried to help the colored people arrange schools like the white schools, but the NAACP would have nothing to do with any schools unless they were mixed. No one wanted to close the schools but it all shows what happens in a community where there are large numbers of both races and you try to force mixing.

THE OFFENSE of the people of that county is that they want to protect their children. They know, as white people in the South know, that in sections where there are large populations of both races and where race tension and friction exist that colored children will not take discipline from white teachers and white children will not take discipline from colored teachers.

They know it is natural that if a colored child is disciplined by a white teacher or a white child by a colored teacher, the child feels that it is because of race. Southern white people look at the breakdown of discipline and the gang warfare in the great cities where mixed schools are being tried and they shudder to think what would happen to both white and colored children in their community with mixed schools.

NO RIGHT THINKING person wants to run down the race of any other person or make them feel inferior but different races differ and some are more controlled than others. I cite the following:

Mr. Carl Rowan, a Negro writer, in The Saturday Evening Post said that the national average of illigitimacy among Negroes is eight times as great as among whites.

Time Magazine (21 April, 1958) said:

"In 1551 United States Cities, according to F. B. I. tally for 1956, Negroes making up 10 per cent of the United States population accounted for about 30 per cent of all arrests and 60 per cent of the arrests for crime involving violence or threat, of bodily harm —m u r d e r, non-negligent manslaughter, rape, robbery and aggravated assault. In one city after another the figures where they are not hidden or suppressed by politicians reveal a shocking pattern."

William O. Walker, a spokesman for the Negro Press at its 1958 meeting said:

"The Negro must be made to realize that freedom is more than a bottle of whisky and an automobile."

The Rev. Martin Luther King told his people that they must act better if they hope to have white people associate with them.

Dr. Henderson, prominent Negro of Richmond, gave as one reason there is eight times as much illigitimacy among Negroes as among whites:

"Many Negro boys and girls do not want strongly enough to avoid production of illigitimate children."

WHAT DOES THE ABOVE have to do with segregation? St. Paul told the Corinthians 2,000 years ago: "Be not deceived, evil communications corrupt good manners. (Good morals in the revised edition). That is a truism that has guided people in all generations. If the NAACP tried to help their people to be more restrained and more worthy we could put more confidence in them.

The above is set out in no spirit of malice or hatred. C o l o r e d people just have not had time to acquire those habits of discipline which white people have only in part acquired after many hundreds of years, and where there are large numbers of each race present mixing hurts both and helps neither.

I KNOW MANY well intentioned ministers have tried to tell us our Christian duty is to mix. Surely it is not our Christian duty to subject our children, colored or white, to strife and hatred and contention.

How can anyone blame parents for wanting to protect their children?

THIS WRITER visited Farmville, the County seat of Prince Edward County. I say unhesitatingly that I never saw finer people with finer spirit. Not one word did they say against their colored neighbors and friends. They deplore the fact that the little colored children have no schools to go to and they tell how they have tried to get the colored parents to help in arranging schools but that the NAACP will not cooperate. They believe that mixed public schools are worse than no public schools.

These people explain that they are not willing to have the NAACP in New York run their schools and that liberty to them means the right to run their own schools and their own affairs. Old Patrick Henry who said "Give me liberty or give me death" lived in an adjoining county and the people of Prince Edward know what he was talking about.

HOW ARE the "independent" white schools now operating serving the people? One of the ladies working in the Central Office which organized these schools told me with pride of the sacrifices the white people have made; how in that little county they have subscribed over $100,000 in cash and even more in pledges; how they have turned out and made desks and gotten chairs and books and arranged s c h o o l rooms in churches. They have touched no dollar of tax or public money. They have not even taken the pupil allotment provided under Virginia law because they know the NAACP would use it against them to try to force mixing.

I asked what about the schooling of the children? "Mr. Herbert, it is little short of a miracle. Both children and parents no longer look upon education as something that comes as a matter of course. They know they must make a real effort. Parents help their children with their homework, and it is a matter of pride to have it properly done."

Space will not permit me to describe the people I met in Farmville. The Editor of the local paper, Mr. Barrye Wall, would do credit to any paper or any community. The day will come when the efforts of those people will be recognized and acclaimed by their country.

A CRY HAS GONE UP from the NAACP that the poor colored children are being denied schools. They had schools until the NAACP stepped in and they will have them again if the NAACP will leave them alone.

THERE SHOULD BE a lesson for colored people in South Carolina in what has happened at Farmville. It is that they have good schools and good teachers and their teachers have good jobs, just like the people at Farmville. If they let the NAACP destroy those schools it may be a long time before they get any more.

No money that went up North to the NAACP ever came back down South and it isn't apt to come.

There are more than 7,000 colored teachers in South Carolina. They are doing a good job and are well paid. It would be a tragedy if the more than 200,000 colored children have to grow up in ignorance. Colored people in Farmville thought it could not happen but it did and it can happen in South Carolina.

THERE SHOULD ALSO BE a lesson for white people in South Carolina. It is that we must not let our colored neighbors and friends feel they must look up North for help and friendship and kindness.

Governor Byrnes said we must give Negroes as good schools as whites and the people, without a murmer, voted a sales tax and bonded themselves for millions to do it. He said we must do it because it is right and the people followed him.

The fact that we have so far had no closed schools or any Little Rock in South Carolina is largely because of that Act. We must try to remember that Negroes have a race problem, just as well as we do, and they may be urged to do foolish things in order to be loyal to their race. We should all try to remember that a little kindness never hurt anyone and so we must try to see the other fellow's side.

THERE SHOULD BE a lesson for our great Nation in what has happened at Farmville. It is that we, in the South, have a great racial problem. Such problems have caused infinite strife throughout history and our fellow Americans should be willing to believe we are doing our best with it. They should cease to act as if we are different and worse people than themselves. They should be able to see that wherever different races in large numbers are present in the same communities, the problem becomes acute. It is made more difficult and more acute by outside interference.

ON A FAMOUS OCCASION Oliver Cromwell said to the Scotch Presbyterians "My brethren, in the name of Christ, I beseech you to think it possible ye may be mistaken."

Those who live in parts of our country where there is no acute race problem should ask themselves if it is possible they are making a mistake in condemning their fellow Americans in the South who do have such a problem. They should be able to see and know that the Communist party is backing the NAACP and both are riding the legacy of hate and prejudice left by the Civil War. Sir Winston Churchill said it took them 200 years to get over their Civil War in England. We have had only 100 years in our country since our Civil War and hate and prejudice are still burning.

THE COMMUNIST PARTY has made brilliant use of the segregation issue for their purposes. They know we in the South can't sacrifice our children so all they had to do was to use the NAACP to fan Negro hate in Northern cities and to tell the World the Negro is maltreated in the South and so they have blinded our country to the truth of our great problem. They have set race against race and section against section and so far our fellow Americans are unable to see it.

THE BEST THING that has ever been done for Negroes in South Carolina was done when the splendid schools were built for them. That was not done by order of any court or at the point of bayonets. It was done before the Warren decision, and because we, as American citizens, under the leadership of Governor Byrnes, said it is right and we must do it. Our fellow countrymen are making a terrible mistake and should leave us alone. Farmville and Prince Edward County are the best demonstrations so far of the trouble they cause.

Individual Court Ruling Due on 17 Negro Pupils

The Evening Star p. 1, 4-30-59

Washington D.C.

By DAN POOLE
Star Staff Writer

Federal Judge Albert V. Bryan yesterday said he will consider each of 17 Negro applications to predominantly white Alexandria schools on an individual basis and will report his findings as soon as possible.

He disagreed with attorneys for the students who maintained school officials should be required to present a new desegregation plan under which all children would be assigned to schools solely on the basis of geographic proximity to their homes.

The attorneys said the School Board should be held in contempt of court because it still is making assignments on the basis of race since every Negro applicant to a white school has been rejected and assigned to a Negro school. Those now in white schools entered under a Federal court order.

Howeevr, at the conclusion of a hearing on the citys' second major desegregation case yesterday, Judge Bryan said Alexandria now has an assignment plan under which a specific set of criteria is used, and that persons who object to the way it is applied must come into court for relief.

Burden on Plaintiffs

Judge Bryan added that the burden of proof is on the plaintiffs if they charge the criteria for pupil placement are applied unfairly. Such objections must be studied individually with personal treatment of each case, he said.

The judge said he sees no way in which the present procedure can be improved. At present, the school board makes assignments on the basis of academic achievement, intelligence, psychological and geographic factors.

"We come right back to the same process, and I don't know of any improvement other than a personal hearing of each individual case," Judge Bryan said. "That puts the burden on the court, but I don't see any escape from it."

Frank R. Reeves, an attorney for the plaintiffs, argued that public officials apparently still believe they have a right to maintain a segregated school system except when specific individuals complain and then go into court in an attempt to show they are qualified to be transfered to white schools.

Placement Act Cited

Attorneys for the school board maintained there was no need for a new desegregation plan for Alexandria since all assignments are made in accordance with the State Pupil Placement Act which has been held constitutional.

Attorney John Barton Phillips said, "These criteria were adopted in good faith and in an honest effort to do what we think is in the best interests of the individuals and of the schools."

During the two-day hearing, School Supt. T. C. Williams denied that race was a basis for rejecting the 17 students. He contended that the pupils' requests were given special consideration by the school board because their parents were the only ones who protested the placements.

He admitted that several of the students were denied assignments to white schools closer to their homes, but contended they were placed in Negro schools solely for academic and psychological reasons.

In Alexandria's first desegregation case last year, 14 other students applied for transfers. Judge Bryan ordered nine of them transferred to white schools and they entered last February. The other five have appealed the decision and are still seeking admission.

VIRGINIA

Pupil Board Told Policy Is Unlawful

U. S. Judge Demands Transfer Approvals In Norfolk Case

Courts even in Mississippi and South Carolina would not support the conduct of the Virginia Placement board in its handling cases of colored pupils seeking assignment under integrated conditions, Judge Walter E. Hoffman of Federal District court, declared in Norfolk on Thursday.

Presiding at a hearing on the case of four pupils who were recommended for assignment by the Norfolk School Board, Judge Hollman declared that the action and the policy of the state agency were unconstitutional.

(The Norfolk school board admitted the four, on order of Judge Hoffman, along with three others at the beginning of the school term. They still have not been enrolled formally.)

THE COURT stated that the board should immediately assign the four pupils "or else face the consequences," indicating that he would hold the members n contempt. --- --- Nov. 2 was set as a deadline for reconsideration of the case.

Judge Hoffman also said that in denying the application of every colored pupil seeking integration, the board was acting like a police court judge who tells a motorist coming into court: "You're guilty, but you have the right to appeal."

HE SAID that he will bar the school board from following Virginia law, which requires that transfer and enrollment applications be sent to the placement board before assignment, if the state agency does not change its policy.

The four pupils in the case on Thursday included Reginald A. Young, Patricia A. Turner, who entered previously white junior high schools in February, when 17 pupils were integrated. They were graduated in June and promoted to Maury and Norview high schools respectively along with their white classmates.

THE STATE board failed to act on their applications until four days before the opening of school — after Judge Hoffman had ordered the Norfolk school board to admit them.

The other two were Daphne Perimenter, now attending Suburban Park school, and Anita D. Mayer, now in Maury high, who were recommended by the school board for assignment to the schools for which they applied. The Norfolk school board turned down applications of 21 other applicants at that time and sent its recommendations to the state board in Richmond.

WHILE THE names of Miss Turner and Young also went to Richmond, the Norfolk board considered them as routine. It sent them along with the names of white pupils who were transferred upon promotion.

Following the policy they have followed since the placement board was set up in 1956, Beverly H. Randolph Jr. of Charles City; Hugh V. White, Suffolk county superintendent of schools, and Andrew W. Farley of Danville rejected all 23 applicants.

ALL OF THE placement board members testified on Thursday that they did not believe in integration. They said that they rejected all applications of colored pupils for integrated assignments because they wanted the pupils to file appeals and appear before them for questioning and psychiatric tests.

Judge Hollman read a portion of the Virginia law setting procedure for placement board members, and pointed out that in their zeal to keep the schools segregated, they violated state law by not notifying parents of their decisions and not informing them about the rules for appeals.

MR. WHITE, who protested that Spottswood W. Robinson of Richmond, counsel for the pupils on Thursday, insinuated that he showed little concern for the children's welfare, was questioned by Judge Hoffman.

The jurist drew a statement from Mr. White that health, safety, distance to school and other factors were important considerations when colored pupils sought transfers. He said that he would not accept the school board procedure in such cases.

JUDGE HOFFMAN then asked him why the board ordered colored pupils in Front Royal assigned to schools outside their county, with a ride of 55 miles and boarding and rooming away from home involved. Mr. White had no answer.

The superintendent and other state board members said that they could conceive assigning a colored pupil to a white school if he presented an "ideal case." They also said that they would approve integrated assignments if they were forced to do so.

NO COLORED pupil could ever be integrated if the placement board is permitted to continue its policy, Judge Hoffman said. He added that the Norfolk school board also does not want integration either, but it does not act like the state agency.

A. B. Scott, counsel for the placement board, said that he will appeal and did not contemplate further arguments in District Court. Judge Hoffman ordered Mr. Robinson to file briefs preparatory to argument and signing of an order.

Counsel with Mr. Robinson included Oliver W. Hill of Richmond, Victor J. Ashe and Joseph Jordan Jr., of Norfolk.

Appeals have been filed for all the pupils rejected by the Norfolk school board and sustained by Judge Hoffman before the term began.

Virginia co. bows to U. S. court

ROANOKE, Va. — "We'll do what we're ordered to do — as soon as then."

With this statement by school superintendent James Combs, Floyd County became the first southwest Virginia locality to desegregate.

U.S. Judge Roby C. Thompson, last Thursday, ordered the assignment of 13 colored children to previously all-white county schools. The assignments will be made this week with the children starting classes next Monday.

No indication had been made Saturday on whether local officials would carry through their threat to close the schools of the county. Earlier this year, they passed a "fund cut-off" ordinance which could close schools if integrated.

The 13 children involved previously attended Christianburg Institute in another county. They will be assigned to Floyd County schools closer to their homes.

ATLANTA, GA. beat a federal court's Dec. 1 deadline to come up with a plan to desegregate city schools.

Even with an involved, almost impossible plan to present, the school officials are seeking an extension of the deadline for presenting it.

The plan is to begin next September and provides, according to the school board, that "student assignment . . . shall be made . . . without regard to race or color."

The plan is also designed to affect 12th-graders only during its first year; 11th- and 12th-graders, the second, and so on.

SOME OF the provisions of the lengthy, involved set of rules and regulations are:

Transfer and assignment applications can be made only between June 1 and June 15; they must be notarized, typewritten or written in ink, and signed by both parents where possible.

Applications will be judged on some of the following grounds: availability of transportation; effect of admission of new pupils on established or proposed academic programs;

Also: the adequacy of the pupil's academic preparation; the scholastic aptitude and relative intelligence or mental energy of the pupil; the psychological qualification of the pupil for the type of teaching and associations involved;

Also: the possibility or threat of friction or disorder among pupils or others; the possibility of breaches of the peace or ill will or economic retaliation in the community;

Also: the home environment of the pupil; the maintenance or severance of established social and psychological relationships with other pupils and teachers;

Also: the morals, conduct, health and personal standards of the pupil and many, many others.

The order to produce a plan came from U.S. Judge Frank A. Hooper.

ALSO IN Atlanta, Dr. Frank Cunningham, president of Morris Brown College, predicted that the economic status of colored persons would not improve without increased educational activities.

He said: "We need in the first place to be cognizant of the fact that better preparation for work involves much more than formal equalization of educational opportunities.

"We must begin now preparing ourselves for unlimited jobs."

WILMINGTON, DEL. parents went to the Third U.S. Circuit Court in Philadelphia asking for the overthrow of a gradual desegregation plan in the state.

IN LITTLE ROCK, ARK., the state Supreme Court ruled that only two of the city's six school board members were subject to election this year.

They are B. Frank Mackey and Everett Tucker Jr. who must be voted back on the board. A movement, headed by Alice Glover, filed a suit to determine when the terms would expire.

Miss Glover is president of the Classroom Teachers Association.

The present board took office when the old, pro-segregation board resigned rather than integrate the schools as ordered. The new board then accomplished the integration of Central and Hall High Schools this year.

Also in Little Rock, Russell H. Matson Jr., vice president of the board, told the Women's Emergency Committee for Public Schools that:

"We must comply with the law."

Saying that integration could not be confined to the eight colored children now integrated in the city, he predicted:

"We will have to drop down to junior high and elementary grades as soon as the school system is running smoothly."

Little Rock's court-approved desegregation plan calls for all 12 grades to be desegregated by September, 1963.

school board refused to act on the request of three colored students to review their assignment to a school attended only by colored students.

The students applied for admission to Dollarway High School but were assigned to Townsend Park School. The board rejected their applications for transfer to Dollarway. The students filed exceptions to the rejection; the board has until Nov. 13 to answer.

The students are: James E. Warfield, 13; Corliss Smith, 12, and Earnestine Dove, 16.

The children had been ordered admitted to the school by a Federal district court. However, a federal appeals court overturned the order.

Attorney Louis L. Redding told the court that the grade-a-year program, to take 12 years, was not fast enough. The District Court in Wilmington approved the plan last July.

The state school board started the plan in September.

IN PENSACOLA, FLA., the county school board set Nov. 12 as the date to discuss the application of two colored children to a school attended only by white children.

They are: Karen R. Augustus, the daughter of Dr. Charles A. Augustus; and Coe M. Robinson, daughter of Mrs. Lillie M. Robinson. They seek admission to Oliver J. Seemes Grade School.

Both parents requested a public hearing on the question. The board had previously refused to admit the Augustus child. The state board of education would not review the action.

IN BIRMINGHAM, ALA., 58 colored persons signed a petition for integrated schools. The petition was first sent last week but the school board pointed out the names were typed on petition, not signed.

The petition asked that the board produce a desegregation plan by Dec. 1. School Superintendent Theo Wright said:

"I have sent a routine letter of acknowledgement to the woman who mailed the petitions, Mrs. Elizabeth Glover of Birmingham, telling her the petitions will be brought up at the next meeting of the school board which is scheduled for Nov. 20."

Negro Pupils Win Round In Virginia

FLOYD, Va. (UPI) — School officials announced Thursday under "duress of a federal court order" that they will admit 13 Negroes to two white high schools in Floyd County early next year.

But the county school superintendent, James H. Combs, hinted at possible closing of schools in the mountain-dotted county by cutting off funds to them under Virginia's co-called "freedom of choice" plan.

The 13 Negro students would be the first of their race to enter white schools in southwest Virginia, where the Negro population is sparse.

1,800 Virginia Pupils Use Tuition Grants

RICHMOND, Nov. 14 (AP). — More than 1,800 Virginia children are attending private schools or public schools outside their own localities this year on tax-supported pupil scholarships, a survey showed today.

The pupil scholarship program set up by the legislature provides for tuition grants of up to $250 a year for any student who chooses to attend a private, nonsectarian school or a public school other than the one he normally would attend.

The State and the localities pay percentage shares of the scholarships, which are part of Virginia's "freedom of choice" program to cope with school desegregation.

A survey of 38 cities and counties by the Associated Press and Richmond News Leader—including the five localities where integration actually has taken place—shows that 1,820 applications for pupil scholarships have been approved. Of this number, 1,524 pupils are enrolled in private schools and 296 in public schools outside their own county or city.

List Incomplete

While the list is far from complete—there are 98 counties and 31 cities in Virginia — it does give an indication of the extent to which the pupil scholarships are being used.

The five integrated localities report large numbers of pupils seeking scholarships, although in many instances the pupils using grants would not have to attend integrated public schools. Warren County, for example, has approved scholarships for 483 pupils. Other integrated areas reported these figures on the number of approved scholarships: Alexandria, 32; Arlington, 79; Charlottesville, 464, and Norfolk, 225.

In Norfolk, 185 of the 225 grants approved were for pupils attending Tidewater Academy, a private school set up as a result of integration, a school official said.

County Figures

Of the 464 grants approved in Charlottesville, 459 are for private schools. The bulk of those for private schools are for attendance at schools operated by the Charlottesville Educational Foundation. The CEF schools were set up for pupils who declined to attend integrated schools.

In Warren County, 424 of the 483 grants approved were for students attending the Mosby Academy, also established for pupils who refused to go to mixed schools.

A spokesman in Arlington said all 79 of the grants approved there were for pupils attending private schools, primarily the Congressional and Flint Hill Schools.

In Alexandria, a school spokesman said 32 grants had been approved. About 30 more are expected to be approved next month. Only about a half dozen involve pupils who were in the Alexandria public schools last year. The grants are available to any student eligible to attend the public schools whether he was actually enrolled in the public schools last year or not.

Scholarships approved in counties where integration has not occurred include: Fairfax, 263; Albemarle, 53; Alleghany County, 46; Bedford, 30; Henrico, 18; Campbell, 17; Greene, 12, and Henry, 31.

Three Bases

The actual amount of the scholarship is decided on one of three bases, whichever produces the lowest amount:

1. The amount of the tuition at the private or the public school.

2. The total cost of operation per pupil in average daily attendance in the public schools for the locality making the grant as determined from the 1958-59 school year.

3. Two hundred fifty dollars.

The funds are paid by the locality from which the pupil comes, in two equal installments, the first as soon as practicable after the submission of evidence of enrollment and entrance in a private, nonsectarian or a public school outside the pupil's home community and the other at the end of the fifth month of the school term.

The State will reimburse the locality later for its share of the payment.

Makeshift Classes Fall Short

Sentiment Grows For Return To Public School System

By THOMAS L. DABNEY

FARMVILLE, Va. — There are signs in Prince Edward county that the residents are weakening in the old massive resistance to school desegregation. White parents and pupils are finding out by the hard way that makeshift private schools are poor substitutes for public schools.

Some white parents and some pupils are disappointed over the turn of events in the county. Here are some of the reasons for the disappointment: In one case, for example, white children have to go two blocks to the bathroom. In bad weather this will be a handicap. In all of the makeshift schools there is an appalling lack of facilities for classroom work, and much of the equipment is not suitable for first class teaching.

SO FAR white ministers in the county have kept relatively quiet on the school situation, but some laymen are quietly working behind the scenes to build up sentiment for opening the public schools next fall. One prominent resident of the county told the Journal and Guide last week that he thinks the schools will be opened next September.

Disappointed white parents are working quietly to build up support for opening the public schools next year. Through bitter experience they have found out that private schools under adverse circumstances do not appeal to the best teachers or pupils. They have found out that neither the teenagers nor the children can do good work under confusion and uncertainty.

IT IS RELIABLY reported that some white children are admitting that they are not satisfied with conditions in the private schools. One white boy recently told a colored boy in his neighborhood that he was not satisfied with his makeshift private school, and said he would rather be in a public school with colored children.

Both races are suffering because the public schools in the county are closed. The Prince Edward County Christian Association, headed by the Rev. Leslie F. Griffin is working in the hope of getting the public schools open for next school year. The organization is also raising money to assist 175 children who had to leave the county to secure a high school education. Fifty-nine of these students are attending Kittrell College at Kittrell, N. C. Some of the students are attending schools out of the county while living with relatives.

It is certain more white parents will be fed up with conditions in the county under the defunct massive resistance program. More parents will join the public school supporters, and the new movement for the opening of the public schools will surely win more support before the current school year closes.

Virginia County "Bites Off Its Nose To Spite Its Face" In Fighting Against What Is Law of the Land—Children Forced To Walk Three Blocks To Use Rest Rooms; Whites Attending Makeshift Private Schools

Petersburg, Va.—Perhaps Americans across our broad country are unaware of what is NOT going on in Prince Edward County, Virginia, site of one of the cases involved in the original 1954 Supreme Court decision outlawing school segregtion.

All public schools, white and Negro, have been closed with the result that 1700 Negro children are school-less. All free public education has ceased. The County Board of Supervisors shed responsibility in June by suspending all funds for public education under a proviso of the Perrow Commission recommendations.

The majority of white children are being trained haphazardly in a private school setup financed by a die-hard segregationist foundation. Classes are held in churches, lodge halls, stores, etc. In some instances, the kids must walk two and three blocks to restroom facilities. it is known from reliable sources that enough cash has been raisede to sustain this makeshift schooling for barely a year.

Meanwhile 1700 Negro children remain school-less—with the exception of some 50 juniors and seniors who are attending Kittrell Junior college in North Carolina or other schools outside the state. In addition, auxiliary arrangements for some schooling has been made under the leadership of Rev. L. Francis Griffin. This is financed by free-will offerings from organizations and churches in and out of the state. Among the totally school-less children, the older ones are teaching the young.

The shocking fact about the situation is that 1700 children are denied the right of public education and the consciences of the people of Prince Edward County rest easy. When the Board of Supervisors closed the schools, not a single person in the white community voiced any protest: not a minister, doctor, lawyer, educator —not a man or woman. With the loss of teachers' income and the prospective migration of families, the economy of this agricultural county is in serious jeopardy—not to speak of the blow to free education in a state that hanks 43rd in the nation.

Today there is talk in many circles of the need for a second Pilgrimage of Prayer for Public Schools. It was discussed at length at the fall conference of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

Last New Year's Day, the eyes of the nation and of the world were focused on 2,000 Virginians who braved the cold and rain to converge on the state Capitol and protest the school closings.

In many quarters it is felt that this Pilgrimage, mobilized by CORE with aid of the Virginia NAACP, helped bring about final collapse of Virginia's "massive resistance" program. With the total shutdown of schools in Prince Edward County, it would seem that Virginia does need another Pilgrimage.

Judge Asked to Order Transfer of 7 Negroes

By John Lawson
Staff Reporter

Alexandria Federal Judge Albert V. Bryan took under advisement yesterday a request by Negro attorneys that he order immediate admission of seven Negro children to two recently desegregated schools in Arlington.

Attorneys Frank D. Reeves and Otto L. Tucker asked that the order be issued because the Arlington School Board had not opposed admission of the children.

The seven are among 16 who applied to predominantly white schools and were rejected by the State Pupil Placement Board. The School Board also rejected nine of them but took no action on six who applied to Stratford Junior High and one who applied to Patrick Henry Elementary School.

Fairfax Case Discussed

"Tacitly at least," said Reeves, "the School Board has acknowledged that these seven children are eligible."

School Board attorney James H. Simmonds argued that although the Board had not rejected the applications, it could not admit the children since authority for placement is vested in the Pupil Placement Board.

"The School Board can do no more than state its decision," he said. "We cannot legally . . . take action contrary to the Placement Board."

Also yesterday, Judge Bryan held a pre-trial conference with attorneys on the application of 26 Negro children to enter eight white schools in Fairfax County.

The conference was attended by Virginia Attorney General Albertis S. Harrison, Assistant Attorney General Robert D. McIlwaine, Simmonds and John C. Wood, attorneys for the School Board, and Reeves and Tucker, representing the children.

All declined to comment on what was discussed in the meeting.

Reeves said afterwards, however, that he would file a motion today requesting the School Board to produce school records and to answer a number of questions of fact.

Private Schools Open

In other developments yesterday, private segregated schooling for white students opened on a full-time basis in Prince Edward County and in the city of Charlottesville.

In Prince Edward County a segregationist group has set up schools for 1500 white students but no educational provision has been made for the 1700 Negro children left without schooling when the county abandoned its public school system.

In Charlottesville 187 white students attended a segregationist-sponsored elementary school. Another 444 students are attending the desegregated Venable public elementary school there. A segregationist high school, which has registered 345 students, will open next week in Charlottesville. About 730 students are attending the desegregated Lane public high school there.

18 Pupils Want To Enter School In Home County

PULASKI, Va. — (UPI) — Pulaski County School Superintendent Frank J. Critzer disclosed Thursday that 18 colored children have applied for enrollment in the county's only public high school effective with the start of the second semester next January.

The southwest Virginia county has no "colored" high school. Its 122 colored high school students attend Christiansburg institute in neighboring Montgomery county.

CRITZER SAID the children, representing 13 families, asked for assignment on forms prescribed by the state's Pupil Placement Board. The board, whose function was being questioned by the federal courts at Norfolk Thursday, is charged with assigning students to schools throughout the state. Its next scheduled meeting is Nov. 5.

Critzer added that the applications were received Tuesday from Attorney Reuben E. Lawson of Roanoke. A covering letter asked the school board to take action on applications so that the students could be admitted to the school in January.

18 Negroes Ask Transfer In Pulaski

The Courier Post

Fri. 10-23-59

PULASKI, Va., Oct. 23 (AP). —Eighteen Pulaski County Negro children now attending Christiansburg Institute have applied for admission to all-white Pulaski High School, one of two in the county.

County School Supt. Frank J. Critzer said yesterday the applications, made on regular State Pupil Placement Board forms, were received in his office Tuesday.

They will be taken up by the Pulaski County school board, which will have to get "certain information," he said. Then they will be submitted to the placement board.

Admission was requested at the beginning of the second semester. All 18 live in and around Pulaski, Mr. Critzer said. They come from 13 families.

About six years ago a number of students from six Negro families instituted suit in Pulaski for admittance to Pulaski High. The county does not operate a Negro high school. The other is at Dublin.

The action was dropped, however, when one of the primary plaintiffs died.

In previous school-mixing actions in southwestern Virginia counties, Negroes to Galax High School were denied.

Pleas for Admission of a Galax Negro and six County Negroes to Grayson County High School were ordered in their communities at the beginning of the next semester.

The order was handed down September 10 by Judge Roby C. Thompson after hearings before him in United States District Court in Roanoke.

PULASKI, Va. — (UPI) — Pulaski County School Superintendent Frank J. Critzer disclosed Thursday that 18 colored children have applied for enrolment in the county's only public high school effective with the start of the second semester next January.

The southwest Virginia county has no "colored" high school. Its 122 colored high school students attend Christiansburg institute in neighboring Montgomery county.

CRITZER SAID the children, representing 13 families, asked for assignment on forms prescribed by the state's Pupil Placement Board. The board, whose function was being questioned by the federal courts at Norfolk Thursday, is charged with assigning students to schools throughout the state. Its next scheduled meeting is Nov. 5.

Critzer added that the applications were received Tuesday from Attorney Reuben E. Lawson of Roanoke. A covering letter asked the school board to take action on applications so that the students could be admitted to the school in January.

18 Negroes Ask Transfer In Pulaski

The Evening Star
Washington, D.C.
Fri. 10-23-59

PULASKI, Va., Oct. 23 (AP). —Eighteen Pulaski County Negro children now attending Christiansburg Institute have applied for admission to all-white Pulaski High School, one of two in the county.

County School Supt. Frank J. Critzer said yesterday the applications, made on regular State Pupil Placement Board forms, were received in his office Tuesday.

They will be taken up by the Pulaski County school board, which will have to get "certain information," he said. Then they will be submitted to the placement board.

Admission was requested at the beginning of the second semester. All 18 live in and around Pulaski. Mr. Critzer said. They come from 13 families.

About six years ago a number of students from six Negro families instituted suit in Pulaski for admittance to Pulaski High. The county does not operate a Negro high school. The other white high school is at Dublin.

The action was dropped, however, when one of the primary plaintiffs died.

In previous school-mixing actions in southwestern Virginia counties, Negroes have been denied admission to white schools in their communities at the beginning of the next semester.

The order was handed down September 10 by Judge Roby C. Thompson after hearings before him in United States District Court in Roanoke.

"Massive Resistance" Seen Cracking In Prince Edward

FARMVILLE, Va. — (ANP) — "Massive resistance to school desegregation is cracking in Prince Edward county, according to reports from leaders who are keeping developments relative to the supreme court school decision of May 17, 1954.

Prince Edward county was one of five cases which were argued before the high tribunal, that resulted in the historic decision. Rather than obey the order of May 17, 1955, Prince Edward decided to dump the public school system.

As a result, more than 3,800 children of both races have been without any public schools this year. About 69 Negro children are attending high school at Kittrell college, Kittrell, N. C. Other children are attending school with relatives in other localities in the state and elsewhere.

A few white parents are quietly encouraging sentiment in the county in favor of opening the school against next September. The dyed-in-the-wool segregationists have learned that makeshift private schools in churches, halls and shops won't work. Neither the parents nor the white children in many instances are satisfied with the makeshift arrangements.

Meanwhile, Negroes in the county are working to gain support for the opening of the schools in the fall on an integrated basis. Most of the effort is being sponsored by the recently organized Prince Edward County Christian association, headed by the Rev. L. Francis Griffin, pastor, First Baptist church, Farmville.

White children are unhappy about the situation, and one white youth told his Negro neighbor that he was dissapointed with the makeshift and would return to the public schools, even if he had to put up with Negro students.

Prince Edward Again Refuses School Funds

FARMVILLE, Va., Nov. 18.—Prince Edward county supervisors again have refused to provide money to maintain the county's closed schools' buildings. Moreover, they turned down a plea for money to pay county's share of school officials' salaries. Both pleas were made by school officials.

The school buildings were closed last summer when local officials refused to integrate classes in the face of a Federal court order.

An earlier request for funds from the county school board was turned down in August.

County school buildings have been largely untended since the public funds were withdrawn. A local firm donated money to protect them against the ravages of cold weather.

White pupils are attending private schools set up in other facilities. There are no private schools for Negroes.

Assignment Set For 13 After Suit

Will Enter Schools Jan. 25 At Opening Of Second Semester

ROANOKE — Thirteen of Floyd county's colored pupils, all of whom have been forced to ride long distances outside the county for their training, will be assigned to Floyd schools for the next semester, James H. Combs, superintendent, said on Thursday.

The pupils will get the assignments as the result of a U. S. District court suit filed here. Integration on Jan. 25 will give them the first opportunity to obtain training in their home county, which has no colored schools.

MR. COMBS said that the assignments were being made because Judge Roby C. Thompson ordered them on Sept. 10. He declined to name the schools listed for integration because he felt the parents should have that informatiin first.

Fourteen children were included when the suit was begun earlier this year, but the court's final order includes only 13 because one child's application for a transfer was not filled out properly, the superintendent stated.

IT IS NOT known whether the Floyd school board will list its assignments as recommendations and pass them on to the state pupil placement board.

This agency turned down all applications providing for integrated assignment until recently, when it assigned four Norfolk students. At that time the placement board faced a threat of contempt of court.

Integration Dodge May Halt Funds

Board Will Admit 13; Supervisors Called Controlling Factor

FLOYD, Va. — (UPI) — Floyd county will comply with a federal court desegregation order and admit 13 colored students to previously all-white high schools in January, the school superintendent has announced.

But superintendent J. H. Combs, announcing the decision two days before a court-imposed deadline, hinted at a possible school closing.

HE SAID THE decision did not prohibit the county board of supervisors from "regulating the funds and appropriations" to operate the schools.

This appeared to be a reference to Virginia's so-called "freedom of choice" plan under which school funds could be cut off in the county. This happened in Prince Edward county where 21 public schools were closed rather than comply with a federal court integration order.

MR. COMBS SAID THE school board was complying with an order issued last Sept. 23 by Federal District Judge Roby C. Thompson to admit the 13 students, nine to the Floyd County High school here and four to Check High.

If the students are enrolled, it would mark the first school desegregation in Southwest Virginia.

"The school board acted under duress of the federal court order and with full knowledge that the failure to comply with this order would result in an immediate citation for contempt of court," Mr. Combs announced.

P-TA Urges Opening Of Prince Edward Schools

Norfolk, Va. P. 1.

Sat 1-28-59.

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. — The Virginia Congress of Colored Parents and Teachers unanimously adopted a resolution on the closing day of its session here last week asking the members to petition their representatives in the General Assembly to "legislate for the opening of schools in Prince Edward, and for the continuance of public schools throughout the Commonwealth of Virginia."

It also went on record as endorsing "the state-wide compulsory attendance law." The compulsory attendance law was repealed by the legislature to make it legal to close public schools to prevent compliance with the Supreme Court's desegregation decision.

PRINCE EDWARD county is not operating public schools this year. The county's board of supervisors, rather than allow any white and colored children to attend schools together, cut off funds to the schools. Only the localities which favor compulsory school attendance have such a law.

Another resolution adopted at the final meeting of the organization said although there has been some progress in some Virginia areas toward desegregation, "it is not commensurate with the length of time the (U. S. Supreme Court) ruling has been in effect."

THE ORGANIZATION called on Governor J. Lindsay Almond Jr. to "exercise his powers of office to step up the desegregation of schools" throughout Virginia.

Ira J. Womack of Roanoke was elected president of the organization just before the session ended which attracted about 350 delegates. Other officers elected were Mrs. Walter A. Walker, Hampton, first vice president; Herman Hill, Petersburg, second vice president; Mrs. Jean Hale, Roanoke, secretary; Mrs. Yvette B. Ridley, Petersburg, treasurer, and Mrs. Agatha Lewis, Roanoke, historian.

Boothe Concedes Threat To Private School Plan

Sunday Star Washington, D.C. Sun. 6-28-59

Airs His Views With Beverley On Education

Private schools that use tax-supported scholarships cannot expect to maintain segregation, a Virginia lawmaker who voted for the State's new school program conceded yesterday.

The admission came from State Senator Armistead Boothe of Alexandria during a television interview.

In reply to another question, Senator Boothe conceded that the closing of public schools anywhere—such as is contemplated in Prince Edward County—might jeopardize the entire State public school system.

"Of course, that is a danger," he said, "and it is a danger that I feel sure Gov. Almond feels."

He declared that another danger is Federal interference if the State backs out of the school business.

Senator Boothe was a supporter of Gov. Almond's Perrow Plan, which Virginia adopted by a narrow margin at a recent session of the General Assembly. Scholarships for children who choose to attend private schools are a major feature of the plan.

Marshall J. Beverley, who is running against Senator Boothe in the Democratic primary, reiterated his opposition of the Perrow Plan and again called for a three-school system—one integrated, one white and one Negro.

Hot Campaign

Senator Boothe and Mr. Beverley are waging the State's hottest election campaign in a contest that is being fought over school integration. Senator Boothe is a supporter of the Governor's school plan, and Mr. Beverley is running as a massive resistance segregationist.

The two candidates were interviewed on the WTOP program, City Side.

Asked if he thought private schools could remain segregated if they used the scholarships provided by the Perrow Plan, Senator Boothe replied:

"I do not. I feel that public money will make public schools."

He noted that the Virginia Association of Private Schools recently expressed similar fears.

Senator Boothe was asked if State leaders are not kidding the people by allowing them to believe the scholarships will offer a way of maintaining segregation.

Says Answer Is Yes

"I think a perfectly honest answer would be yes. I'm afraid we are to a certain extent and another thing I feel, I think tuition grants are unconstitutional because they are only for children who go to non-sectarian schools and under the United States Constitution I don't think that is legal," Senator Boothe responded.

He added:

"But having been in Richmond for these five very dark and crucial years I find that it is necessary to do anything to convince the people that we are taking every possible step—No. 1, to keep the schools open and, No. 2, to keep them as segregated as possible under the law."

Senator Boothe described himself as a segregationist, stating that "rightly or wrongly, I have favored segregation of schools in Virginia."

He said his past pleas for a racial study commission and other actions which his opponent has called "integrationist moves" were intended as "constructive steps" to keep the Federal Government from meddling in State affairs.

Senator Boothe was reminded that he opposed a constitutional amendment in 1955 to permit payment of tuition grants and now was a supporter of the Perrow Plan which provides them. He was asked if he had changed his position.

He acknowledged that he had changed "to an extent." He said once the people voted two to one in favor of amending the constitution, he supported legislation to carry out their wishes by voting for tuition grants — or scholarships, which is the name they are given in the Perrow Plan.

Mr. Beverley was asked if he had changed his position, since he supported massive resistance which closed schools in Virginia and now insists he favors open schools.

"I supported the State policy against integration and I am now against integration but I am fighting to keep our schools open and I will continue to fight as long as I can."

State Board Overruled On Negroes

HARRISONBURG, Va., Sept. 5 (AP)—Federal Judge John Paul overrode the state Pupil Placement Board here Saturday and ordered the Charlottesville School Board to admit 12 Negroes to two white schools next Tuesday.

The school board previously had assigned the Negroes to white schools—nine of them on specific orders of Judge Paul—but was directed by the placement board earlier this week to assign them all to Negro schools.

"THIS COURT and certainly the Circuit Court of Appeals are not going to tolerate for a minute the notion that they're going to be overridden by a letter from the Pupil Placement Board," Judge Paul declared.

Farmville, Charlottesville Start Classes In Private Schools

News & Courier Charleston, S.C. Sun. 9-6-59

FARMVILLE, Va. (AP) — The first day of classes began with a minimum of opening day problems Monday in a system of private schools for white students in Prince Edward County.

Roy B. Pearson, administrator of the Prince Edward School Foundation, estimated Monday's enrollment would be "nearly all of the 1,500 pupils who registered in advance."

The foundation is operating the schools for the county's white students. No provision has been made for the estimated 1,750 Negro school-age children in the county.

County officials announced last spring they would close public schools rather than see them integrated. Prince Edward is under a federal court integration order.

At Prince Edward Academy—the foundation's high school here—students went through the schedule of five 30-minute class periods. Classes were held in churches and other private buildings.

"I don't think there's any doubt we'll have an excellent year in the private schools," Pearson said.

At Charlottesville, a similar organization established because of integration in the city's white schools began elementary classes Monday.

One hundred and eighty-seven white children settled down to classes in two six-room buildings.

Most of the children attending the private classes at the Robert E. Lee Elementary School are from the public Venable Elementary School which opened last week with nine Negro children attending along with 435 white children.

Some 345 white students registered for the private Rock Hill Academy will begin high school classes one week from Monday.

The public Lane High School began its second week of integration with three Negroes enrolled with about 730 white students.

Arlington Asks School Board Nominees

Board Seeks Three With 'Firm Belief' In Public Education

By John Lawson
Staff Reporter

The Arlington County Board asked civic groups yesterday to submit names of candidates for three seats on the School Board but stressed that each candidate must have a "firm belief in public education."

The Board voted unanimously to request that organizations propose names for appointment to the School Board for terms beginning Jan. 1.

The Board's list of qualifications included the provision that candidates must have "a firm belief in public education and the responsibility of the community to provide for the public education of its children."

The move was interpreted as a slap at proponents of private segregated schools, such as those set up in Charlottesville, Norfolk and Front Royal.

Those communities, like Arlington, have within the past year desegregated many of their public schools.

Mrs. Lane Opposed

The Board is expected to set up a committee later in the year which will study the qualifications and background of candidates for the three seats.

The seats are now held by James G. Stockard, Barnard Joy and Helen S. Lane. Board members have indicated that they would oppose reappointment of Mrs. Lane.

In other action, the Board put off consideration of a new parking ordinance which would require one parking space for every 75 square feet of retail floor area.

The Board postponed a public hearing on the ordinance to Jan. 16 after it was opposed by James M. Berkey, president of the Chamber of Commerce, as "largely theoretical" and "confiscatory."

Planning Director Tom Moore said the requirement compared with one space for 100 square feet of floor area in Fairfax.

The Board told Moore to consult with representatives of business organiations and report to the Board on Jan. 16.

The new ordinance, Moore said, would require a store the size of the Hecht Co. outlet in Arlington to provide 4700 parking spaces. The store now has 2500. Kann's would need 2400, he said, compared to the 1000 now provided.

Shopping Center Opposed

The Board rejected a portion of a commercial study which would have provided for a $15 million shopping center near the corner of N. Glebe rd. and Old Dominion dr.

Planning Consultant George C. Smith told the Board the study would eliminate much blighted commercial development in the area and consolidate it in the shopping center.

The Board agreed to the elimination of much commercial zoning along the highway but rejected the shopping center after almost 50 residents of the area strongly opposed it.

The Board continued its public hearing on its new sign ordinance until Oct. 10. Board members directed Moore to meet with representatives of the sign industry and others affected and report his findings to the Board.

7 Negroes Win Transfer In Arlington

Federal Judge Albert V. Bryan of Alexandria yesterday ordered seven additional Negro students admitted immediately to already desegregated schools in Arlington.

Six of the students will go to Stratford Junior High School where 11 Negroes already are attending. The other students will join one Negro already attending Patrick Henry Elementary School.

Judge Bryan also ordered that a hearing be set later to determine whether nine more applicants to predominantly white schools are qualified for transfers. He noted that those students should attend the Negro schools to which they have been assigned pending action.

Admitted to Stratford under the latest order are Oliver Brown, jr.; Jacqueline Faggins, Brenda Faggins, Joyce Battle, Bernard C. Hamm and Dolores Spinner. Sheila Roberta Eldridge will go to Patrick Henry.

The Arlington School Board did not oppose the transfer of the seven Negroes, although they had been rejected by the State Pupil Placement Board. The school board did, however, oppose transfer of the other nine students.

With the additional students, 23 Negroes now will be attending 3 formerly all-white schools —17 at Stratford, 4 at Washington-Lee High School and 2 at Patrick Henry.

Oriental Bias Hit Teacher, Paper Claims

Associated Press.

ARLINGTON, Va., July 28. —The Northern Virginia Sun says the school board in neighboring Falls Church, Va., has refused on racial grounds to hire a Japanese-American woman teacher.

The Sun said yesterday it learned the board, at a closed session, "put aside the teacher application of Mrs. Yukiko Tamashiro after a debate devoted almost exclusively to her racial background." The Sun identified Mrs. Tamasiro as a third generation American citizen born in Hawaii.

The Sun went on to say:

"Board members raised almost no questions as to her professional qualifications.

"She was considered professionally qualified by Superintendent Irvin Schmitt and the principal of the elementary school to which she was applying had expresed enthusiasm over the prospects of Mrs. Tamashiro joining the school's staff."

Other details from the Sun story:

Mrs. Tamashiro had applied for a seventh grade teaching position after moving to Falls Church last February.

She has a bachelor's degree in history from Wheaton College, Ill., a master's degree in education from the same school, and has done graduate work at New York University.

She taught at Middltown High School in Middletown, N. Y., for two years.

Mrs. Tamashiro has since been hhired to teach eighth grade at Green Hedges, a private school in nearby Vienna, Va.

"We Mean Business"

Residents Of Prince Edward County Resolute In Fight Against Integration

Miss. Courier
Charleston, S.C.

FARMVILLE, Va. (AP)—Here in the pine and tobacco country where the Confederacy finally collapsed and died 94 years ago, a resolute band of Southerners has raised a new banner of defiance.

"We are determined, absolutely determined, to maintain our way of life," says B. Blanton Hanbury. "We are not going to integrate our schools. We mean business."

Hanbury is president of the Prince Edward School Foundation, which last week opened a countrywide system of eight private schools for 1,500 white children. The county abolished public education last June and padlocked its schools. More than 1,700 Negro children are left with no schools to attend.

Only 14 miles from the county line is Appomattox Court House, where Gen. Robert E. Lee surrendered the Confederate Army of Northern Virginia to Gen. U. S. Grant on April 9, 1865.

Although it may not be accurate to say that the white people of Prince Edward County are still fighting the Civil War, it is a fact that for most of them their roots here go back for many generations.

The men who set up the school foundation four years ago make no bones of their claim that they are fighting their battle for the entire Southland.

Roy B. Pearson, school administrator for the foundation, told 450 high school students last Thursday: "If you have a successful year, the hopes of hundreds of thousands of people will be kindled."

E. Louis Dahl, foundation treasurer, said cash donations have come in from all over the South because "they think we are fighting their fight."

Mayor W. F. Watkins Jr., told the students: "This is a memorable occasion for all of us. An important day to all the people of the nation."

Virginia, these men will tell you, has had many sons who were not afraid to take a stand—Thomas Jefferson, Patrick Henry, the revered Robert E. Lee, among others.

Although Jim Crow laws as such date back only about 60 years, some forms of discrimination against the Negro in Virginia are more than 300 years old.

Slavery was introduced into the colony in 1619. A decree establishing a Virginia militia in 1640 specifically barred Negroes from the right to be armed. In 1643 it was decreed that all Negro women servants from age 16 should be included in a list of taxable property.

Although legal discrimination against the Negro is slowly being knocked down in the South, social discrimination may be growing.

Dr. Francis Butler Simkins, head of the history department at Longwood College here, said in an interview: "Segregation has increased in the South in recent years, despite the acceptance in some places of what is called 'token integration.' When I was a child in South Carolina, it was quite common for white and Negro children to play together. You never see that now."

Simkins, who has lived here for most of the past 30 years, said he thought it was wrong for the county board of supervisors to abolish public education last June.

"I don't believe any Negro child in this county would have applied for admission to a white school, regardless of what the courts might say about their right to do so," he said. "Why, the parents of such a child would be considered lepers, or even worse."

J. B. Wall, editor of the Farmville Herald, told newsmen last week that "99 per cent of the people of Prince Edward County are behind our decision to close the public schools rather than integrate."

He forgot or ignored that 48 per cent of the county's population is Negro.

Against this background of history, tradition and personal feeling, the men behind the private school foundation have drawn up their line of battle. They feel they have barred every door through which the federal courts could enter. They are certain they have enough money for this year, and that they'll get enough to keep their plan in operation as long as necessary.

Hanbury fully expects the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People to bring suit to force the county to reopen its public schools.

He adds that something will have to be done to help educate the county's Negro children—so long as that something doesn't mean integrated public schools, nor any action by the foundation that would lay it open to federal court action.

The foundation is chartered as a nonpolitical and nonprofit organization, organized for the sole purpose of operating a private school system throughout Prince Edward County.

Nowhere in the charter, nor in any other foundation document, is there a single reference to race.

Hanbury was asked at a luncheon what would happen if a Negro pupil asked for admittance to one of the foundation's private schools. He was so startled that he almost dropped his coffee cup.

"Why," he replied, "we'd send him to the nearest insane asylum, just as you would if he wanted to come into your home."

Hanbury insists the foundation members are not die-hard segregationists.

"That term implies that we're dying—and we're not," he said.

"We're going to keep this thing alive. The real die-hards are those in the small minority here who are opposed to segregation. They're dead, and don't know it."

Denies Applications To Va. White Schools

Defender Chicago, Ill.
Sat 8-15-59

RICHMOND, Va. — (U.P.I) — Virginia's state pupil placement board rejected or referred action Monday on a long list of applications by Negro students for transfer to white schools this fall.

Two applications turned down by the state board were for transfer of two Negro students to white schools at Norfolk, Va. The Norfolk school board asked expressly that they be allowed to enter the schools.

In neighboring North Carolina, the school board at Chapel Hill turned down a Negro student's request for transfer to a white school but paved the way for beginning of limited integration in Chapel Hill in 1960-61. The Greene County, N. C., school board deferred action until Aug. 14, on proposed assignment of five Negro students to a white school.

One member of the Chapel Hill board, Dean Henry Brandis of the University of North Carolina law school, resigned from the board because of its refusal to assign a Negro student to an all-white school.

And in Nashville, Tenn., where the first two grades of elementary schools already have been integrated, school Superintendent W. H. Oliver criticized the National Association for the Advancement of colored People for pushing for "complete integration" of the first three grades.

Virgina's three-man state placement board deferred action on 21 other Negro applications submitted by the Norfolk board, denied 13 applications from Floyd county and denied or deferred applications from Negro stuents seeking admission to white schools in Charlottesville, Fairfax county, Staunton and Lynchburg.

The Chapel Hill, N. C., board adopted a statement of policy which board member Mrs. Marvin Allen said is designed to try limited integration at the first grade level in the 1960-61 school year.

Under the gradual integration plan now in operation at Nashvil,el Tenn., 10 of 115 eligible Negro children entered previously all-white schools in 1957. Last year 34 of 230 eligible Negro first and second graders entered integrated schools. This year about 300 are eligible, and the third grade will be integrated.

Superintendent Oliver said the NAACP has enlisted high school students to urge Negro parents to enroll all eligible children in integrated schools.

Tardy Bids to Halt Desegregation Fail In 2 Virginia Areas

East Washington, D. C.
Sunday 9-6-54 p. 17.

Admit Negroes, Charlottesville, Warren Told

Last-ditch attempts to thwart school desegregation next Tuesday in Charlottesville and Warren County crumbled yesterday.

Federal Judge John Paul ordered Charlottesville school officials to enroll 12 Negro children in two white schools despite a contrary order from Virginia's Pupil Placement Board.

He branded the board's assignment of the Negroes to a segregated Negro school as "plainly unconstitutional" and in "direct violation" of the Supreme Court's 1954 decree.

"This court and certainly the Circuit Court of Appeals is not going to tolerate for a minute the notion that they're going to be overridden by a letter from the Pupil Placement Board," the judge said.

Fails to Appear

Warren County's school board, meanwhile, lost its last chance to block admission of 18 Negro students in Warren County High School when it failed to appear before Judge Paul yesterday with a desegregation plan.

Last Thursday Judge Paul refused to rescind his year-old injunction ordering the admission of the Negro children on grounds that school officials had presented no "orderly plan" for desegregation. County school authorities indicated they might submit a plan by yesterday.

Alexandria and Norfolk are also scheduled to open Tuesday with desegregated classes. Nine Negroes are registered for classes in three Alexandria schools and 21 Negroes will attend seven predominantly white Norfolk schools.

Norfolk's school board said yesterday it would ignore Pupil Placement Board assignment of two Negro students to a Negro high school. The youngsters are beineg assigned by local authorities to predominantly white high schools under a Federal court order.

In other developments:

- Attorneys for 13 Negro children said they will ask Federal Judge Albert V. Bryan for an injunction on Tuesday ordering their immediate admission to white or predominantly white schools in Alexandria.
- Thursday was set as the opening date for priavte, all-white classes in Prince Edward County. Public schools, which are under court order to desegregate, were not allowed funds to operate this year.

NORFOLK TEACHER SAYS

Virginian Students Split On Segregation

By RELMAN MORIN

RICHMOND, Va. (AP) — In Arlington, a woman with children of school age says: "A year or even two years without any schools is a cheap price to pay if it staves off integrating."

In Front Royal, an accountant says, "It's no longer a question of whether we want segregated schools. That's out. The question now is whether we are to have any public schools at all."

In Richmond, the governor and attorney-general search for legal ways to preserve segregated schools if or when the courts strike down the state's "massive resistance" laws.

In four cities, people organize a "save-the-schools" movement, even at the cost of some integration.

In South Norfolk, Jim Ream, 17, high school senior class president, polls the students, displaced from their own school in Norfolk and says, "They are entirely in favor of segregation."

In Norfolk, Mary D. Johnson, a high school teacher for 35 years, says of the students' sentiment, "They're divided."

All over the state, men debate possibilities—

"Set up private schools with tuition grants to students provided by the state" . . . "Let each community decide for itself what kind of schools it wants" . . . "Close the Negro schools."

And warn of implications beyong the state—

"Closing the schools is already diminishing our chances of getting new industry, which we sorely need" . . . "Unless this problem is bridged, it means the end of the Western alliance. Americans cannot fight communism unless we are united among ourselves."

This is the critical ground now in the vast and dangerous struggle between the federal government and the Southern states over admitting Negro children to white schools.

That struggle took a more spectacular form in Arkansas, primarily because of the Little Rock riots last year. But today, the broader implications lie in Virginia for three principal reasons:

1. Virginia was the first state to close its schools when federal judges ordered Negroes admitted to institutions in three communities and children know what it means. How are they reacting?

2. Among the students themselves, opposition to integration appears far deeper and more widespread in Virginia than in Arkansas. Can integration be forced on communities where, not only the parents, but many white children refuse to accept it?

3. In Arkansas, some integration already had taken place before the Little Rock explosion. Virginia, with a brilliant tradition of leadership, has had no integration. In effect, other Southern states are telling Virginians, "If you go down, there is little hope for the south." What's the outlook?

At the moment, high schools and junior high schools in Charlottesville, Norolk and Warren County are closed. These were the communities where federal judges ordered integration to begin.

Nearly 13,000 white students are either out of school entirely or getting substitute education in a night high school in South Norfolk, private classes in churches, a youth center, and in tutoring groups in private homes.

How are they reacting?

Very well, on the whole, teachers and public school administrators told this correspondent.

"The great majority are working more seriously and with better results," said Miss Gaylord Gibson, an English teacher in Front Royal. "They are doing more home work. I think the jolt has made them work harder."

"I think the kids are going to get as good an education, or better, this way than they would in the regular high school," said Duncan C. Gibb, president of the Virginia newspapers said otherwise.

In a speech, J. J. Kilpatrick, editor of the Richmond News-Leader, said in November:

"I would like to see means devised by which a county or a city could vote, at the will of its people, to abandon some or all of its public schools, according to uniform and defensible arrangements.

"I would like to see laws devised by which any child, at any time, in any locality, could elect to accept a tuition grant from the state, rather than to attend a public school.

"So long as the disbursement of tuition is not geared in any way to segregation or integration, such grants certainly are within the state's power to provide."

So today's various plans are being studied and discussed for "parallel" school systems — segregated private schools supported by tuition grants from the state plus regular public schools, integrated if necessary.

Gov. Almond said:

"There is no alternative other than to establish a commission composed of members of the General Assembly to work out a program. There are a lot of conflicting views there. After they have reached some conclusions, I will offer my own ideas, looking to a program to submit to the General Assembly.

"Prior to that time, however, it's very probable that there will be Negro children in the schools in Norfolk, Charlottesville and perhaps elsewhere."

corporation organized to finance and operate the private schools in Front Royal.

In South Norfolk, the high school and junior high school were thrown open to students from Norfolk when the schools in that city were closed. Classes are being held at night, from 4 to 9 p.m.

"I like it," said Adelia Watson, 17, a senior who expects to go to college. "I find I work better at night."

E. E. Brickell, the principal—who also is principal of the regular day school and is working from 8 a.m. to 11 p.m.—said report cards for the first six weeks "showed grades just about normal as they are in a normal high school situation."

However, Miss Gibson expressed a view that seems widespread among the professional educators, on various levels, in Virginia. Speaking of the private schools in Front Royal, she said:

"We all insist it's only temporary. We all want to get back into our high school."

And the Norfolk School Board, in a resolution to the City Council, said in part:

"Our white children are being denied their education and are being lulled into a second rate substitute for a well directed and properly accredited education.

"Thousands of parents are being severely inconvenienced and suffering an unnecessary financial burden by being compelled to pay tuition to neighboring schools and make-shift tutoring groups.

"Our business economy has suffered and this condition will grow more acute each day our schools remain closed."

The resolution called on the City Council to join with the board in petitioning Gov. Lindsay Almond Jr. to return the schools to the city for operation "in accordance with the present order of the U.S. District Court."

J. J. Brewbaker, superintendent of schools in Norfolk, told me:

"The private school system is inadequate. There are probably a few children who are doing better than in a classroom. But in most cases, there is no science lab, no special areas of instruction such as in music and art. They just can't give a complete education."

Apart from the adequacy of the private schools, what was the effect on public opinion throughout the state of closing the schools?

"People are bitter," said Harry F. Byrd Jr., publisher of the Winchester Star. "They're more determined than ever. In a good many cases, it isn't only the fact that federal courts ordered the schools to enroll Negroes, it's the way it was done."

I found wide streaks of this sentiment around the state.

P. B. Young, Negro newspaper publisher in Norfolk, said:

"Feeling is much worse than it was a year ago. Are the whites more hostile? Much more. Negroes have no feeling of a desire to retaliate."

The schools were closed by the governor under powers granted by the so-called massive resistance laws.

Suits testing these laws were brought before a special federal District Court and the State Supreme Court. Decisions are pending, but most Virginians believe they will be ruled unconstitutional.

And so, last November, the Richmond Times-Dispatch editorially advocated a shift to other grounds than massive resistance. It said:

"While our determination to resist this tyranny remains unchanged, we must now reconsider and realign our echelons of defense. . . We must now find another position from which to fight, with ground to maneuver."

In some Northern eyes, this was interpreted as a sign of retreat.

School Crisis Regarded as Centering in Virginia

Rise of Bitterness Noted; Approaches Debated

By JULIAN MORIN

RICHMOND, Va. (AP) — In Arlington, a woman with children of school age says, "A year or even two years, without any schools is a cheap price to pay if it staves off integrating."

In Front Royal, an accountant says, "It's no longer a question of whether we want segregated schools. That's over. The question now is whether we are to have any public schools at all."

In Richmond, the governor and attorney-general search for legal ways to preserve segregated schools if or when the courts strike down the state's "massive resistance" laws.

In four cities, people organize a "save-the-schools" movement, even at the cost of some integration.

In South Norfolk, Jim Reams, 17, high school senior class president, polls the students, displaced from their own school in Norfolk and says, "They are entirely in favor of segregation."

DEBATE POSSIBILITIES

In Norfolk, Mary D. Johnson, a high school teacher for 35 years, says of the students' sentiment, "They're divided."

All over the state, men debate possibilities—

"Set up private schools with tuition grants to students provided by the state" . . . "Let each community decide for itself what kind of schools it wants" . . . "Close the Negro schools."

And warn of implications beyond the state—

"Closing the schools is already diminishing our chances of getting new industry, which we sorely need" . . . "Unless this problem is bridged, it means the end of the Western alliance. Americans cannot fight communism unless we are united among ourselves."

This is the critical ground now in the vast and dangerous struggle between the federal government and the Southern states over admitting Negro children to white schools.

BROADER IMPLICATIONS

That struggle took a more spectacular form in Arkansas, primarily because of the Little Rock riots last year. But today, the broader implications lie in Virginia for three principal reasons:

1. Virginia was the first state to close its schools when federal judges ordered Negroes admitted to institutions in three communities. Parents, teachers and children know what it means. How are they reacting?

2. Among the students themselves, opposition to integration appears far deeper and more widespread in Virginia than in Arkansas. Can integration be forced on communities where, not only the parents, but many white children refuse to accept it?

3. In Arkansas, some integration already had taken place before the Little Rock explosion. Virginia, with a brilliant tradition of leadership, has had no integration. In effect, other Southern states are telling Virginians, "If you go down, there is little hope for the South." What's the outlook?

MORE SERIOUS

At the moment, high schools and junior high schools in Charlottesville, Norfolk and Warren county are closed. These were the communities where federal judges ordered integration to begin.

Nearly 13,000 white students are either out of school entirely or getting substitute education in a night high school in South Norfolk, private classes in churches, a youth center, and in tutoring groups in private homes.

How are they reacting?

Very well, on the whole, teachers and public school administrators told this correspondent.

"The great majority are working more seriously and with better results," said Miss Gaylord Gibson, an English teacher in Front Royal. "They are doing more home work. I think the jolt has made them work harder."

CLASSES AT NIGHT

"I think the kids are going to get as good an education, or better, this way than they would in the regular high school," said Duncan C. Gibb, president of the corporation organized to finance and operate the private schools in Front Royal.

In South Norfolk, the high school and junior high school were thrown open to students from Norfolk when the schools in that city were closed. Classes are being held at night, from 4 to 9 p. m.

"I like it," said Adelia Watson, 17, a senior who expects to go to college. "I find I work better at night."

E. E. Brickell, the principal—who also is principal of the regular day school and is working from 8 a. m. to 11 p. m.—said report cards for the first six weeks "showed grades just about normal as they are in a normal high school situation."

'GROW MORE ACUTE'

However, Miss Gibson expressed a view that seems widespread among the professional educators, on various levels, in Virginia. Speaking of the private schools in Front Royal, she said:

"We all insist it's only temporary. We all want to get back into our high school."

And the Norfolk school board, in a resolution to the city council, said in part:

"Our white children are being denied their education and are being lulled into a second rate substitute for a well directed and properly accredited education.

"Thousands of parents are being severely inconvenienced and suffering an unnecessary financial burden by being compelled to pay tuition to neighboring schools and make-shift tutoring groups.

"Our business economy has suffered and this condition will grow more acute each day our schools remain closed."

PETITION ALMOND

The resolution called on the city council to join with the board in petitioning Gov. Lindsay Almond Jr. to return the schools to the city for operation "in accordance with the present order of the U.S. district court."

TUITION GRANT

In some Northern eyes, this was interpreted as a sign of retreat.

Virginia newspapers said otherwise.

If massive resistance was to prove inadequate, what would be the next move?

In a speech, J. J. Kilpatrick, editor of the Richmond News-Leader, said in November:

"I would like to see means devised by which a county or a city could vote, at the will of its people, to abandon some or all of its public schools, according to uniform and defensible arrangements.

"I would like to see laws devised by which any child, at any time, in any locality, could elect to accept a tuition grant from the state, rather than to attend a public school.

"So long as the disbursement of tuition is not geared in any way to segregation or integration, such grants certainly are within the state's power to provide."

VARIOUS PLANS

So today various plans are being studied and discussed for "parallel" school systems — segregated private schools supported by tuition grants from the state plus regular public schools, integrated if necessary.

Gov. Almond said:

"There is no alternative other than to establish a commission composed of members of the General Assembly to work out a program. There are a lot of conflicting views there. After they have reached some conclusions, I will offer my own ideas, looking to a program to submit to the General Assembly.

"Prior to that time, however,

Court Studies Ruling In Richmond Case

RICHMOND, Mar. [illegible] (AP) Federal Judge Sterling Hutcheson took under advisement yesterday the Richmond school integration case and — on a broader basis — the validity of an amended pupil placement act that could be given a new lease on life.

In closing arguments, counsel for both sides concentrated more on the placement act's status than on the relatively little disputed facts of the case.

Three Negro children are seeking admission to an all-white school in the city's west end.

If the placement act were upheld by the judge, it might be employed as a defense in future integration suits throughout the State. If it were struck down, the Perrow Commission on Education would have its search for a new State school policy complicated still further.

Roland D. Ealy, an attorney for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and one of three counsel for the plaintiffs told the court:

"The placement act, although amended, is still the same wolf in sheep's clothing."

Robert D. McIlwaine III, an assistant attorney general of Virginia, told the court it would have to dismiss the suit for failure of the plaintiffs to join the placement board members as indespensable parties to the litigation.

Both Mr. McIlwaine and City Attorney J. Elliott Drinard contended the action of the State Supreme Court Wednesday removes the last cloud that may have hung over the placement act's validity. This action was the Supreme Court's refusal to upset its earlier decision killing the State's massive resistance laws.

Virginia Battle Is Shaping Up On Local Option School Plan

State Leaders Are Divided On Perrow Unit Proposals

RICHMOND, April 2 (AP)—A legislative battle began to shape up today over the Perrow Commission's proposal that Virginia turn to a plan giving localities a choice between integration or no public schools.

Publication of the Commission's freedom of choice recommendations to the Governor brought expressions of opposition and support from political leaders and others in the State.

Rep. Watkins M. Abbitt (D-Va.) of Appomattox, said it was "a complete surrender to the integrationists." But Lt. Gov. A. E. S. Stephens of Smithfield called it a drawing of lines "for the next battle in a long, long war."

And without expressing favor or disfavor, State Sen. Harry F. Byrd Jr (D-Winchester) urged "full and complete" hearings on the plan.

The General Assembly will begin deliberations on the new school program Monday when it receives Gov. J. Lindsay Almond's message. The Governor will appear before a joint session of the Senate and House of Delegates.

Almond Has Enough Support

Indications were Almond could muster the necessary support in the Legislature for the program. However, it is due to get an oratorical raking over by legislators who want an approach closer to the now defunct massive resistance program.

It is expected the Defenders of State Sovereignty and Individual Liberties and a group calling itself the Bill of Rights Crusade will advocate the doctrine of interposition, the assertion of state sovereignty through the exercise of police power, as a means of retaining segregation.

A group of legislators is expected to push for a referendum on repeal of the constitutional provision requiring the Assembly to operate public schools.

The majority of the Perrow Commission recommended a free choice plan whereby localities could meet the school desegregation problem in their own way. The program envisions retaining the State system of public schools, but would make it possible for localities to cut their schools to a skeletonized version of dwindling funds.

Rep. William M. Tuck, Democrat of South Boston, said the report "appears to be an effort to satisfy those who favor the mixing of the races as well as those who oppose the mixing of the races in our schools . . . It carries many of the earmarks of the Dalton campaign platform which was repudiated by the people" in the 1957 gubernatorial election.

Plan Gratifies Dalton

Republican State Sen. Ted Dalton of Radford commented that "it is gratifying to see that our State is coming gradually to a pupil assignment plan administered by localities. The sooner we get there the safer our schools will be. I know that educators will be relieved to see the compulsory school attendance law reinstated."

Duncan C. Gibb, president of the Warren County Educational foundation which is operating private classes for the white pupils from Warren Conuty High School, said the report "covered some important points." He particularly cited the recommendation that some teachers in private schools could continue to participate in the State retirement plan and the one that would broaden tuition grants.

J. L. Blair Buck, chairman of the Virginia Committee for Public Schools said, in view of the complexity of the problem, it seems to me the Perrow Commission has done a pretty effective job. Of course, the laws which follow will be the determining factor."

State Sen. Mosby G. Perrow of Lynchburg, the Commission chairman, said he thought the "paramount thing of the effort is one of freedom of choice, having in mind . . . the framework of laws which now exist, coupled with the conscientious effort to provide education for all of the children of Virginia."

ALMOND FORCES WIN IN VIRGINIA

Pass Local Pupils Assignment Bill 21-18

RICHMOND, Va. (AP) — The Virginia General Assembly has given its approval to the balance of the Perrow school plan with the Almond administration's Senate coalition holding firm to pass the bitterly fought local pupil assignment bill 21-18.

A final breakthrough on the assignment bill and subsequent action by the Senate on less disputed phases of the plan, aimed at minimizing integration while retaining public schools, paved the way for quick adjournment.

The local assignment bill, passed with the aid of three Republican Senate members, wasn't by a long shot the bill the administration requested. But passage of the measure showed Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr.'s backers controlled the Senate to the end—even if by a rather fine margin.

EXTENDS OLIVE BRANCH

Almond expressed his gratification the Perrow commission program he recommended had been adopted and extended the olive branch to "the able and sincere" opponents who fought him down to the wire on the local assignment provision.

With enactment of the program, here is what the Assembly offered Virginia to supplant the old massive resistance to integration program:

Freedom of choice for localities to continue public schools with the possibility of some integration or turning to private schooling with tuition grants of up to $250 per pupil financed by the state and locality.

Abolition of local budgeting procedures to permit localities to appropriate local and state funds on a month-to-month basis to give them financial flexibility in leaving the public school system.

ELIGIBLE FOR GRANTS

Public schools could be allowed to wither away—if the localities wanted it that way—by withholding local financial support, thus limiting state contributions to the constitutional minimum.

Any pupil wishing to attend a private nonsectarian school would be eligible for tuition grants. The same would apply to any pupil from an integrated school district desiring to transfer to a nonintegrated school district.

A return to compulsory school attendance laws—if the localities want them—with a provision that no child shall be required to attend an integrated school over the parents' objections.

Retention of the old State Placement Act until March 1, 1960—if the courts don't make it useless sooner.

NEGROES TO ASK ENTRY

12 Families Will Seek White Schooling In Virginia

ROANOKE, Va., April 22.—(AP)—At least 12 Negro families soon will seek the transfer of their children from Negro to white schools in an unnamed Southwest Virginia county, a Roanoke attorney said Wednesday.

Ruben Lawson made the disclosure to newsmen. However, the Negro lawyer, who represents the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in this area, refused comment on what county was involved.

Lawson's reticence apparently stemmed from the fact that the special session of the General Assembly is involved in discussions of the Perrow School Plan.

Dumas Proposes Law To Prevent Closing Of All State Schools

Plan Would Get Around Decisions In Virginia

A proposed district school plan designed to get around a federal Court decision in Virginia was proposed today by Sen. Larry Dumas of Jefferson County.

He said under the federal court ruling, the Alabama school system, as now constituted, would have to be closed altogether or submit to integration.

The Virginia decision held that if a state operates schools in some communities, it must also maintain them elsewhere.

Dumas confined his plan to a subcommittee of the Legislature's interim revision of laws committee which is studying problems relating to segregation.

While he didn't oppose a compulsory school closing law as Gov. John Patterson has recommended, Dumas said it would be better to confine the operation of such a law to as small an area as possible.

He described the proposed legislation as a "second line of defense" in Alabama's fight to prevent mixing of races in the classroom.

A compulsory school closing law that would shut down all public schools in the state at one whack, he said, is a rather drastic remedy for integration.

His plan is to divide the state into school districts within each county.

If one or more school in one district came under a federal court order to admit Negro pupils, Dumas said, authorities in that district could withdraw from the state public school system and set up their own school system.

The Jefferson senator said he believed that it would be possible for the state to continue its appropriations to the new "private school system" in that district.

Dumas said he is working closely with Birmingham Atty. J. E. Johnston, who helped develop Alabama's "freedom of choice" school program which has already been enacted into law.

Another subcommittee headed by Rep. Hugh Merrill which is also studying problems of education announced it will hold public hearings next Wednesday and Thursday in connection with the Alabama Education Association's annual meeting in Birmingham.

Merrill said superintendents and principals will be heard the first day and classroom teachers on Thursday.

The interim Finance Committee continued its hearing on budget requests of various state departments for the next two fiscal years.

The Examiners of Public Accounts proposed to boost its annual spending figure from an estimated $367,404 this year to $423,384 next year and $434,000 in 1960-61.

The State Health Department asked the committee Wednesday for an additional 1½ million dollars a year in the department's budget.

Virginia Loses Throne As Leader Of The Deep South

BY VICTOR CALVERTON

RICHMOND, Va. — (ANP) — Virginia has lost its leadership in the current struggle in the South to maintain the segregated public school system. The die-hards in the state who are trying to assume leadership in the private school system as a means to circumvent the desegregation order of the Supreme Court will lose also in Virginia.

Ironically enough the day that doomed Virginia's massive resistance program was the anniversary of the birth of General Robert E. Lee, idol of the South and the man who decided with the South against the Union in the Civil War over secession.

The Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals by a 5-2 decision on January 19, Lee's birthday, knocked down the state laws for massive resistance to school desegregation in keeping with the U. S. Supreme Court. Since then the state high court has refused to review that decision.

The reaction to the defeat in Virginia is spreading. It will have a great effect on the states of the deep South. Already white people who have been strangely silent on what should be done constructively on the desegregation order of the Supreme Court are beginning to speak out.

Developments in Georgia indicate a change in the attitude and role of white parents and leaders in the current struggle to save the public school system in southern states. Many white people, including some officials and politicians, are willing to abandon the system of free public schools in a last ditch effort to maintain segregation.

Recent developments in Georgia show that people who oppose the move to salvage public schools are ready to stand firm against loss of public education even at the price of some mixing of the races in the classrooms.

An organization has been formed in Georgia called Help Our Education (HOPE), Inc., which is supporting the current movement in the state to save the public schools even if some integration will be necessary. The Mayor of Atlanta has asked that his people be permitted to vote on whether to close the public schools rather than submit to school desegregation.

No logner will other southern states without thought and careful study accept Virginia's leadership, as in the past, relative to the current struggle against desegregation. Virginia's massive resistance program has been harmful to the state in many ways while failing to prevent desegregation, although it caused its delay for over four years. And there is little hope that crumbling walls of segregation in public education in Virginia can be propped up by new legislation.

County Acts To Head Off Pupil Moves

Floyd (Va.) Budget Change Follows Negroes' Petitions

FLOYD, Va., June 6 (AP) — Floyd County Supervisors made their first move to avert public school desegregation today by placing the County budget on a month-by-month appropriation basis.

The action will enable the supervisors, if they choose, to cut off all County funds from public schools on 30-day notice.

Board action came shortly after the County School Board acknowledged receipt of a petition requesting the transfer of a number of Negro children to white schools this fall.

Floyd County has no Negro high school. It has been sending its 28 Negro children of high school age to Christiansburg Institute in adjoining Montgomery County. The Institute is financed jointly by the City of Radford and the Counties of Floyd, Montgomery and Pulaski.

There was no formal resolution at today's meeting of the Supervisors to place the budget on a monthly basis. The Board, by general agreement, merely did so, effective immediately.

For July, the Board appropriated $12,500 for County schools and $24,294 for county government operating expenses.

The County unofficially expects to spend $580,480 on schools in the next fiscal year, provided there is no fund cut-off.

C. E. Hollandsworth, chairman of the board of supervisors, said a budget for August would be set up at the July meeting.

Hollandsworth, asked whether the Board had made any plans to meet the desegregation posed by the transfer requests filed by Reuben Lawson of Roanoke, attorney for the Negro children, said the Board "has not even considered it at all."

At least 14 Negro pupils are expected to ask for white public school enrollment in the petitions to be presented to the school board formally at its meeting Tuesday. J. N. Combs, County school superintendent, said the petitions "probably" will be forwarded to the State Pupil Placement Board in Richmond.

The petitions represent the first move toward desegregation in southwest Virginia, where the Negro population is small.

Floyd County operates three high schools for white children and has elementary schools for Negroes of pre-high school age.

VIRGINIA

Decision in Virginia May Hold the Key To Georgia Schools

BY HAROLD DAVIS
Atlanta Journal Washington Correspondent

NORFOLK, Va.—A panel of three federal judges sitting in this Virginia city may be on the verge of a decision which will have awesome implications for Georgia and the South. Last Sept. 27, the school board of the City of Norfolk, acting in conformity with court instructions, ordered that 17 Negro children be admitted to six public schools here.

Under Virginia law, Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. shut the six schools and locked their doors. As a result, 10,000 Norfolk children had nowhere to get an education.

ALMOST IMMEDIATELY, a group of white parents laid plans to question the school closing in the federal courts. The parents of 26 white children shortly filed proceedings claiming that the school closing is depriving their offspring of due process of law and equal protection of the law as guaranteed by the 14th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

A panel of three federal judges, including Norfolk Judge Walter Hoffman, was impaneled to hear the case. It was argued last Nov. 19.

The panel has now disclosed that its decision is ready for announcement. The unveiling will come in the vicinity of Jan. 19.

THE FEDERAL judges have put off their ruling for some weeks because the Virginia Supreme Court is also considering some of the points involved in the federal case. As a matter of deference, the federal judges want to give the Virginia court a chance to rule first.

The Virginia high court has said it will speak Jan. 19.

What the federal judges in essence are being asked to decide is this:

Is it a violation of the 14th Amendment for a state to close public schools in one city while it continues to operate them in other cities?

Are the children locked out of closed schools being denied equal protection of the law as promised under the 14th Amendment since other students in the same state are still free to attend public school with no trouble at all?

IF THE FEDERAL bench rules that children assigned to closed schools are being denied equal protection, then Virginia will have a problem of the first magnitude on its hands.

It will either have to reopen the Norfolk schools on an integrated basis, or else close the public schools in every town in Virginia.

Such a decision would be extremely meaningful for Georgia. For example, it might mean that if one or more schools were closed in Atlanta and parents of some of the locked-out children brought a proceeding, it might be necessary for Georgia to close every public school in the state to prevent integration in Atlanta.

PEOPLE CLOSE TO the court in this Virginia city are saying that the ruling of the three-judge panel may be just this clear-cut. If so, it could spell enormous trouble for states like Georgia whose officials contemplate shutting just a few schools and leaving the rest of the public education system functioning normally.

It could close every schoolhouse from Camden County to Dade, from border to border.

There is, of course, the chance that the federal panel will avoid a "bullseye" decision. It may hedge its language and its ruling in such a way that it does not sweep all before it.

The ruling will nevertheless be among the most crucial handed down during the entire court battle over segregation. It may settle whether a state can legally retain any of its public school system while sacrificing a part of it.

Almond Won't Ease Racial Bars, He Says

By ALEX R. PRESTON
Times Staff Writer

RICHMOND, Va., Jan. 9.—Gov. Almond hinted yesterday that he might invoke his inherent police powers to shut down any school attempting integration if the existing State school closing law is invalidated.

"The State does not lack resources to deal with emergency situations that might arise," he told a press conference.

"Would you invoke your police powers only if a riot or violence existed or were threatened?" a reporter asked.

"I would not entertain that question," Gov. Almond replied, "because it might be construed by some as an invitation to violence."

Decision Awaited

In an interview with Associated Press Staff Writer Relman Morin, published last Sunday, Gov. Almond indicated that if the courts overthrow Virginia's anti-integration laws, specifically the school-closing statute, some Negroes might be admitted to white schools before the General Assembly would have time to act. Nine schools already are closed to avoid integration.

The State Supreme Court will hand down a decision on the laws January 19 and a Federal Court ruling is expected at about the same time.

"As a lawyer," Gov. Almond, a former judge and State Attorney General, said, "I have stated that no chief executive can invoke the police powers of the State on an arbitrary basis." But, he added, "inherent in the executive branch of government. . . . is a responsibility upon the Governor to exercise authority under his police powers when necessary."

There has been some speculation that he might shut down schools under terms of Virginia's "Little Rock bill" which authorizes him to close schools wherever Federal forces—perhaps only a United States marshal—are present.

Reopening Possible

If the massive resistance laws are invalidated, the possibility arises that the nine public schools which have been closed by the State in Warren County, Charlottesville and Norfolk may be reopened by local authorities. In addition, Stratford Junior High School in Arlington is threatened with closure under State law because four Negroes have been ordered admitted there at the next term, beginning February 2.

Integration Possibility Conceded by Almond

If Virginia's present massive resistance laws collapse, Gov. Almond believes it is "very probable" Negro students will enter white schools before the State has a chance to come up with a new anti-integration program.

The Governor's admission that forced integration might be more imminent than State leaders heretofore have been willing to admit came as he was interviewed for an Associated Press summary on Virginia's continuing struggle to preserve segregated schools.

He was asked by AP staff writer Relman Morin what would be the next move if massive resistance proved inadequate. His reply was:

"There is no alternative other than to establish a commission composed of members of the General Assembly to work out a program. There are a lot of conflicting views there. After they have reached some conclusions, I will offer my own ideas, looking to a program to submit to the General Assembly." He has said that before.

But he added to Mr. Morin:

"Prior to that time, however, it's very probable that there will be Negro children in the schools in Norfolk, Charlottesville and perhaps elsewhere."

Mr. Morin quoted the Governor as further explaining that, without the massive resistance laws, "I have no weapon left. No State can throw its power into the scales against the Federal Government."

The Governor on November 20 told a press conference that the "overriding power" of the Federal Government conceivably could result in putting some Negroes in white schools.

But no member of the State administration heretofore had acknowledged that integration might come so swiftly if the present anti-integration laws fall.

Only yesterday, the State Supreme Court announced it would rule January 19 on a suit challenging those satutes. A three-judge Federal court also promised a decision at approximately the same time on a key feature of the plan—the State school closure law.

There has been speculation that if the school-closing law is declared invalid, there will be no way to keep the schools closed. Nine schools are closed in Norfolk, Charlottesville and Front Royal, putting 13,000 students out of classes. They have been closed since September—shut down by the massive resistance law that automatically puts a school out of business when integration is ordered.

Virginia Seen as Center of Segregation Crisis

By RELMAN MORIN
Associated Press Staff Writer

RICHMOND, Jan. 3.—In Arlington, a woman with children of school age says, "A year, or even two years, without any schools is a cheap price to pay if it staves off integrating."

In Front Royal, an accountant says, "It's no longer a question of whether we want segregated schools. That's out. The question now is whether we are to have any public schools at all."

In Richmond, the Governor and Attorney General search for legal ways to preserve segregated schools if or when the courts strike down the State's "massive resistance" laws.

In four cities, people organize a "save-the-schools" movement, even at the cost of some integration.

Polls the Students

In South Norfolk, Jim Ream, 17, high school senior class president, polls the students, displaced from their own school in Norfolk and says, "They are entirely in favor of segregation."

In Norfolk, Miss Mary D. Johnson, a high school teacher for 35 years, says of the students' sentiment, "They're divided."

All over the State, men debate possibilities:

"Set up private schools with tuition grants to students provided by the State" . . . "Let each community decide for itself what kind of schools it wants" . . . "Close the Negro schools."

And warn of implications beyond the State:

"Closing the schools is already diminishing our chances of getting new industry, which we sorely need" . . . "Unless this problem is bridged, it means the end of the Western alliance. Americans cannot fight communism unless we are united among ourselves."

The Critical Ground

This is the critical ground now in the vast and dangerous struggle between the Federal Government and the Southern States over admitting Negro children to white schools.

That struggle took a more spectacular form in Arkansas primarily because of the Little Rock disorders last year. But today, the broader implications lie in Virginia for three principal reasons:

1. Virginia was the first State to close its schools when Federal judges ordered Negroes admitted to white classes in three communities. Parents, teachers and children know what it means. How are they reacting?

2. Among the students themselves, opposition to integration appears far deeper and more widespread in Virginia than in Arkansas. Can integration be forced on communities where not only the parents but many white children refuse to accept it?

3. In Arkansas, some integration already had taken place before the Little Rock explosion. Virginia, with a tradition of Southern leadership, has had no integration. In effect, other Southern States are telling Virginians, "If you go down, there is little hope for the South." What's the outlook?

Schools Closed

At the moment, nine schools in Charlottesville, Norfolk, and Warren County are closed. These were the communities where Federal judges ordered integration to begin.

Nearly 13,000 white students are either out of school entirely or getting substitute education in a night high school in South Norfolk, private classes in churches, a youth center, and in tutoring groups in private homes.

How are they reacting?

Very well, on the whole, teachers and public school administrators told this correspondent.

However, Miss Gaylord Gibson, an English teacher at Front Royal, expressed a view that seems widespread among the professional educators, on various levels, in Virginia. Speaking of the private schools in Front Royal, she said:

"We all insist its only temporary. We all want to get back to our high school."

And the Norfolk School Board, in a resolution to the City Council, said in part:

"Our white children are being denied their education and are being lulled into a second-rate substitute for a well-directed and properly accredited education.

Severely Inconvenienced

"Thousands of parents are being severely inconvenienced and suffering an unnecessary financial burden by being compelled to pay tuition to neighboring schools and makeshift tutoring groups.

"Our business economy has suffered and this condition will grow more acute each day our schools remain closed."

Apart from the adequacy of the private schools, what was the effect on public opinion throughout the State of closing the schools?

"People are bitter," said Harry F. Byrd, jr., publisher of the Winchester Star. "They're more determined than ever. In a good many cases, it isn't only the fact that Federal courts ordered the schools to enroll Negroes; it's the way it was done."

I found wide streaks of this sentiment around the State.

The schools closed automatically and were taken over by the Governor under one of the so-called massive resistance laws.

Suits testing these laws are pending before a special Federal District Court and the State Supreme Court. Decisions are due about January 19. Most Virginians believe they will be ruled unconstitutional.

If massive resistance was to prove inadequate, what would be the next move?

No Alternative

Gov. Almond said:

"There is no alternative other than to establish a commission composed of members of the General Assembly to work out a program. There are a lot of conflicting views there. After they have reached some conclusions, I will offer my own ideas, looking to a program to submit to the General Assembly.

"Prior to that time, however, it's very probable that there will be Negro children in the schools in Norfolk, Charlottesville and perhaps elsewhere."

He explained that, without the massive resistance laws, "I have no weapon left. No State can throw its power into the scales against the Federal Government."

School Bias Ban Faces Alexandria

Court to Forbid Discrimination by Pupil Assignment

By Susanna McBee
and Robert E. Baker
Staff Reporters

Federal District Judge Albert V. Bryan said yesterday that he will issue an order barring race discrimination in the assignment of pupils to Alexandria public schools.

The injunction will be effective Feb. 2, he said, for the beginning of the second half of the school year. He directed attorneys for the School Board and for 14 Negroes seeking admission to white schools to draw up the order immediately.

He then directed the School Board to apply its new pupil assignment plan to the 14 Negroes and report to him on the results by Jan. 26.

The judge cautioned the Board that it must use "fair, just and valid administrative rules and regulations" in passing on the applications.

He said attorneys for the Negroes should come back to his court immediately if they are dissatisfied with the School Board's assignments.

Judge Bryan made his ruling after granting a motion for summary judgment filed by attorneys for the Negroes. They had argued there was no need to try the desegregation case on its merits because the School Board had conceded it was operating a segregated school system.

Two Motions Denied

The judge also denied two School Board motions—one for setting up a three-judge court to test the constitutionality of the State Pupil Placement Act and another asking dismissal of the case.

Board attorneys had contended that its assignment powers had been taken over by the State Pupil Placement Board. Anticipating possible defeat on this point, however, the Board also had filed with the court a pupil assignment plan of its own.

This plan includes such criteria as academic achievement, health factors, emotional and social stability and place of residence.

Judge Bryan's ruling followed a 15-minute court session. Opposing attorneys previously conferred with the judge in his chambers for 75 minutes.

The judge directed that the injunction be a general one along the lines of an order he issued in the Arlington desegregation case in 1956.

Question Unsettled

It did not settle the question of whether Alexandria would have to desegregate schools in February. Most attorneys thought that, if the School Board finds none of the Negroes eligible, the reviews of complaints by Judge Bryan and possible appeals would delay any desegregation until next September. School officials point out Alexandria technically does not separate its school year into two terms.

However, they conceded the possibility that, if the judge finds assignments based on race, he could order Negro applicants into white schools and refuse to suspend the order pending appeal.

In any event, the judge's ruling puts Alexandria in the forefront of the desegregation issue in Virginia. Meanwhile, neighboring Arlington is under his order to admit four Negroes to Stratford Junior High School on Feb. 2.

The validity of Virginia's "massive resistance" laws, which already have shut down nine schools in Norfolk, Charlottesville and Warren County, is scheduled to be decided by ference between the Arlington County Board and School Board has been postponed until Jan. 22. This conference to deal with future action on desegregation will be opened to the public after a private meeting.

It was originally scheduled for Jan. 20, but the School Board asked for a delay because its atorney, James H. Simmonds, will be in Richmand preparing for argument before the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals on Jan. 21.

That court will hear an appeal by attorneys for 26 Negroes whose applications to white schools were rejected by the School Board and Judge Bryan.

Virginia PTA Disapproves Integration Resolutions

Mi. 10-16-53. P. 8-A

ROANOKE, Va. (AP) — Two resolutions opposing integration of public schools have failed to gain approval of the Virginia Congress of Parents and Teachers convention.

A resolution was voted down without debate Wednesday, urging that the delegates favor the separation of races in public schools and use "every legal means to preserve such separation."

A second similar resolution was withdrawn. It would have asked the PTA to "urge the governor and the General Assembly to do everything within their power to resist integration of the races anywhere in the Commonwealth of Virginia."

The second resolution said integration would place Virginia's public school system "in grave danger of extinction."

The delegates approved a resolution calling on Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. and the Legislature to oppose "any course of action designed to weaken the present state constitutional and legislative guarantees of public education, including adequate financial support thereof."

Despite Integration

Va. PTA Demands Public Education

RICHMOND, Va. — (UPI) — The Virginia Congress of Parents and Teachers announced Monday it will put before the state legislature a resolution favoring continued public education despite racial integration.

The state PTA reported the resolution received 20 of a possible 22 votes from its districts over the state. It urges public schools for all children in the state.

Farmville, seat of Prince Edward County which has closed its 21 public schools in defiance of an integration order, voted against it along with the southside, staunton River and Rappahannock Valley districts.

Another controversial item calling for a statewide compulsory school attendance passed 18-5. The state's compulsory attendance law was repealed last winter so no white child would be forced to attend an integrated school.

The nine-item legislative program will be presented next January to the General Assembly with the PTA's backing.

Dr. Edgar M. Johnson, state PTA president, and state legislative chairman Hugh M. Davis issued a statement saying they realized the state's new "freedom of choice" program included state support of private education.

"However, members of the Virginia Congress of Parents and teachers have clearly demonstrated their convictions that, to insure an educational opportunity to every child in Virginia, a tax-supported public school system is required," they said.

RICHMOND, Va., Oct. 5 (UPI)—The Virginia Congress of Parents and Teachers said today it would put before the Legislature a resolution favoring continued public education despite integration.

The resolution received twenty of a possible twenty-four votes from P. T. A. districts. It urges public schools for all children in the state.

Farmville, seat of Prince Edward County, which has closed its twenty-one public schools in defiance of an integration order, voted against the resolution, with the Southside, Staunton River and Rappahannock Valley districts.

Another controversial item calling for state-wide compulsory school attendance passed by 18—5.

The state's compulsory attendance law was repealed last winter so that no white youth would be forced to attend an integrated school. Cities and counties were given the option of adopting local attendance laws.

Dr. Edgar M. Johnson, president of the group, said:

PTA Backs President In Hansen Dispute

The Raymond School PTA, asked by Supt. Carl F. Hansen to change its leadership or stop meeting in the school, last night refused to act on the request and demanded a "full bill of particulars" on charges against its president.

The District school superintendent had banned the group from meeting in the school because he felt the parent-teacher group's leadership was interfering with the school's educational program.

The PTA unanimously voted to "take no action on the issue until the PTA is in receipt of complete information and that the superintendent be asked for a full bill of particulars."

Contacted after the meeting Dr. Hansen said he "will have to talk to PTA and school officials before making a decision."

Most of the Raymond School teachers, all members of the PTA, attended last night's meeting but announced they were abstaining from voting. More than 100 members attended.

Principal Absent

Their principal, Miss Edith M. Williams, who is involved in the original dispute with the PTA president, Mrs. Henry Thomas, did not attend.

Mrs. Regina Chandler, like several other members, said the long string of disputes between the principal and PTA president, "should have been settled between the two heads and not for one organization to step up and say, 'you get out.'"

"We just had another PTA president kicked out yesterday," Mrs. Chandler said.

Mrs. Chandler was referring to a dispute in which the president of the Lovejoy School PTA, Mrs. Margaret P. Courtney, resigned after charging the principal tried to dominate the organization.

The school principal, Miss Edith A. Matthews, said Mrs. Courtney was trying to "run the school." She said she had not asked for the president's resignation but had received it in the mail.

"Sensible" Decision

Mrs. C. Rhodes Cox, president of the city-wide PTA organization, called the Raymond PTA decision a "sensible one."

She told the meeting that censoring Mrs. Thomas "would have had an effect on other PTAs."

Mrs. Cox suggested that had Mrs. Thomas been ousted, principals at other schools may have been prompted to eject PTAs from their schools in similar controversies.

Mrs. Thomas said she would resign as president of the Raymond PTA, which re-elected her to a second term last spring, if the group so desired but that she would be willing to run the PTA outside the school if it became necessary.

The Raymond School is located at Tenth street and Spring road N.W. The location of the group's next meeting to consider Dr. Hansen's report will be selected by its Executive Committee.

Mrs. Thomas Happy

Mrs. Thomas said after the meeting: "I'm very happy with the decision.' The school principal had indicated she would accept the group's decision.

Miss Ruth A. Wheeler, who presented the resolution adopted by the group, was one of the first to protest against taking action because, "We have nothing whatsoever on what to base an opinion.

"How do we know if we do get rid of her that the same situation would not arise a second time?" she demanded.

Originally, Mrs. Cox, president of the city-wide PTA, told the more than 100 members attending they had two choices:

1. "Ask Mrs. Thomas to resign, as the principal and superintendent insist, but without repudiating her, thereby regaining the privilege of using the school building for meetings."

2. "Keep Mrs. Thomas as president despite the demands of the principal and superintendent, and give up the privilege of using the school for meetings."

Permission to Meet

Opposition mounted against taking action without discussing the elements of the original dispute. Dr. Hansen gave permission for the PTA to meet last night in the school, but didn't want them to discuss the elements of the dispute.

"The action we are being asked to take tonight is unconstitutional," charged Mrs. David H. Crawford. "How can we act one way or another when we are not allowed to discuss the question before us and we don't know anything about the facts."

Virginia PTAs Ask Public Schools for All

An overwhelming majority of Virginia PTA districts have approved a legislative program calling for public educational opportunities for all children.

The Virginia Congress of Parents and Teachers anounced yesterday that 20 of 24 PTA districts in the States have approved a resolution which will be put before the State Legislature.

The resolution urges that "educational opportunities be provided for every child in a public school which will enable him to develop to the miximum of his capacity."

One of the districts opposing the resolution was Prince Edward County, which has closed its 21 public schools to prevent integration. The other districts opposing the resolution were Southside, Staunton River and Rappahannock Valley.

The resolution calling for continued public schooling was part of a legislative program voted on by the individual districts.

Also approved, by an 18 to 5 vote, was a resolution calling for a State-wide compulsory school attendance law.

The State compulsory attendance law was repealed earlier this year by the State Legislature so that no white child would be forced to attend an integrated school.

The Legislature did, however, make it possible for localities to adopt their own compulsory attendance laws.

Arlington Set to Integrate; Charlottesville Gets Delay

U.S. Judge Rules on Stays —Norfolk Also to Enroll Negroes on Monday

Special to The New York Times.

BALTIMORE, Jan. 29—Chief Judge Simon E. Sobeloff of the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals granted Charlottesville, Va., a delay in school integration today but refused a similar stay to Arlington County, Va.

The Arlington decision means that, barring unexpected developments, four Negro seventh-graders will enter a white junior high school there next Monday.

[In Norfolk, the school board decided to reopen six secondary schools on an integrated basis Monday.

[In Richmond, Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. warned segregationists in the General Assembly he would veto their bills aimed to frustrate the start of school integration Monday].

Federal District Judge John Paul had ordered twelve Negro children admitted at once to two white Charlottesville schools. Today's decision postpones their entry to a time no later than next fall.

Judge Sobeloff agreed to the delay because of assurances from the Charlottesville School Board that it was planning a "complete revision" of its past segregated school practices and would, among other things, create new elementary school districts.

"The school board's present attitude deserves commendation," Judge Sobeloff said in an opinion.

"The board should be afforded a reasonable time to accomplish the administrative adjustments essential to a positive and effective transition from a racially segregated to a non-segregated public school system in Charlottesville."

Judge Sobeloff spent much of the day conferring with the school board's counsel, John S. Battle Jr., and with the Negro children's lawyers, Oliver W. Hill and Spottswood W. Robinson 3d. He issued his order and opinion late today.

Mr. Battle, who is a son of a former Governor of Virginia, made certain commitments to the court, on behalf of the school board, in return for the stay of Judge Paul's order.

Mr. Battle agreed to dismissal of the board's appeal from Judge Paul's order that the twelve must be admitted to two white schools, Lane and Venable. This means that, no matter how Charlottesville reorganizes its schools, those twelve children must be in the two schools by next fall.

Tutoring Is Provided

Through Mr. Battle the school board also undertook to provide "teachers and adequate facilities for the special tutoring of the twelve children with a view to their admission to regular classes at Venable and Lane as soon as practicable," as Judge Sobeloff put it in his opinion.

This tutoring was necessitated by the fact that the twelve, along with 1,700 white children, have been locked out of the two schools since last September. Many of the children have received instruction in privately organized classes, but the Negroes apparently have not.

Judge Sobeloff's decision struck observers as a significant symbol of the easing of tension over the racial issue in effect:

"If you act in good faith, the Federal courts will deal sympathetically with your problems."

Last September Judge Sobeloff turned down a request by Charlottesville for a study of Judge Paul's integration order.

He said today that he had done so because a stay clearly would not then have "facilitated compliance." The reason was that Virginia law took any integrated school out of the hands of the locality and closed it.

Statute Struck Down

But ten days ago state and Federal courts struck down the school-closing statute. The school board, Judge Sobeloff said, "is now no longer impeded from taking steps" that it was willing to take in September but could not under Virginia law.

Judge Sobeloff gave Mr. Battle twenty days to present the school board's new desegregation plan to Judge Paul, who will consider its adequacy. A board spokesman said the schools probably would open next week on a segregated basis.

In the Arlington case, Judge Sobeloff, in a brief order, noted the "protracted history" of the litigation and the fact that District Judge Albert V. Bryan had postponed from last September until next Monday his order to admit the four Negroes.

Judge Sobeloff said, "no administrative or other difficulties" had been shown to exist in Arlington. The school board there has already voted to proceed with integration on Monday if no legal steps for delay are fruitful.

Virginia Tries Last-Ditch Bills; Arlington Goes to High Court

RICHMOND, Va. (UPI)—Segregationists rushed last-resort bills in the Virginia Legislature Friday and the Arlington County School Board appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court in attempts to thwart the state's first school integration Monday.

Attorneys for the Arlington County School Board sought a stay from a judgment of the U.S. Supreme Court to delay admission of four Negro pupils to all-white Stratford Junior High Monday.

DENIED REQUEST

A federal appeals judge in Baltimore turned down a request for a stay of integration in Arlington Thursday.

In the Legislature, a segregationist bloc was waging an apparently doomed fight.

Its desperation measures to revive the state's "massive resistance" program were opposed by Gov. J. Lindsey Almond Jr. and apparently by the dominant state political organization. Almond, while vowing "no surrender" on the integration crisis, wants a long-range study.

17 EXPECTED

It appeared imminent that 17 Negro pupils would enter six white high schools in Norfolk, Va., which have been closed under "massive resistance" since last September.

Depending upon what success the Arlington School Board has in its Supreme Court appeal, integration also may occur at Stratford in the nearby suburb of Washington, D.C.

DECISION PROMISED

The Arlington appeal was presented Friday afternoon and Chief Justice Earl Warren promised a decision Saturday by 11 a.m. (EST). However, if Warren turns down the appeal it was possible that the other eight justices could be asked for relief. Attorneys for the Negro children were to file answers to the stay application Saturday morning.

There appeared little hope that unless the state administration's stand changes suddenly, the segregationaist bills could receive the four-fifths vote necessary for approval.

Scores of other "last resort" measures were considered and cast aside by the segregationists. A legislative bill drafted conservatively estimated that at least 200 plans had been discussed during the past few days by the bloc of 18 or 20 diehards.

A House committee killed one plan to close all schools until the state's chief fire marshal could inspect them for fire hazards.

WARREN REJECTS ARLINGTON PLEA

Clears Way for Admission of 4 Negroes Tomorrow to Junior High School

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 31 — Chief Justice Earl Warren turned down today the Arlington County School Board's request for a delay in racial integration.

His action cleared the way for admission of four Negro seventh-graders to a white school in the near-by Virginia suburb on Monday. Arlington, along with Norfolk, will thus crack Virginia's total resistance to any desegregation of schools.

The Arlington case has been in the courts for three years. In 1956 Federal District Judge Albert V. Bryan first ordered the county to begin desegregation, but through a long period of appeals and further hearings nothing has been done.

This week chief Judge Simon E. Sobeloff of the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, while granting a delay to Charlottesville, refused one to Arlington. He explained that the Charlottesville school board had undertaken to work out a "complete" integration plan but Arlington's had done nothing to justify a postponement.

Appeal to Warren

Attorneys then went yesterday tto Chief Justice Warren as a last resort. Single justices of the Supreme Court have the power to stay lower court decisions pending review in the Supreme Court. The Chief Justice is assigned to hear stay requests from the Fourth Circuit.

The order denying the stay today was just two sentences long. It said:

"Upon consideration of the memorandum in support of the application and of the opposition thereto, I conclude that the test of extraordinary showing required in these circumstances by Magnum Import Company versus Coty, 262 U. S. 159, 164, has not been met.

"The motion for recall and stay of mandate of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit is denied."

The case cited supported the proposition that a Supreme Court Justice will not putset the denial of a stay by a Court of appeals unless shown some extraordinary grounds for doing so. The Chief Justice did not go into the merits of the Arlington case at all.

'Inferior' Education Charged

Attorneys for the four Negro children had told the Chief Justice in a memorandum:

"Every day that these respondents are required to remain in the 'Negro' school they are being subjected to an admittedly inferior educational requirement."

The four children will go to Stratford Junior High School, which has 1,070 white students. Elaborate preparations have been made to prevent incidents Monday. The four pupils are Ronald Deskins, 12 years old; Michael G. Jones, 12; Gloria D. Thompson, 13, and Lange D.

Newman, 13.

The Norfolk schools are under orders to admit seventeen Negro students on Monday. The schools there have been closed by action of Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. since September.

NORFOLK SCHOOLS AIM TO AVOID 'LITTLE ROCK'

City Feels It Can Avert Friction When Integrated Classes Open

By CABELL PHILLIPS

Special to The New York Times.

NORFOLK, Va., Jan. 31—Last Thursday night a cross was burned surreptitiously before the doorway of Norview High School which on Monday will receive seven Negro pupils into its student body of some 1,600 whites. The event was not published in either of the local newspapers nor, so far as can be learned, was it mentioned in any local newscast.

This conscious omission of any reference to strife, or the possibility of strife, attending the court-ordered desegregation of the public schools here next week is indicative of the stern and cautious attitude which public officials and responsible citizens generally are taking to avert "another Little Rock" now that racial barriers in the Norfolk schools finally have been breached.

Among the few leaders who are aware of the cross-burning incident, there is a difference of opinion as to how significant it is as a symptom of defiance on the part of the bitter-end segregationists in this community, whose numbers are substantial. The consensus seems to be, however, that it probably was little more than a prank by young hoodlums of the neighborhood.

As such, it has disturbing overtones, but it is not so sinister as if the perpetrators were believed to be adults who were thus signaling a reign of disorder about the school property to intimidate the Negro students and their parents.

Orderly Opening

From almost every quarter the opinion is expressed that the reopening of the six high and junior high schools to which seventeen Negroes will be admitted next Monday will be orderly. While the City Council, led by Mayor W. Fred Duckworth, fought a last ditch battle to preserve segregation, when they capitulated to the final court order earlier this week they evidently did so in good faith.

The Police Department has been firmly instructed to prevent any disorder in the vicinity of the affected schools. And the School Board, which has preserved in its "moderate" position from the start, has told principals and teachers to deal swiftly and severally with any signs of rowdyism in the classrooms or corridors.

On Friday members of the Key Club in the three high schools, whose members are regarded as leaders of their respective student bodies, adopted a strong resolution calling on their fellow students to cooperate in the orderly reopening of the schools.

Fears of Disorder

Such fears as there are of outright disorder are centered mainly on a relatively small group of potential trouble-makers—"suedes," in the vernacular, because of their reputed addiction to suede shoes—in Norview High School and its neighborhood. The school is a handsome, relatively new structure with extensive grounds and athletic fields, but it is in a generally poorer section of Norfolk into which Negro families have begun to move in increasing numbers. This has created an air of some unrest in the neighborhood, but there have been no serious flare-ups of racial friction so far.

Nowhere in this city of 240,000 in fact, is there any apparent tension or anxiety over the impending changeover in an ancient and jealously guarded custom next week. The reasons for this are several.

The chief one seems to be that while Norfolk is in all things "Virginian," it is somewhat less profoundly and defiantly so than most other Tidewater communities. Because it is a seaport and because it has a large and constantly shifting population of Naval and other Federal personnel—the total is said to be well above 75,000—it tends to have a more sophisticated and cosmopolitan outlook than other cities in the state.

The delegation from the Norfolk area in the General Assembly has for some years been of dubious loyalty to the state's ruling political oligarchy, the "organization" of U. S. Senator Harry Flood Byrd.

Finally, the city has managed to preserve comparatively good race relations. Many of its Negro slums have been replaced with attractive public housing developments. A number of handsome new Negro schools have been built in the last decade. Segregation on the public transit system was abolished painlessly some years ago. These things created a cushion of good will between the races, some of which has managed to survive the long, bitter fight over integrated schools.

It can be said with assurance that the white population of the city, almost to a man, faces the prospect of mixed schools with deep distaste and dread. The reasons are too deep and too complex to be explored here.

Opposition Action

Some, such as the defenders of state sovereignty, would carry their opposition to the point of abolishing the public school system entirely in favor of a system of subsidized private schools. Locally, one such school, the Tidewater Academy, has operated since last October in makeshift quarters with an enrollment of 280 pupils. It plans to continue in business with almost the same number of students after next week.

The defenders are a powerful and militant political force in most sections of the state, and command a substantial following in Norfolk. Their local leaders disavow any intention of taking direct action to thwart reopening of the schools next week, or to impede their successful operation in the future.

Leaders of the Norfolk group, as well as others elsewhere in the State, however, have been bringing tremendous pressure on Governor J. Lindsay Almond Jr., to put more teeth in the relatively mild school program he has laid before the special session of the Legislature. Disorders here or in Arlington Monday would greatly strengthen their hand in this effort and there is some speculation here than an extremist faction may pull a sleeper play at one of the schools in an effort to force the Governor's hand.

Powerful 'Moderates'

Norfolk is distinctive among most Southern cities in that it has a powerful and articulate group of "moderates" who balance off the defenders and their followers on the school controversy. While they, too, heartily dislike integration in principle, they are unwilling to sanction blind and stubborn resistance to the law or to sacrifice the public schools as the price for preserving segregation.

A hundred of these leaders joined in petitioning the City Council early this week to take the necessary steps to reopen the schools in accordance with court decrees. Their attitude is that "a little integration is better than no schools." And that ways can be found later for controlling the pace of integration without violating the law.

Thus, unless the significance of the cross burning at Norview School the other night has been completely misread, Norfolk faces the climax of its school controversy next week with confidence but with not much cheer.

Alexandria to Ask Integration Delay

Appeal Planned From Rule on Nine Pupils

The Alexandria School Board will go before Chief Judge Simon E. Sobeloff of the United States Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals in Baltimore today to try to get a postponement of integration ordered for Tuesday.

The board failed to win a delay yesterday from Federal Judge Albert V. Bryan who earlier ordered the admission of nine Negroes to three white schools.

Judge Bryan told school board attorneys he could "see no reason to alter" his order directing the board to admit the Negro children to Hammond High School and Ficklin and Ramsay Elementary Schools.

School Board attorneys will ask Chief Judge Sobeloff to stay Judge Bryan's order while the board appeals the case to the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals.

Warren County Case

Court action is slated next week in an attempt by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to force the reopening of Warren County High School which was closed last fall to avoid integration, the Associated Press reported.

Warren County commonwealth's attorney William J. Phillips, counsel for the school board, said he was informed by Oliver W. Hill of Richmond NAACP attorney, that Mr. Hi has filed a motion for furth relief in the case in the cou of United States District Jud John Paul in Harrisonburg.

Mr. Phillips said Judge Pa indicated the motion would heard in court Tuesday.

Last September, Judge Pa ordered the admission of Negro pupils to the white War ren County high.

The Warren County scho board voted Tuesday to dela the reopening of the hig school, which had an enroll ment of 1,000, until the be ginning of the fall term. Q. D Gasque, superintendent o schools, said the board ap proved the principle of a d segregation plan but the sp cific details remained to worked out.

Stratford Move

In Arlington, a move wa reported afoot to try to organ ize a makeshift private schoo for white students who don' want to attend Arlington's in tegrated Stratford Junior High School.

Jack Rathbone, secretary of of the local segregationist or ganization, said plans were being made to set up classes in a commercial building that could accommodate as many as 200 pupils.

Ray Reid, Arlington school superintendent, said he knew nothing about the move. He said the first week of integrated classes at Stratford had "gone very well" and there were no incidents.

School officials disclosed yesterday that a 13-year-old white girl has asked to be transferred to an all-white school. She is the first in Virginia to ask for such a transfer under a recently enacted State law which declares no child shall be forced to attend an integrated school.

nI other school segregation developments:

State Senator Mills E. Godwin, jr., of Suffolk told a Richmond meeting last night that Virginia must eliminate school integration if it can, and must arrange to contain it at any cost. Senator Godwin, a Southsider, is a member of the new study commission on the school problem.

Richmond will try to get a postponement of a hearing on desegregation litigation pending against it in United States District Court until after the Legislature devises a new State policy on the schools issue.

Protests Voiced

In the State's stronghold of segregation — Southside Virginia—resolutions have been adopted by two groups criticizing Gov. Almond and the General Assembly for not halting integration in Norfolk and Arlington.

A resolution by the Town Council of Halifax censured Gov. Almond for "failure to uphold sworn pledges" to prevent integration in the public schools and criticized the Governor and Legislature for "letting down the bars to integration in the public schools."

The Blackstone Junior Chamber of Commerce adopted a similar resolution stating that "certain elements of this leadership (in Virginia) have sacrificed principle for what is politically expedient."

Mayor Marvin A. Goode of Virginia asked the Halifax County Board of Supervisors to begin appropriating school funds on a month-to-month basis. The board has requested the county's commonwealth attorney to confer with State officials on the question.

Plans for organizing private schools are being developed in many Southside Virginia areas including Southampton County South Boston and Danville.

Alexandria Loses Integration Fight

United Press International.

ALEXANDRIA, Va., Feb. 4. —Federal Judge Albert V. Bryan today ordered the Alexandria School Board to admit nine Negro children to three white schools Tuesday but upheld the board's rejection of five other Negro applicants.

In a six-page ruling, he said the nine Negroes should be admitted to two elementary schools and one high school. Judge Bryan turned down the school board's request that the admissions be deferred until September.

Fourteen Negroes had asked to be admitted to four white schools in the city, just across the Potomac from Washington.

Judge Bryan upheld the board's rejection of five of the children under a locally administered assignment plan. He agreed with the board that two of the applicants were scholastically deficient and three others lived closer to a Negro high school than the white high school for which they applied.

The judge upheld five points of the six-point plan used by the city School Board in screening pupil applications. But he ruled out the factor of emotional stability, remarking that such a factor used by other Virginia cities had been struck down by other federal courts.

Judge Bryan told the board to put five of the Negroes into either Patrick Henry or William Ramsey Elementary School and two more into Ficklin Elementary School and two in Hammond High, a combination junior-senior high school.

Meanwhile, Warren County decided to keep its only high school in Front Royal closed at least until September and will continue to rely on a private system set up last fall to circumvent the admission of 22 Negroes to the school.

Charlottesville, which closed two of its schools last fall under the now-stricken "massive resistance" program, reopened them today on a segregated basis.

4 Negroes Ask Entry in Area Schools

By Susanna McBee
Staff Reporter

Four Negro students filed suit yesterday in Federal Court for admission to two desegregated Alexandria schools. At the same time attorneys announced that a total of 28 Negroes would apply to enter schools for white pupils in Fairfax County.

The four Alexandria children, who moved recently from Washington, asked the Court for "immediate" relief under Judge Albert V. Bryan's Jan. 23 order that Alexandria must not assign pupils according to race.

Attorneys Frank D. Reeves and Otto L. Tucker, of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, filed the suit which seeks to add the four students to a list of 14 others who sued Alexandria school officials last fall.

Judge Bryan ordered nine of the 14 admitted to three previously white schools last Feb. 4. The new plaintiffs are applying to Ramsey Elementary School and Hammond High School.

School Superintendent T. C. Williams said they had been denied admission to those schools at a secret School Board meeting Tuesday night.

They were rejected on assignment criteria which the Board set up last fall to deal with desegregation. The students were assigned to Parker-Gray and Lyles-Crouch schools.

In Fairfax County, parents of 28 Negroes who want a "non-segregated education" have asked Reeves and Tucker to represent them, the attorneys said. Two of the 28 have applied to Flint Hill and Belvedere Elementary Schools. Other schools involved will be James Madison High, Annandale High, and Devonshire, Hollin Hall, and aPrklawn Elementary Schools, the attorneys said.

Reeves added that "so far, no litigation has been contemplated in Fairfax County. We hoped to avoid it."

In Arlington, a School official said a Negro girl attended a pre-school conference at the white Patrick Henry Elemeptary School on April 23. Her placement form went to the State Pupil Placement Board.

Negro applications in Alexandria and Fairfax are also being forwarded to the State Board, which has been ignored by Federal Courts in desegregation cases.

Washington, D.C.

Bryan Admits 12 Negroes to White Schools

By ALEX R. PRESTON
Star Staff Writer

A Federal judge yesterday warned Arlington it must apply its pupil assignment plan equally to both races as he directed the admission of 12 more Negroes to three formerly white schools next September.

At the same time, Judge Albert V. Bryan of Alexandria

Text of Judge Bryan's Decision.

turned down for the present a plea by Negro attorneys for a comprehensive Arlington desegregation plan. He specifically upheld the county's assignment program, provided it is administered impartially.

In denying the applications of 22 Negro children, Judge Bryan said the School Board had not applied its assignment criteria equally to 12 of the applicants. He upheld the school board's rejection of the other 10.

"The criteria used by the school board in 1958, and then for the most part approved by the court," he said, "have been employed by the board in the present assignments. The criteria are still approved. But in some instances the application of the criteria by the board this time has not been uniform as between the white students and the Negro petitioners."

In denying the Negroes' motion for a comprehensive desegregation plan, Judge Bryan said he was turning it down "at this time" because his order with respect to the 22 applicants provides the remedy that would be accomplished by such a plan.

12 Ordered Admitted

Judge Bryan added seven Negroes to the four previously admitted to Stratford Junior High School; directed four to be entered for the first time at Washington - Lee High School, and said one new admission must be made at Patrick Henry Elementary School. Since February 2, Stratford has been the county's only integrated school.

Eighteen of the applicants had been rejected by the board for lack of academic accomplishment, although there were white children in the classes involved with lower standing than some of the applicants. Judge Bryan said the school board was justified last year in employing this criterion in the manner it did because a new situation was involved and academic levels of the classes would have been lowered.

"Now, however, the classes are about to be constituted anew," he said. "Therefore, they cannot be declined admission to a class if other children of the lower-half standing are to be accepted.

"Should any classes be established with reference to the national median (of academic accomplishment) or some other standard, admitting only those above it, then any white or Negro pupil not possessing these qualifications could be excluded from these classes, provided all students were given an equal opportunity to enter such classes."

2 Academic Rejections

He concluded that only two of the 18 rated by this criterion could be rejected solely on academic grounds.

He also concluded the criterion of overcrowded schools had been unevenly applied. The four children he directed admitted to Washington-Lee next September were validly turned away last September because "the school was already filled beyond capacity." He added:

"But now they cannot be singled out for rejection for overcrowding alone. The board's rejection of these four on this score cannot stand."

The 10 rejections by the school board which were sustained by Judge Bryan were based on the criterion of attendance area. All of the 10 live within an area designated by the county as the Hoffman-Boston attendance district. Hoffman-Boston is all Negro.

Frank G. Reeves of Alexandria, one of the attorneys for the Negro applicants, said "I have not yet had the opportunity to read the decision but on the basis of information received thus far I am gratified that at least 12 more children will be provided an education on a desegregation basis."

Consultation Planned

L. Lee Bean, school board chairman, said the board would have to consult with attorneys before deciding its next step.

The case came before Judge Bryan for the second time because the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals directed the school board to reconsider the applications. The 22 were among 30 who sought admission to white schools last fall. The school board turned down all of them, Judge Bryan ordered four of them admitted to Stratford on February 2 and four others of the remaining 26 withdrew.

14 Alexandria Negroes To Ask White Schools

Evening Star
Feb. 7 1959
Washington D.C.

Fourteen Negro children will apply for admission to predominantly white or completely segregated schools in Alexandria before the end of the week, their attorney disclosed yesterday.

School Supt. T. C. Williams said all applications will be referred to the State Pupil Placement Board in Richmond for disposition.

The new applications will bring to 22 the number of colored pupils seeking entry to primarily white or segregated schools in the city.

Eight students, previously rejected by the School Board, are asking Federal courts to order their admission and will not file new requests for transfer.

Attorney Otto L. Tucker said that of the 14 new applicants, five will seek assignment to Minnie Howard Elementary School, four to William Ramsay, two to Ficklin Elementary School and one to Hammond High School and one to Jefferson School.

The Minnie Howard and Jefferson Schools are completely segregated.

Integration first occurred in Alexandria last February when Federal Judge Albert V. Bryan ordered nine Negroes admitted to Hammond, Ficklin and William Ramsay.

First Time for Four

Mr. Tucker said that four of the Negro children will enter school for the first time this fall. Nine others have been students at Parker-Gray High School and Lyles-Crouch in Alexandria.

The other student is a girl who formerly attended school in Washington and who was refused admission to Hammond after her family moved to Alexandria in the spring.

Mr. Tucker said she is applying again because she returned to school in Washington after her application was turned down in Alexandria.

Some of the pupils indicated to the School Board last May that they wished to apply for entry to the predominantly white schools.

However, they were advised that they should wait until the registration period this month.

Registration Begins

Mr. Williams said registration for the fall term begins today and will end Friday.

All requests for transfer must be submitted during this period, he said.

The superintendent explained that under Virginia law the School Board must forward all applications from both white and colored students to the State Pupil Placement Board.

Alexandria and Arlington have assigned Negroes to white schools without intervention by the board only after being directed to do so by Judge Bryan.

Asked what the Negro pupils will do if the board rejects their application, Mr. Tucker said:

"We will just have to start again for the treadmill of trying to get back in court."

ARLINGTON GETS ORDERS TO MIX

Times-Picayune

Admit 12 Negro Pupils, Says U.S. Court

New Orleans, La.

ALEXANDRIA, Va. (UPI) — Federal Judge Albert V. Bryan ordered Saturday that 12 Negro students be admitted to three schools in Arlington, Va., when they reopen this fall.

For two of the schools it will be the beginning of integration.

The judge held that the Arlington school board applied entrance requirements unequally in rejecting the students. But he upheld the board's refusal to admit 10 other Negroes.

At the same time Bryan denied a motion by attorneys for the Negroes that the board be required to submit a comprehensive plan for desegregation. The board's system of screening pupils provides adequate relief, he said, and is proper so long as it is applied equally to whites and Negroes.

One of the schools involved is Stratford Junior High which last February became the first integrated school in Virginia since the days of reconstruction.

Under the judge's order, seven of the students will go to Stratford, four to Washington-Lee High, and one to Patrick Henry elementary school. The last two have been all-white.

The school board refused to admit the four to Washington-Lee on grounds the school was overcrowded. Judge Bryan ruled that this was improper — that the Negroes "cannot be singled out for rejection for overcrowding alone."

The students seeking admission to Patrick Henry and Stratford were turned down because their grades on academic tests fell below the median achievement level of the grades they wanted to enter. In overturning this, the judge pointed out that some white pupils also fell below this median.

"Should any classes be established with reference to the national median or some other standard," the judge said, "admitting only those above it, then any white or Negro pupil not possessing these qualifications could be excluded from those classes, provided all students were given an equal opportunity to enter such classes."

The judge upheld the board in turning down the 10 other applications because the pupils lived outside the districts of the schools they sought to enter.

"Considering school bus routes, safety of access and other pertinent factors, it cannot be found that the school board's assignments are arbitrary or predicated on race or color," he said. In thei own district, he added, the pupils actually "are afforded schools of better pupil-teacher ratio and of less congestion than any in the county."

This ruling in effect upheld the board's right to set up school districts. "The court cannot draw the boundaries for attendance areas," Judge Bryan said.

Saturday's rulings were the latest in a legal battle that went all the way to the U.S. supreme court. In January Chief Justice Earl Warren rejected the school board's request to postpone integration.

Judge Bryan ordered last year that the board admit the four Negroes to Stratford Junior High, but granted a delay until February. As the deadline approached opponents of integration threatened to picket the school and a tense situation developed.

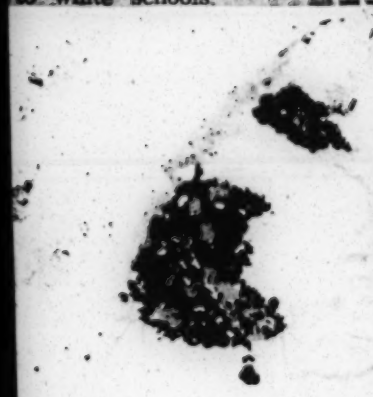
On Feb. 2, a Monday, police equipped with riot guns and tear gas stood as other officers escorted the Negroes, three boys and a girl, into the school. But there was not trouble, and has been none since.

School integration in Virginia came slowly. The Legislature drew up a set of "massive resistance" laws to combat it, but the state's own supreme court threw out the entire package on constitutional grounds.

Negroes have gone to the courts also in Front Royal, Norfolk and Charlottesville, seeking admission to white schools.



Alexandria Stiffens School Promotions

Policy Pushing Slow Learners Ahead Is Ended

By DAN POOLE
Star Staff Writer

Alexandria pupils—no matter how much bigger they might be than their classmates—will find it much harder to get promoted this year, if their work doesn't measure up.

School officials are cutting out so-called "social promotions" which occasionally push slow-learning students ahead just because they were getting too big, or too old for their classmates.

In a new "get tough" policy on promotion, Alexandria school officials hope to tighten academic standards by being stricter with pupils whos grades are below the passing mark.

"It's related to our new readiness centers fro slow maturing 6-year-olds who cannot take first grade work," explained Assistant School Superintendent Raymond F. Sanger. "If a student doesn't pass in any grade, he just plain won't get promoted."

Border-Line Pupils

He said that in some instances previously, there have been so-called "social promotions" where a border-line student was passed on to the next grade simply because he already was older than his classmates through prior failures.

And in some cases slow-learning pupils were promoted because they were getting so much bigger than their classmates, they didn't seem to fit in with them, he said.

"These practices will be discontinued," Mr. Sanger said. "The administration has decided that all students must measure up in their class work in order to pass on to the next grade."

Rather than carrying the slow-learners along, he said, school officials now will require them to take remedial work to bring their grades up to standard or they may be assigned to special classes for retarded students.

Age Factor Declines

"The judgment of the teachers will, of course, be taken into account, and cases will be studied individually," Mr. Sanger said, "But we're going to be more strict about keeping students in the grades where their work places them rather than taking age into consideration."

In another move resulting from tightened academic requirements, Alexandria schools will open five "readiness classes" within a week for about 100 6-year-olds termed too immature for first grade work.

Parents of 111 potential first graders were notified yesterday and today that their children were ineligible for regular school work this year, but that they could attend special readiness centers being set up to prepare them for entering the first grade next year.

Mr. Sanger said acceptance of the new program, the first of its kind in this area, has been generally good. He said he does not know yet how many parents will send their children to the special centers. They have an option of enrolling them, keeping them at home or sending them to private schools.

Tests Decisive

Prohibited from entering the first grade are children who scored a mental age of 4½ years old or less on two maturity tests given last month. Until Virginia's compulsory attendance law was repealed as an anti-integration measure, it required schools to admit children 7 years old on or after October 1. As a general practice, however, 6-year-old children have been enrolled.

Children assigned to the special classes will attend the same hours, 9 a.m. to 2 p.m., as the regular first grade students. They will be divided into groups of about 20 in each class. Teachers picked especially for the program will conduct the new classes.

Alexandria School Told To Integrate

U.S. Judge Orders Admission Of 9 Negroes in Virginia City

RICHMOND, Va. (AP)—A federal judge told a third reluctant Virginia community Wednesday it must admit nine Negro pupils to white schools next Tuesday.

The order of District Court Judge Albert V. Bryan to the school board of Alexandria came as Norfolk and Arlington went through a third peaceful and almost routine day of racially mixed classes.

Orderly compliance by Alexandria in the Norfolk-Arlington pattern should bring a temporary respite in the running school crisis. Charlottesville, granted a delay by a U.S. appeals judge, reopened a high school and an elementary school Wednesday on an all-white basis to all but about 300 of 1,675 displaced pupils.

The two schools, along with six in Norfolk, had not opened for the September term because of state laws designed to fend off federal integration order. Those laws since have been declared unconstitutional.

Alexandria officials did not say immediately what they intended to do.

CALM LAUDED

The calm that prevailed on the Norfolk and Arlington school fronts won plaudits from President Eisenhower at his Washington news conference.

Judge Bryan announced his decision in the Alexandria case a day after hearing aruments on a challenge to the school board's action in turning down 14 Negro applications for transfer to white schools.

He ruled that the historic colonial market place city, a few miles down the Potomac from Washington, must open three white schools to nine of the Negroes. He said the school board's refusal to admit the five others was proper because of residence nearer to a Negro school in the case of three high school applicants and academic deficiencies in the case of the two rejected grade school applicants.

FOUND NO BASIS

But he said he found no basis, other than race, for the turndown of the other nine.

The admission of the Alexandria nine will bring to 30 the number of Negro pupils in the state's white public schools since 100 per cent segregation reached the end of an era Monday.

Four are in Arlington—Alexandria's northern Virginia neighbor—and 17 are in Norfolk, the state's big seaport city 200 miles to the south.

Charlottesville, in the central section, won a respite that reopened schools because its officials proved their willingness to proceed with plans to desegregate later—most likely next September.

FIRST TO CLOSE

Warren County High at Front Royal, near the northwest tip of the state, was the first school to close under the defunct state law when 22 Negroes were ordered admitted. County officials, in the face of pressure from counsel for the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People, said this week they would move to comply with the pending desegregation order.

Orderly Reception Is Seen For Negroes In Alexandria

By United Press International

RICHMOND, Va., Feb. 9.—Virginia slipped quietly into the second week of public school integration Monday with an orderly reception predicted for nine more Negroes who enter white classrooms in Alexandria Tuesday.

Alexandria, historic suburb of Washington, will join neighboring Arlington County and Norfolk in carrying out court-ordered integration.

Twenty-one Negro students, 17 in six previously white schools at Norfolk and four in an Arlington junior high, continued classes as calmly as they began one week ago.

Norfolk Attendance Rises

Attendance at the three high and three junior schools in Norfolk rose by 150 students Monday over that at the end of the first week of integration. City school officials said the attendance, 7,018, was 2,380 shy of the enrollment when the schools closed last June. Many students are in private classes, others have moved and others have quit school. The six Norfolk schools had been closed since September.

Arlington's Stratford Junior High reported its attendance had remained about normal since four Negroes entered the seventh grade.

City and school officials predicted a calm beginning of racially-mixed schooling in Alexandria which will be the first Virginia city to enroll Negroes in a white elementary school.

"We would hope it takes place in the same manner as in Arlington and Norfolk," school board chairman Robert C. Howard said.

Former Mayor Marshall Beverly, an outspoken segregationist, echoed Mr. Howard's sentiments.

Running Against Moderate

"I know the citizens will be law-abiding and accept the court order," Mr. Beverly said. "But I feel they will express their feelings at the ballot box against those who have helped and encouraged integration."

Mr. Beverly is running against incumbent Armistead Boothe, a moderate, for the state Senate in the Democratic primary this summer.

Police plan stringent precautions to head off any trouble.

Police Chief Russell A. Hawes said more than 50 officers would be stationed at the three schools, Hammond High, Ficklin and Ramsay elementary schools. Crowds would not be permitted to gather, he said, and no parking will be permitted near the schools.

Virginia Faces Another Loss In School Fight

Alexandria Board Without Remedy To Halt Mixing

RICHMOND, Va. (AP) — Virginia reluctantly gives up more ground in the school integration dispute Tuesday through the court-ordered enrollment of nine Negro children in white schools in Alexandria.

The Alexandria School Board, like its counterparts in Arlington and Norfolk, found itself with no suitable legal remedy at hand to halt integration, even temporarily.

A last-ditch appeal for a stay of the desegregation order failed Saturday at Baltimore. Chief Judge Simon E. Sobeloff of the U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals said he could find no reason to give the school board more time to prepare for racial mixing.

POLICY BREACHED

For the third time in eight days Virginia was due to see its traditional "separate but equal" policy of educating white and Negro children breached. The massive resistance program that managed to keep that policy intact for so long collapsed with court rulings last month.

Last Monday Arlington admitted four Negro children to a white junior high school. Some 200 miles distant, in the thriving port city of Norfolk, 17 Negro youngsters entered six white schools, reopened for the first time since last June.

As in Arlington and Norfolk, state and local officials hoped Alexandria's admission of nine Negro children to the white school system would be a peaceful transition.

PLANS PROCEED

Plans for integration were proceeding. School Supt. T. C. Williams, Commonwealth's Atty. Earl F. Wagner and School Board counsel John Barton Phillips said there were no plans to appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, a step taken by Arlington officials two weeks ago without success.

There was no word Sunday of any special precautions being ordered in advance of the Negro enrollments at Alexandria. A heavy police cordon was set up at neighboring Arlington's Stratford Junior High School with the start of integration last week.

Alexandria's integration is due on the eve of a gthering of state legislators in Richmond. The 40-member special school study commission appointed by Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. meets Wednesday to chart a long-range program aimed at containing or minimizing the spread of school integration.

ALMOND PROPOSAL

Almond, according to his closest associates, would go before the commission with proposals aimed at preserving a state system of public education while resisting with all legal weapons any wholesale race mixing.

The governor was said to be firmly opposed to any plan that would permit junking of the entire public school system. Strong segregationists, expressing their views in no uncertain terms during the past week, favor such alternatives to even token integration.

School Mixing Is Orderly In Alexandria

ALEXANDRIA, Va. (AP)—This historic city of northern Virginia bowed Tuesday to a federal court order and admitted nine Negro children to white public schools.

There was no apparent trouble. Police were out in force but had little to do. White students for the most part paid little attention to the newcomers.

T. C. Williams, in his 26th year as superintendent of the city's schools, said he was gratified by the absence of disorder.

Williams called it commendable that the citizens of Alexandria—which calls itself George Washington's home town—were "able to do what they didn't want to do, with dignity."

The man directly responsible for the Negroes entering white schools was an Alexandrian—Federal Dist. Judge Albert Bryan, who followed up the Supreme Court opinion of 1954 that compulsory segregation in public schools was unconstitutional.

Bryan said the city's school board had given him no evidence, except race, for refusing the requests of the nine Negroes for transfers from Negro to white schools.

Here was the division of the nine: Five into William Ramsay elementary school, which has an enrollment of 667; two into Theodore Ficklin, an elementary school of 317 pupils and two into Francis Hammond High School with an enrollment of 1,321.

Absenteeism was reported about normal at all three schools.

School officials discounted a report some white boys walked out of Hammond. They also announced that Hammond basketball games will go on as scheduled. Students canceled a Valentine dance but Raymond Sanger, assistant superintendent, said he didn't know whether this was due to the racial factor.

U.S. Judge Orders Alexandria To Begin Integration Tuesday

Third Virginia District Gets an Edict on Schools—Nine Negroes to Be Enrolled

Special to The New York Times.

ALEXANDRA, Va., Feb. 4—A third Virginia community was ordered today to make an immediate start on desegregation of its public schools.

Federal District Judge Albert V. Bryan told the city of Alexandria to admit nine Negro children to white schools next Tuesday. The order will affect one high shool and two or possibly tree elementary schools.

Virginia's total resistance to integration ended Monday with the admission of four Negro children to a white school in near-by Arlington County and of seventeen Negroes to white schools in Norfolk.

The Alexandria lawsuit was filed only last fall. The Arlington and Norfolk cases had been in the Federal courts for years.

14 Negroes Had Applied

Fourteen Negro children had applied for entry into white schools in Alexandria. The school board turned them all down, purportedly because they had failed on various criteria such as academic standing.

Judge Bryan upheld the exclusion of five children. He said three logically belonged in their present school because it was closer, and two showed academic test scores so much lower than the average in the white classes to which they sought admission that they could be excluded.

"But," Judge Bryan said in his opinion, "the remaining nine applicants should be admitted to the schools they requested, the evidence not giving a basis, other than race, for their rejection."

The nine had been ruled out by the school board for reasons of geography, academic standing or overcrowding in the schools to which they had applied.

Attorneys for the fourteen Negro applicants had urged rejection of the entire school board screening program on the ground that it applied only to Negroes. But Judge Bryan turned down this argument, as he had last fall in the Arlington case. That issue in the Arlington suit is now under review by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit.

Alexandria had asked Judge Bryan to postpone the effective date of any order to next fall. He declined to do so because, he said, delay would "involve many problems," including putting the fourteen applicants through a review of their cases next year.

The school board can still ask Judge Bryan for a stay of his order, and can go from him to the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals.

9 IN ALEXANDRIA ARE INTEGRATED

All Is Quiet at 3 Schools—Judge Orders Front Royal to Admit 23 Negroes

By ANTHONY LEWIS

Special to The New York Times.

ALEXANDRIA, Va., Feb. 10—Negro children entered another white school system in Virginia today, and again without trouble.

Nine boys and girls joined 2,300 white children in three of this city's schools. No incidents occurred outside the school buildings, and everything was reported to have gone smoothly inside.

As in neighboring Arlington, where token school integration began last week, the police were on hand in force but had nothing to do. The only crowds that gathered were composed of reporters and photographers.

Four Negro children are in a previously all-white Arlington school. Seventeen have entered six formerly white schools in Norfolk. And a Federal judge today ordered the reopening of a high school in Front Royal that was closed last fall to block the admission of twenty-two Negroes.

Settled in 1700's

Alexandria, on the Potomac just south of Washington, was settled in the early seventeen hundreds and still has many eighteenth century homes in its downtown section. But the three schools involved today are not in the historic part of the city.

James E. Lomax, 8 years old, and his sister Margaret Irene, 6, entered the Theodore Ficklin elementary school, which has 317 pupils. The building, north of the old city, adjoins middle-class white garden apartments, but there are also factories and Negro slum dwellings nearby.

Another elementary school, William Ramsay, with 667 pupils, was opened to five Negro children—Sarah Ragland, 8, Jessie Mae Jones, 8, and three Turner children—Kathryn, 11, Sandra, 7, and George, 6.

Ramsay is a new school, completed only last fall. It is in a new suburban section of Alexandria, which the city annexed from neighboring Fairfax County only a few years ago.

The third school was Francis Hammond High, which opened about a year ago, also in the suburban annexed area, and has an enrollment of 1,321. Its new Negro students were a sister and brother—Patsy Ragland, 14, and James, 13.

Absenteeism in the three schools ran to about 10 per cent of the student body, which officials said was normal. A junior was withdrawn by his parents from Hammond High, but the parents refused to say whether integration was the reason.

First in Lower Grades

The two Lomax children were actually the first to break Virginia's color line in the elementary grades. The schools affected in Arlington and Norfolk last week were junior and senior high schools.

Just before 8:30 this morning they left their home, a tiny dwelling about a block from the Ficklin school. With them were their mother, Mrs. Henry Lomax, and grandmother, Mrs. Ella Lomax.

James wore a dark blue jacket and a cap with earmuffs. It was a warm day, though, and the earmuffs were folded up. Margaret wore a light blue parka. Both carried lunch-boxes.

Their mother hurried them along, patting them gently on the head once in a while, and went on into school with them. Reporters then crowded around their grandmother and asked what the children thought about their big day.

"They didn't think anything," she said.

"You know children that age. They don't know anything except what you tell 'em. We hardly had time to get 'em ready—they were wrestling like every morning.

"Children ain't nothing but children—I don't care where you get 'em from. All they care about is eating and sleeping and playing."

Integration Delay Denied Alexandria

Court Is Unmoved By Last-Ditch Plea

ALEXANDRIA, Va., Feb. 6 (AP).—The Alexandria school board pleaded in vain today for more time to make preparations for the admission of Negroes to white schools.

United States District Judge Albert V. Bryan was unmoved by arguments that the school board should be allowed time "to create a climate in the schools and the community that would permit an orderly transition" from segregation to integration.

Judge Bryan said the same arguments had been presented to him during earlier phases of the case and he refused to modify his order directing the school board to admit nine Negroes to three white schools next Tuesday.

To Seek Stay

School board attorneys said they planned to seek a stay of Judge Bryan's order from Chief Judge Simon E. Sobeloff of the 4th Court Circuit Court of Appeals. They said they were hopeful this could be done by Monday.

Even as the school board conducted its last-ditch legal moves, it went ahead with preparations for admitting the Negroes—five to William Ramsay elementary school, two to Theodore Fiklin elementary school and two to Francis Hammond High School.

Thomas R. Dyson, a member of the school board, told Judge Bryan:

"If this court does not delay the effectiveness of this order pending an appeal, it will be forcing us to begin a new way of life without final determination of this matter.

Court Affirms Order

"It is the duty of this court to grant us a stay . . . This court could be wrong. We could all err. You are not right judicially until that is finally determined."

But the judge said "the court sees no reason to alter the conclusions as already stated."

This referred to Judge Bryan's ruling Wednesday ordering the Negroes admitted, and turning down the suggestion of board counsel that he might order integration put off until September.

Alexandria Board To Air School Stand

A hearing in Alexandria Federal Court on applications by 14 Negro students for immediate admission to five white Alexandria schools will resume tomorrow with the school board holding the floor.

City schools, meanwhile, will continue operating on a segregated basis.

Federal District Judge Albert V. Bryan, who opened the hearing Friday to hear the school board's explanations for refusing the students admission, so far has heard only the students' side.

The pupils' attorneys, Frank D. Reeves, Otto L. Tucker and James M. Nabritt 3d, challenged legality of the assignment plan Alexandria used to screen the applicants on grounds that it enabled the board to assign students to classes on the basis of race. Judge Bryan already had ruled last month that the board could not use race as a consideration in making student assignments.

Commonwealth Attorney Earl F. Wagner and John Barton Phillips, counsel for the school board, said last night that they hope to base their arguments tomorrow on the board's inability last fall to take any other course but issue the students a refusal."

The board attorneys maintain that the State's "then-existing massive resistance laws" which since have been found unconstitutional, "had to be obeyed by local school officials." Mr. Phillips said he will argue also that the board's "good intentions" when it approved an assignment plan which "specifically said that race would not be considered."

The students were refused transfer to white schools last week on three of the six criteria points: proximity of their homes to the nearest school, academic achievement, and mental and emotional stability.

Mr. Phillips said he expects [illegible] tomorrow to include School Superintendant T. C. Williams and Alfred Wingo of the State Board of Education.

The Choice in Virginia

The note which recurs in Governor Almond's speech to the Virginia Legislature in Richmond yesterday is that if somebody has a better plan than the one advocated by a majority of the Perrow Commission, let him produce it. For the alternatives, no matter how they may be dressed up, are some integration or abandonment of Virginia's public school system.

The Governor, to his credit, has made it plain that he stands with those who intend to see the system preserved, although it means acceptance in varying degrees of integration. The principle which makes possible this acceptance of integration is that the decision will be left to the different localities as to the amount of local tax funds they wish to furnish for their own public schools.

As for his own posture in this difficult situation, Governor Almond's most eloquent words were directed to defense against critics who attribute to him Virginia's final retreat from massive resistance. The Governor no doubt gave the impression in the heat of former battle that he would never retreat. But he challenges critics to find where he said that no Negro child would ever enter a white school in Virginia. He never said that. All he said was that he would do everything within the framework of law to prevent it—and having done that, and having been forced to capitulate by superior force, he stands on that record.

The next two weeks or so in Richmond will show whether the Governor is expressing majority sentiment in Virginia. We believe he does. We believe this sentiment recognizes what is implicit in the Perrow Commission recommendations—that there are localities in Virginia which will abandon all support of public schools rather than accept any integration; that there are others which already have accepted integration and will live with it and continue their support of public schools, and that for the time being the only reasonable course, and the one least destructive of public education, is to let the localities decide for themselves and profit by the resulting experience.

Work Started In Virginia on School Bills

Almond's Plea for Perrow Plan Gets Mixed Reaction

By ALEX R. PRESTON
Staff Writer

RICHMOND, April 7.—The General Assembly began work today on a package of 15 bills and a resolution carrying out the Perrow Commission's program for avoiding forced attendance at integrated public schools.

Gov. Almond's whole-hearted commendation of that plan to the Legislature brought reactions today ranging from outright praise to sarcastic denunciation.

Included in the latter was the response of Delegate James M. Thomson of Alexandria to Gov. Almond's message to a joint session of the General Assembly yesterday. Mr. Thomson, a member of the Perrow Commission who signed a minority report of that group, said:

"He showed a magnificent grasp of the problem but a total unwillingness to face it."

Filibuster Threatened

Mr. Thomson is among a group of strong segregationist members of the Legislature who threaten to keep the General Assembly tied up for at least two weeks in debating the Perrow Commission program which now is officially before it.

All of the bills were introduced either in the House or Senate after the Governor's talk yesterday before both bodies adjourned to reconvene at noon today.

There is a strong move in the faction supporting the minority report to support the view of State Senator Harry F. Byrd, jr., of Winchester calling for full public hearings on some aspects of the Perrow recommendations.

One of the sections of the Governor's speech which the group found distasteful was when Gov. Almond said:

"The commission makes crystal clear to all who stop and listen, that massive resistance lies not in the enactment of fruitless laws in contravention of Federal power; that massive resistance to that which a people believe to be wrong and inimical to their rights and the welfare of their children lies with the individual citizen, and that the right to associate carries with it the right not to associate."

Praise by Mann

Arlington Delegate Harrison Mann, a member of the Commission, was among those to laud the Governor's stand. "He laid it on the line," Mr. Mann said. "He told the Legislature, 'If you have a better plan, come forward with it.'

"Gov. Almond exploded the theory that interposition was any defense or that the use of the State's police powers is any defense" (against Federal court desegregation orders).

In this vein, Gov. Almond told the Legislature which greeted his 43-minute speech with only two unenthusiastic interruptions of applause:

"With commendable candor and frankness the report portrays the truth to the people of Virginia. It deals with fact—not fiction—a condition and not abstract theory, reality, not surmise and wishful thinking. . .

"It points out contrary to the advice of some who should know better that the police power cannot be exercised by any agency or a State to reverse or negate a Federal decree; that a State cannot interpose its authority or power between the Federal Government and the object of a Federal law or decree.

Assembly Limited

"It does not blame or castigate the chief executive for failure to do that which the Assembly itself is powerless to authorize him to do."

In reply to a question, Mr. Mann said he thought it is "improbable" that the Legislature can get its work done in less than three weeks.

Senator Charles R. Fenwick of Arlington, another commission member, described the Governor's speech as an "honest and forthright statement of conditions as they exist. . . . It should further clarify in the minds of many people just what the General Assembly can do and what it is powerless to do."

Delegate Omer L. Hirst of Fairfax, commented: "The real significance is that the Governor and a majority of the commission still see eye to eye. He has thrown the full weight of his office behind the commission's program and thereby makes its adoption likely."

The Perrow report was approved by 31 of the 40 commission members.

Mr. Hirst, like most of the lawmakers, saw two key provisions throwing up the greatest roadblock to the quick acceptance of the Perrow Commission program.

Compromise Seen

"Determined efforts to begin the repeal of Section 129 (of the State constitution, which requires operation of public schools) and to take some 'local' out of locally administered pupil assignment may be anticipated," he said. "This would be most unfortunate because the commission proposals require compromise on the part of the friends of the public free schools."

Mr. Hirst said he would have to study the report further and await developments in the Legislature before determining how far he could go along with the Perrow plan.

Senator John A. K. Donovan of Fairfax, a commission member who signed the majority report, said those parts of the Governor's message which backed the plan were "excellent."

Mr. Donovan said, however, it was "unfortunate" the Governor had quoted from a section of the report which said, in effect, that those with a better plan to offer should come forward with it or remain silent. Senator Donovan said the commission, itself, was divided on whether to include that language in its report.

Webb's Reaction

Delegate John C. Webb of Fairfax said:

"I was delighted to see the Governor indorse the Perrow Commission recommendations. They constituted a realistic facing up to the situation. I have not studied the bills but if they are in line with the report, I feel the program is a good compromise and we ought to accept it."

To many observers, the commission's recommendations for a locally administered pupil assignment plan was very much like that previously advanced by State Senator Ted Dalton of Radford and Senator Armistead L. Boothe of Alexandria. Mr. Dalton, a Republican, ran gainst Gov. Almond three years ago and campaigned partly on the local pupil assignment plan.

The Governor, in his message to the Assembly yesterday, pointedly stated:

"This is not the local assignment plan envisioned and advocated by some."

When approached for comment on the message as a whole, Mr. Dalton's reaction was: "Good! I am extremely happy with the indorsement of the pupil assignment or placement plan, administered by the local school boards. Also that compulsory school attendance laws are coming back.

"There are some objectionable features to the commission's report, but time will remove those when they prove unworkable."

Three Main Ideas

Mr. Boothe had this to say:

"Of course, the Governor advocated enactment of the Perrow report in toto. The three ideas at the heart of this report are: One, that the public school system must be maintained; two, local option must be honored, and three, a pupil assignment plan with Statewide criteria and local administration is the best legal weapon with which to contain integration in the public schools.

"I do not hesitate to keep my stand at the Governor's side against the storm of opposition that will break over him from certain sections of the State. I understand thoroughly his strong reaction and resentment to the attacks of his critics. As I have learned since 1954 (date of the original Supreme Court desegregation decision) it is unjust and unfair to be called an integrationist simply because you are sincerely devoted to the cause of public education and want to keep the schools open with a maximum of segregation."

Delegate Kathryn Stone of Arlington was not present for yesterday's session due to a death in her family. Delegate Willian Winston, also of Arlington, left Richmond for business reasons immediately after the sessions and was not available for comment here prior to the session today.

Almond Pupil Plan Is Ready

Will Present Plan To Assembly Today

RICHMOND, April 6 (AP). — Gov. Almond goes before the General Assembly after it reconvenes today to present recommendations for a long-range State policy in the school integration crisis.

The Governor is expected to use the Perrow Commission's report as the basis for setting administration goals and making specific proposals.

A battle appears in the making among the 140 assembly members, however, on whether to accept the commission's program in general or to adopt more drastic measures along the old massive resistance line.

Most of the commission bills contain emergency clauses which require a four-fifths majority in order to pass. Thus, as few as nine Senators voting against such a measure would reject it on an emergency basis.

One of the main bones of tention appears to be the question of constitutional amendment. The commission majority proposes that Virginia resist integration for the time being without any constitutional change.

Minority for Amendment

A minority group holds that an amendment concerning the removal of public school requirements from the State Constitution is "imperative."

State Senator Mills E. Godwin, jrm., of Suffolk, minority spokesman, said Saturday that measures will be introduced seeking "more effectively to prevent integration in our public schools and more effectively enabling our localities to resist the threat of integration."

And Delegate Frank Moncure of Stafford County said he will introduce a bill asking for a State-wide referendum to repeal the State constitutional requirement for operation of a public school system.

The lawmakers are convening today in a continuation of the extraordinary session called earlier in the year by Gov. Almond on the school question.

9 on Perrow Unit Dissent

Already in the hands of the 140-member assembly is the Perrow Commission report on schools.

The report offers a specific legislative plan putting resistance to racial integration on a local-option basis.

Nine members of the 40-member Perrow unit dissented from this line of approach. There are others in the two houses of the legislature who favor a return to all-out resistance, whatever the consequences. These are expected to exert strong opposition to the administration proposals.

The underlying theory of the majority report is to enable any city or county to resist as much as it sees fit—even to the point of withdrawing local support from public schools. The majority says such resistance is possible, legal and constitutional without any change in the Constitution.

The majority doesn't pretend its program will prevent integration. It says the only sure way to prevent integration is to close all public schools. However, it adds the belief that most Virginians do not want to abandon public schools.

The majority report proposes specific legislation in the shape of 15 bills.

Shot Fired At Almond

RICHMOND (UPI)—A sniper fired one shot from ambush at Gov. J. Lindsey Almond Friday as the governor left the executive mansion to go to the Capitol, police reported Saturday.

The shooting was first reported to newsmen as only a loud backfire from a passing car. But police revealed Saturday their investigation led them to believe it was an attempt on the governor's life.

Lt. C. G. Phaup, chief of the Capitol police force, said the shot was fired from thick shrubbery bordering the executive mansion in a corner of Capitol Square. The square is in the heart of downtown Richmond.

A branch broken from the shrubbery was found to contain lead fragments. A lighted cigarette was left smouldering on the sidewalk on the street side of the bush-covered fence.

Court Opinion on Stay

Special to The New York Times.

BALTIMORE, Jan. 29—Following is the text of the opinion of Chief Judge Simon E. Sobeloff of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit accompanying the stay of a lower court order requiring immediate admission of twelve Negro children to white schools in Charlottesville, Va.

Last September, when the board of Charlottesville, Va., applied to me for a stay of the order of the District Court admitting the twelve Negro plaintiffs to two of the formerly white public schools, the board was unable to give assurances that a stay, if granted, would facilitate compliance with the decree appealed from.

The reason asserted, obvious to all, was that under certain laws then on the Virginia statute books, the school board was denied autonomy in the management of its school system, and any school faced with any degree of desegregation was required to be closed by order of the Governor.

In the circumstances I found no basis for granting a stay.

Since then, as is well known, there has been further litigation in the Supreme Court of the United States, in this and other Federal Courts and in the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Whatever doubt there may have existed formerly, it is now frankly and correctly recognized by the board that such statutes constitute no bar to the operation of racially non-segregated schools; and the board is now no longer impeded from taking steps which, but for such statutes, it was willing to take to comply with the District Court's decree.

Mr. John S. Battle Jr., counsel for the board, whose appeal is now pending, and Messrs. Oliver W. Hill and Spottswood W. Robinson 3d, counsel for the twelve Negro children, conferred with me at length today.

Mr. Battle brought to my attention a resolution passed unanimously on Jan. 26, 1959, by the school board; also an extract from the minutes of the meeting on Jan. 27, 1959 of the Council of the city of Charlottesville, in which that body by unanimous vote expresses its purpose to cooperate with and support the school board in complying expeditiously and completely with the decree of the District Court.

The plan outlined by the school board will undertake a complete revision of past policies and practices respecting the assignment of children to the public schools and the necessary formulation of new elementary school districts to equalize the pupil population among the various schools.

The school board's present attitude deserves commendation. It is apparent that the board should be afforded a reasonable time to accomplish the administrative adjustments essential to a positive and effective transition from a racially segregated to a non-segregated public school system in Charlottesville, and that it should be assisted in its determination to move within the frame and spirit of the court's decree.

More than 1,700 children were displaced when the Governor closed the Venable and Lane schools in September. Since then, many of the affected children have received some measure of academic instruction by private arrangement.

Remedial Study Planned

As commendable as these community efforts have been, the school board correctly recognizes that this cannot continue as a permanent program. Moreover, there is a need for remedial instruction of some of the displaced children, widely varying between those white children who attended classes under the auspices of organized local private groups, and others, including the twelve Negro appellees, whose opportunities were far more limited.

The board has proposed to provide immediately regular teachers and adequate facilities for the special tutoring of the twelve children with a view to their admission to regular classes at Venable and Lane as soon as practicable, and in no event later than next September.

With full confidence in Mr. Battle, and convinced that the representations made by him have the support of his clients, I think that they should have the opportunity to present their plan to Judge John Paul in the District Court, who passed the original order and who has the primary responsibility in the matter.

I think further that the plan is entitled to consideration without holding over the heads of the school and local governmental authorities the coercive threat of continued school disclosure.

Court Is Confident

The schools were not closed by any Federal court action, and where complete confidence exists that the brief time necessary will be employed to further, not impede or evade, the court's decrees, there is no need to continue the unhappy conditions which have prevailed in Charlottesville since the normal school opening date last fall.

The plan may be presented to Judge Paul within twenty days, and considered by him as early as he finds his scientific permits. The twelve plaintiffs are assured full admission not later than next fall, and are to be offered such assistance by way of adequate tutoring and use of school laboratories and other facilities as may benecessary or desirable to effect their early and orderly transition under the new plan.

It remains to say that while Messrs. Hill and Robinson properly have stressed their clients' present rights, won after struggle in proceedings begun before the board as early as the spring of 1956, I am satisfied from the attitude of reason and fairness these lawyers have displayed in the conferences before me, that they can and will aid in effecting orderly procedures beneficial to their cleints and others of their race, and contributing also to the good order and harmony of the entire population of Charlottesville.

JUDGE EXPLAINS RULING

Charlottesville Plan Wins Integration Stay

BALTIMORE, Jan. 30 (AP).—This is the text of Judge Simon E. Sobeloff's memorandum on his decision staying a lower Federal court order requiring integration at two Charlottesville schools, issued yesterday in United States Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals in Baltimore:

Last September, when the school board of Charlottesville, Va., applied to me for a stay of the order of the District Court admitting the 12 Negro plaintiffs to two of the formerly white public schools, the board was unable to give assurances that a stay, if granted, would facilitate compliance with the decree appealed from.

Since then, as is well known, there has been further litigation, in the Supreme Court of the United States, in this court and in the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Whatever doubt there may have existed formerly, it is now frankly and correctly recognized by the board that such statutes constitute no bar to the operation of racially non-segregated schools and the board is now no longer impeded from taking steps which, but for such statutes, it was willing to take to comply with the District Court's decree.

Gets City's Plan

Mr. John S. Battle, jr., counsel for the board, whose appeal is now pending, and Messrs. Oliver W. Hill and Spottswood W. Robinson, counsel for the 12 Negro children, conferred with me at length today. Mr. Battle brought to my attention a resolution passed unanimously on January 26, 1959, by the school board; also an extract from the minutes of the meeting on January 27, 1959, of the Council of the City of Charlottesville, in which that body by unanimous vote expresses its purpose to cooperate and support the school board in complying expeditiously and completely with the decree of the District Court.

Situation of Pupils

More than 1,700 children were displaced when the Governor closed the Venable and Lane Schools in September. Since then, many of the affected children have received some measure of academic instruction by private arrangement.

As commendable as these Community efforts have been, the School Board correctly recognizes that this cannot continue as a permanent program. The board has proposed to provide immediately regular teachers and adequate facilities for the special tutoring of the 12 children with a view to their admission to regular classes at Venable and Lane as soon as practicable, and in no event later than next September.

For Consideration of Plan

With full confidence in Mr. Battle, and convinced that the representations made by him have the support of his clients, I think that they should have the opportunity to present their plan to Judge John Paul in the District Court, who passed the original order and who has the primary responsibility in the matter. I think, further, that the plan is entitled to consideration without holding over the heads of the school and local governmental authorities the coercive threat of continued school closure.

The schools were not closed by any Federal Court action, and where complete confidence exists that the brief time necessary will be employed to further, not impede or evade, the court's decrees, there is no need to continue the unhappy conditions which have prevailed in Charlottesville since the normal school opening date last fall.

The plan may be presented to Judge Paul within 20 days, and considered by him as early as he finds his schedule permits. The 12 plaintiffs are assured full admission not later than next fall, and are to be offered such assistance by way of adequate tutoring and use of school laboratories and other facilities as may be necessary or desirable to effect their early and orderly transition under the new plan.

It remains to say that while Messrs. Integration Set For Monday In Arlington

Charlottesville Granted Delay To Draft Plan

BULLETIN

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va., (AP)— The Charlottesville School Board announced today the city's two closed schools will open Wednesday on a segregated basis.

By MARY LOU WERNER
Star Staff Writer

Public school integration is scheduled Monday in Arlington and Norfolk, while the city of Charlottesville has won a breathing spell that will permit reopening of schools on a segregated basis.

Alexandria, meanwhile, was attempting to hold off integration as a hearing began today in Federal Court there on pleas by 14 Negro students for enrollment in white classes.

The delay in Charlottesville, where two schools have been closed since September because of a court order to admit 12 Negroes, marks the first time a Virginia community has persuaded an appellate court to suspend an integration edict.

Chief Judge Simon E. Sobeloff of Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals granted the delay, which may put off integration there until next September.

Suspends Order

He suspended the lower court's integration order on the condition that the city file a desegregation plan within 20 days with Federal Judge John Paul.

The appellate judge said the city had assured him it intended to draw new school boundaries without any taint of racial influence; that children would attend schools in their home districts, and that there would be no switches according to academic tests, except such as are applied to both races equally.

Other Developments

While Charlottesville was winning time to draft a desegregation plan, there were these other developments:

1. Judge Sobeloff refused to suspend an integration order due to take effect in Arlington on Monday, requiring the admission of four Negroes to Stratford Junior High School. Attorneys for the school board were to decide later today whether to try to persuade a justice of the Supreme Court to grant a delay— a move that most observers believe would fail. The school board is ready to open Strtaford on an integrated basis Monday.

2. The Norfolk School Board late yesterday ordered the reopening of the six junior and senior high schools that have been closed since September to avoid integration. The six schools are scheduled to reopen Monday, and the 17 Negro students who have been assigned to them were to be admitted.

3. Alexandria Federal Judge Albert V. Bryan today began hearing the appeals of 14 Negro students who are seeking to overturn the Alexandria School Board's refusal to admit them to white schools. If Judge Bryan overrules the school board on its rejection of any of the students, it is possible the city might be required to admit them next week to white classes.

4. Notice was served on the Warren County School Board that an attempt will be made to force the reopening of Warren County High School at Front Royal on an integrated basis. Oliver W. Hill, counsel for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People who represents 22 Negro students assigned to the school which is now closed, said he had written county officials asking if they planned to reopen the scholl but had received no answer.

First Integration

The admission of Negro students to Norfolk and Arlington schools on Monday will mark the first time public school classes have been integrated in the State which set itself up as the leader of Southern massive resistance. Parochial schools in the State have been integrated for several years.

Collapse of the massive resistance laws, which required the closing of any pubic schools where integration was ordered, left local school boards free to go ahead with desegregation.

Those laws died earlier this month in Federal and State court decisions. They had kept nine public schools closed since September in Norfolk, Charlottesville and Front Royal. Arlington was confronted with the same threat when the integration order took effect there, but the closing law was killed in the meantime.

Plans to Obey

As soon as the massive resistance laws died, Norfolk and Arlington began making plans to obey integration orders of the Federal Courts.

Charlottesville took even more positive action. Both the city council and the school board announced their intention to proceed with desegregation, and renounced any idea of giving up public schools to avoid integration.

After yesterday's hearing, Judge Sobeloff said it was the first time a Virginia community had said flatly it was through with massive resistance and intended to carry out a desegregation plan.

He also noted that the city promised to give special tutoring to the 12 Negro students who have been ordered into the Charlottesville schools, with the intention of admitting them no later than next September.

"Reserve Commendation"

"The school board's present attitude deserves commendation," said Judge Sobeloff in his memorandum. "It is apparent that the board should be afforded a reasonable time to accomplish the administrative adjustments to a positive and effective transition from a racially segregated to a non-segregated public school system."

Mr. Hill, who is among counsel representing the Negro students in the Charlottesville case also, said he agreed that under the circumstances a stay should be granted.

Charlottesville's school board planned to meet today and announce a date for reopening Lane High and Venable Elementary schools on a segregated basis—probably sometime next week.

In Norfolk, tutoring groups all over the city will fold up today as both teachers and students prepare to return to public school.

The groups are disbanding as simply and suddenly as they were organized last fall for "stopgap" education to children locked out of high schools.

Closed in integration crisis—

Charlotteville school will reopen segregated classes

RICHMOND, Va., Jan. 30—(AP)—The Charlottesville School Board announced today the city's two closed white schools will open next Wednesday on a segregated basis. The board said Wednesday was chosen to effect an orderly reopening of Lane High and Venable Elementary Schools.

Chief Judge Simon E. Sobeloff of the U. S. Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals yesterday granted Charlottesville a postponement of its desegregation order until next Fall. He refused, however, to stay a lower court order directing the admission of four Negro pupils Monday to Stratford Junior High School (white) in Arlington.

About 1700 students from the two Charlottesville schools have been idled since the facilities were shut last Sept. 22 under Virginia's now defunct anti-integration laws. About 1400 of these have been attending classes in the basements of private homes, churches and other temporary quarters.

Lower federal courts had ordered the admission of 12 Negro students to the two schools.

Meantime, preparations went forward in Norfolk and Arlington for the reopening Monday of Virginia's first integrated public schools. And in Richmond, a group of segregationists sought a test of legislative power with the state administration.

A SWIFT SERIES of events yesterday brought these other developments:

School officials in Norfolk announced plans to reopen six white secondary schools, closed since September, on an integrated basis Monday and called on the public to "show sincere understanding and cooperation to assure a smooth orderly opening."

A PLAN BY ardent segregationists in the Virginia Legislature to ram through some drastic last-minute law that would block integration in Norfolk and Arlington schools Monday appeared on the verge of collapse today.

Leaders of the group conceded they didn't see any hope of success with Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. firmly opposed to their moves. The group has declined to accept admitting Negro pupils to white schools under federal court orders.

"He's remained immovable," said a senator from Virginia's heavily Negro populated South side. "And we are losing some of the weaker ones we hoped would go along with us."

Almond, who fought the battle against integration as attorney general and since last year as governor, has taken the view there was nothing that could be legally done with chance of success.

Arlington Turned Down

Integration Delayed For Charlottesville

BALTIMORE, Md. (UPI)—Federal appeals Judge Simon E. Sobeloff Thursday granted Charlottesville, Va., a stay of integration orders until next September.

But Sobeloff turned down a request from Arlington, Va., attorneys to stay the integration of four Negroes into an all-white junior high school next Monday.

Charlottesville had been scheduled to admit 12 Negroes to two schools Monday, but Sobeloff ruled that the city could delay their enrollment while it drew up a plan for desegregation.

Sobeloff said the board would "be afforded a reasonable time" to accomplish the transition from segregated to integrated schools.

Charlottesville City Atty. John S. Battle, Jr., said the city would present its desegregation plan to Federal District Judge John Paul in Harrisonburg, Va. within 20 days.

Battle said the Charlottesville school board will provide immediately regular teachers and adequate facilities for special tutoring for the 12 Negroes. Battle said they would be admitted to Venable elementary and Lane High schools no later than next September.

Sobeloff, in granting the stay after a five-hour hearing, said there was no need to continue the "unhappy conditions" that have prevailed in Charlottesville since last September when Gov. J. Lindsay Almond closed Lane and Venable. The schools will reopen Monday on a segregated basis.

Sobeloff noted that he had denied a stay request last September because the school board at that time lacked the autonomy of management for its school system. Gov. Almond then was able to close the schools when they prepared to integrate.

Charlottesville Schools Gain Integration Stay

RICHMOND, Va., Jan 29 (UPI). A federal appeals judge granted a school integration stay for Charlottesville, Va., today but racial mixing still appeared imminent next week in three other Virginia cities.

Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. reported demands of die-hard segregationists in the Legislature to step up some last-minute blocks to prevent integration in Norfolk, Arlington and Front Royal. Almond said, in effect, he could not go that far.

U.S. Appeals Judge Simon Sobeloff, at a hearing in Baltimore, granted Charlottesville a stay of integration orders until next September to permit the city to put a desegregation plan into effect.

Norfolk's city council and school board agreed today to reopen six integration-closed schools Monday at 9 a.m. Seventeen Negroes are scheduled to enroll in the six schools which Almond closed last fall under the "massive resistance" program.

Schools Closed

Like Norfolk and Front Royal, Charlottesville has had integration-threatened schools closed since last September under the state's recently nullified "massive resistance" laws.

Under Sobeloff's order the Charlottesville schools may operate on a segregated basis until fall.

Its school board and city council, however, have said they would accept some integration rather than abandon their public schools. Almond has mentioned as a possibility later in some parts of the state.

For the present, however, Almond was resisting pressure from segregationists to use his police powers to prevent integration from occurring anywhere in the state next week.

Sobeloff turned down a request from Arlington attorneys to stay the integration of four Negroes in an all-white junior high school next Monday.

It appeared Norfolk and Arlington would most likely be the cities that would integrate Monday.

Front Royal authorities chose to remain silent, waiting to see what plan the legislature might offer to relieve the crisis.

Veto Threatened

Almond was reported to have gone so far as threaten to veto any radical departures from the stop-gap segregation plan he handed to a special session of the General Assembly Wednesday.

Almond's plan is based largely on a system of state tuition grants for students who wish to attend private schools. Segregationist legislators launched a move to try to override the Governor with some last-ditch program to avert any integration.

Elsewhere in the South, Alabama Gov. John Patterson said he is concerned about his state's anti-integration laws in view of the collapse of Virginia's "massive resistance." Patterson said new laws may have to be enacted "very soon."

In Atlanta, the Georgia Legislature completed action on the last in a series of anti-integration measures proposed by Gov. Ernest Vandiver. The bill, designed to make it more difficult for Negroes to file integration suits against Georgia State colleges and universities, sets a maximum enrollment age limit of 21 for undergraduate students.

The other Georgia laws provide for closing schools faced with integration and shutting off funds. Localities may not levy property taxes to support an integrated school in Georgia under another Vandiver measure.

Vandiver today extended sympathy "for the people of Virginia in this time of anguish and difficulty."

Almond Firm

Six members of the Virginia segregationist bloc spent an hour trying to win Almond's backing for more stringent steps to halt the enrollment of Negroes Monday in Norfolk, Charlottesville, Arlington and Front Royal.

A reliable source said Almond told the six legislators he was "firmly against" their move and went so far as to threaten to veto their action if they mustered enough support to override him.

Members of the bloc would not disclose their plan to breathe new life into Virginia's court-stricken "massive resistance" plan.

It was reported, however, the bloc of about 25 legislators had given serious consideration to a hasty constitutional convention to repeal or revise a section of the Virginia Constitution calling for state maintenance of a public school system.

Such a move, in effect, could put the operation of public schools in the hands of the 140-member General Assembly.

Almond pledged Wednesday to continue to fight for continued segregation and indicated that the state will have to abandon some public schools and turn to a wholesale revision of its education system.

Briefing

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. (U P I) — Charlottesville's school board and city council received a briefing from counsel Monday night in the wake of court decisions killing Virginia's anti-integration law, giving rise to speculation the city might open its two closed schools.

Before entering the meeting, city school board chairman R. Stanley Goodman said the board would be guided "entirely" by the advice of City Attorney John S. Battle Jr.

Battle told newsmen prior to the meeting he was not surprised by the Virginia Supreme Court's ruling knocking down the "massive resistance" laws, but was surprised by the language of the court's opinion.

"The more I look at the decision, the more involved it becomes," Battle said without elaborating.

Battle said he had not seen the opinion of a federal constitutional court in Norfolk which knocked out a law closing integrated schools.

Petitions Ask Schools Be Kept Closed

By a Star Staff Writer

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va., Jan. 27—A petition asking that public schools be kept closed for the rest of the year will be presented to the school board by a director of a Charlottesville elementary school.

Mrs. Wilson W. Cropp, a director of the Charlottesville Education Foundation, presented two petitions with this request yesterday to the City Council.

The petitions ask that Lane High School and Venable Elementary School, closed since September under the massive resistance laws, be kept closed for the rest of the year.

A move back to the public schools would be just another interruption in the children's education, the petitions said.

Mrs. Cropp also is chairman of the "room mothers" of the school run by the foundation.

Spokesmen for the foundation's school, Robert E. Lee Elementary, have said the school would stay in operation if the public schools were integrated.

Mrs. Cropp said 409 families out of 500 that were approached signed the petition to keep Lane High closed.

Some 106 families out of 150 that were approached signed the petition on Venable Elementary, she added.

Mayor Thomas J. Michie, who accepted the petitions for the council, thanked the foundation and other groups for participating in the temporary school program.

Court Accepts Plan For Charlottesville

HARRISONBURG, Va., Feb. 18 (AP)—Federal District Judge John Paul told the City of Charlottesville today—in effect—it could count on continuing racially separate schools until next September.

Paul said he would study the School Board's plan for desegregation submitted to him by Attorney John S. Battle Jr. If he finds anything not in compliance with the terms of his previous order, he said, he will call the School Board to a hearing to work out details before the start of the next school term.

Today's proceedings consisted of only a brief meeting of Battle and Paul in the Judge's chambers here.

Pupil Ratio Is Stressed

The Board's plan outlaws racial considerations in ruling on applications for school transfers and places stress on the number of pupils assigned to each classroom teacher.

Battle submitted the plan to Judge Paul along with a map of the city's elementary school districts. The plan and the map were approved last night by the city School board.

Charlottesville's Lane High School and one of its elementary schools were closed in September under a now defunct state law to block the court-ordered admission of 12 Negro pupils.

But the two schools were opened Feb. 4—still segregated—under a delay granted by Judge Simon E. Sobeloff of the U. S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals after the city pledged to proceed with its plans to integrate in September. The city was required to submit its plan no later than today for Judge Paul's approval.

Charlottesville was able to stave off immediate school desegregation because Judge Sobeloff thought the city showed "good faith" in voluntarily adopting a plan for compliance. The Court suggested Arlington, Norfolk and Front Royal could also win delays if they drafted similar plans, but when no such plans were forthcoming thmose three localities were ordered to desegregate at once.

Battle said the newly mapped elementary school districts represented few changes.

Standards for Assignment

Under the new assignment plan the School Superintendent will rule on pupil transfer applications on the basis of academic achievement, preference of parents' need for special courses, location of schools and facilities available and availability of teachers and transfortation.

The superintendent is charged with maintaining a standard pupil to teacher ratio—30 to 1 for elementary schools and 23 to 1 for high schools.

The plan also states that the two Negroes ordered admitted to Lane High and the 10 ordered admitted to Venable Elementary will be accepted as soon as the Board feels they have reached a proper academic level—next September or before.

Last Monday the 12 pupils began a program of special tutoring by two white teachers in the superintendent's office.

The Board assured the court in its plan it had resolved "to cease all practices of racial discrimination in the assignment of pupils to various public schools of this city and to that end to commit itself to a plan of desegregation."

2 Virginia Schools May Integrate

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va., Jan. 25 (AP).—The Charlottesville School Board tonight committed itself to the reopening, on an integrated basis if necessary, two local schools closed last fall to avert integration.

The board set no definite date Saturday for the reopening of the 1000-pupil Lane High School and the 700-pupil Venable Elementary School. Both were closed last Sept. 22 under State anti-integration laws which last week were declared unconstitutional.

City attorney John S. Battle, Jr., said the board would, however, seek a delay until next September of court orders for integration, on the basis of a pupil assignment plan drawn up tonight.

Battle indicated that if a delay was obtained in the appeal to the 4th U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals, both Lane and Venable probably would open within a few days.

Earlier the Alexandria School Board announced it had rejected the application of all 14 Negro pupils seeking entry to white classes.

The board, which is under Federal court orders to desegregate beginning Feb. 2, reported that race was not the reason the 14 Negro applicants were turned down.

All were rejected, the board said, because they "do not qualify" under the seven-point local pupil assignment plan that Alexandria adopted to screen Negro applicants.

The next step in the Alexandria case is for the rejected Negro students to appeal the school board's action to Federal Judge Albert U. Bryan.

At Richmond, Gov. J. Lindsay Almond, Jr., conferred with State legal, education and fiscal officials, apparently on the tuition grant plan he is expected to present to a special segregation session of the Legislature that meets Wednesday to seek a way to continue the State's massive resistance to integration.

The enactment of laws providing a constitutional manner of using public funds to provide tuition grants for the private schooling of children, an alternative to integrated public schools, is one of two proposals the Governor is expected to make to the General Assembly.

The other is that the State's compulsory school attendance law be repealed—an action apparently designed to make it easier for localities to convert from public to private education.

A decision that could have vital bearing on the special Assembly session was deferred by U. S. District Judge Walter E. Hoffman in Norfolk. He said at the conclusion of a hearing tonight that he would announce at 4 P. M. tomorrow whether he would restrain Norfolk City Council from cutting off funds for all public school grades above the sixth, effective Feb. 2.

If Hoffman rules out the cut off plan, Norfolk would appear to have no means with which to block the reopening and integration of six white secondary schools closed down last September by the State to avert race mixing. Eighty nine white parents and students had asked Hoffman to block the council plan.

In Washington, the Government announced it would set up an integrated school next month for 500 Navy children who live on the Norfolk, Va., naval base unless Norfolk's closed public schools are reopened before then.

Charlottesville Schools Reopen as Segregated

By ALEX R. PRESTON
Star Staff Writer

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Feb. 4.—The public schools closed by the State last September when 12 Negro children were ordered admitted quietly opened their doors on a segregated basis to about 10,000 white boys and girls today.

Enrollment of the Negro children has been delayed by a Federal court, probably until next September, to give the school board time to perfect the outlines of a non-discriminatory pupil assignment plan.

About 600 students at Venable Elementary School and more than 800 at Lane High School attended their last private classes yesterday in basements of homes, churches and public buildings. Most appeared to be glad of the return to public schools.

Gaby Hall, a senior girl at Lane High School, said, "I'm glad to be going back. No more Saturday classes."

Under the temporary high school program, students have been schooled on one different subject each day, six days a week. Classes lasted five hours.

Instruction reverted to a five-day, six-period system at Lane today.

In the meantime, special tutoring was being set up for the 12 Negro children who returned to Burley High School and Jefferson Elementary School so they would not lose their qualifying status to enter the white schools in the fall.

Chief Judge Simon E. Sobeloff of the the United States Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals last Thursday suspended an order by District Judge John Paul to admit the Negro children. But as a condition, he required the school board to draft an assignment plan, acceptable to Judge Paul, within 20 days.

Plan Outlined

Submitted to Judge Paul was a resolution of the school board last week outlining the basis of the plan.

School Supt. Fendall R. Ellis said today there has been no opportunity to work out details of the plan because City Attorney John S. Battle, jr., who represented the board before Judge Sobeloff, has not been in the city since Thursday's hearing in Baltimore.

The next meeting of the school board is scheduled for February 12.

"I rather doubt we will meet with Mr. Battle prior to that date," Mr. Ellis said.

In general, the school board's resolutions submitted to the appeals court judge proposed to set up geographical districts for school assignments, with race not a factor.

Any student who objected to his school assignment by the school superintendent, under the plan outlined would have to submit to certain scholastic achievement tests.

Venable children, whose enrollment totaled 615 last June, have been attending classes in 15 basements in private homes set up by the Parents Committee for Emergency Schooling and in Robert E. Lee School.

14d(1) 1959 VIRGINIA FAIRFAX

Negro Pupils' Lawyers Ask Fairfax School Plan Facts

Post p.10A

Washington D.C.

June 8 1959

Attorneys for Negro students seeking admission to white schools in Fairfax County want to know more about the School Board's desegregation plan before taking their case to court.

The School Board announced Saturday that it had adopted a voluntary desegregation plan but refused to give details.

"As long as they don't announce the plan," said attorney Frank D. Reeves, "it can have no effect on our thinking. It could mean 'We will not admit Negroes until 1980'."

Reeves said parents of 26 Negro applicants have authorized all legal steps needed to win non-segregated schooling for their children this fall, but emphasized that he is still seeking "satisfactory adjustment of the situation without litigation."

Thus the question of whether Fairfax will be the scene of another legal battle over desegregation appeared to depend on whether the School Board will discuss its plan and, if so, whether the plan goes far enough to persuade Negro parents to wait for it to take effect.

School officials said the plan would not take effect until next March when the County can again assume pupil placement powers under State laws.

Reeves emphasized that he is not urging public disclosure of the plan, or even revelation of its details to Negro attorneys. He explained that he merely wants enough information about the plan to make a decision on whether to file suit.

Regardless of what the School Board does, Reeves said, a decision will be reached within a few days. Decision to withhold filing suit would have to be based on far more information than he now has.

The mere fact that t he Board has a plan, he said, "sounds pretty much like an invitation (to file suit)," which those involved are "reluctant to accept—not unwilling to accept."

The School Board yesterday received official notice from the State Pupil Placement Board that the 26 Negro applicants for white schools in Fairfax had been placed in Negro schools nearest their homes.

Fairfax School Plan Attacked By Republicans

GOP Calls Program Premature, Sees Danger of Assembly Action

By Muriel Guinn
Staff Reporter

The desegregation plan of the Fairfax County School Board became a political issue yesterday.

Two incumbent Republican Supervisors and three GOP candidates for the Board of Supervisors issued a statement attacking the School Board for adopting the plan and urging that the plan be rescinded.

The statement was signed by Supervisors A. Claiborne Leigh, Dranesville District, and William H. Moss, Lee District; and by candidates Glen Burkland, Providence District; Robert C. Cotten, Falls Church District, and John C. Harris, Mount Vernon District.

The statement said Republican Supervisor Richard P. Ovenshine was out of town and could not be reached to comment on the School Board's plan.

Plan Not Announced

The School Board has not officially made public its desegregation plan which was adopted a week ago. But it has been learned unofficially that the plan proposes to start desegregation in the first grade next year and proceed with desegregation of an additional grade each year until all 12 grades are integrated.

The GOP statement yesterday noted that under the existing Perrow "Freedom of Choice" program adopted by the iVrginia General Assembly, localities cannot adopt desegregation plans until next March.

Even then, the statement says, the School Board cannot adopt a desegregation plan until the Board of Supervisors enacts enabling legislation.

The Republicans said they believe that "any action by school authorities at this time to embark upon a possibly illegal type of assignment plan may result in action by the General Assembly which might deny us the benefits of the Perrow legislation and possibly restrict or even eliminate public education in Virginia."

Must Await State Rules

The resolution adds that any plan for pupil assignment is required by State law "to be supplemental to and not inconsistent with rules and regulations concerning assignment which are required to be adopted but which have not yet been adopted by the State Board of Education."

The Republicans' statement made no reference to the 1954 desegregation ruling of the Supreme Court. In response to a question, Moss said he and his colleagues "realize we have no choice except eventual compliance" with the Supreme Court decision.

Moss said the GOP fears adoption of a desegregation plan now might cause the General Assembly to retaliate against Fairfax County as it did earlier against Arlington. The General Assembly took away Arlington's elected School Board after that Board announced it had adopted a voluntary desegregation plan.

Leigh and Moss said they will bring a resolution before a meeting of the Supervisors Wednesday demanding that the School Board scrap its desegregation plan.

Two Democrats Agree

A poll made by newsman showed that two Democratic Supervisors, Stuart DeBell and Thomas S. Gray, agree that the School Board acted prematurely.

However, Democratic Supervisor Anne Wilkins said the principal features of the desegregation plan "sound excellent" to her.

"When the State Pupil Placement Board rejected the applications of 26 Negro students to attend white schools it became obvious there would be a court suit and equally obvious that the School Board would need a plan in court," she added. She called the GOP statement "purely a political red herring."

Lawyers for the Negro applicants announced Saturday they intended to file suit in Federal Court to obtain admission to white schools in the county. The suit is expected to be filed this week.

Neighboring Arlington and Alexandria desegregated their schools under court order during the last school year without incident.

DeBell said yesterday he has invited the County School Board to meet with the Supervisors Wednesday to discuss the desegregation problem.

School Plan Kept Secret By Fairfax

Negro Attorney To File Suit for 26 Pupil-Clients

By Susanna McBee
Staff Reporter

The Fairfax County School Board refused yesterday to discuss its new desegregation plan with a Negro attorney who pleaded for "sufficient information" to avoid bringing suit in Federal Court.

Frank D. Reeves, representing 26 Negroes whose applications to white schools have been rejected, said, "The board has left us with no alternative. if we are to pursue our rights, but to go to court. We will file suit in the next two or three days."

Earlier, the board barred County Supervisor William H. Moss from its closed session. Moss said the board "acted in error" by adopting a plan without discussing it with the supervisors. Later the board decided to meet with the supervisors this week.

Prince Edward determined to keep desegregated schools closed. Page A14

Only 112 white students register for Warren County High. Page A15

Before Reeves addressed the board in open session, acting chairman Theodore S. Heriot said members would continue their secrecy on details and reasons for refusing to reveal the plan.

Start in First Grade

However, several school and county officials said the plan would start desegregation in the fall of 1960 in the first grade, proceeding a grade a year until all 12 grades are included. The program was adopted in closed session Aug. 8, reportedly by a 4-2 vote.

The plan has features similar to one suggested by the County Federation of Civic Associations. Pupil assignment would be based primarily on geographic considerations, sources said, but would include academic achievement and psychological factors.

Some school officials said the plan may allow some desegregation in all grades in less than 12 years. They said transfer requests in other grades may be considered along with those in the grade scheduled for desegregation.

One official said the reason for secrecy is "pressure from Richmond." Attorney General Albertis S. Harrison reportedly asked the Board not to reveal its plan. There is fear that the delicate balance in the General Assembly which favored the "freedom of choice" laws in April might be upset next year if legislators are angered by Fairfax.

Wanted No Litigation

The new laws are effective in March will give localities own pupil assignments. Now that power is vested with the State Placement Board.

Reeves told the Board his purpose in coming was to "achieve the constitutional right of our clients without litigation. We thought it would be possible in Fairfax County to accomplish desegregation on a voluntary basis."

Reeves said, "Accomplishment of desegregation can better be done on the basis of some plan or organized program to make the adjustment . . ." He added, "We think there is little doubt of the outcome of any litigation" and its outcome "might well be inconsistent with any planned program you might have.

"We are authorized to file suit and have not done so in the hope you would give us sufficient information on your plan to let us discuss it with our clients so they might agree on it or on some modification of it."

Show of Good Faith

Questioned by Board Member Robert F. Davis, Reeves said, "We believe that any plan showing good faith represents recognition on the part of the School Board that there shall be desegregation and an orderly transition from segregation to desegregation which can be achieved as quickly as possible considering administrative problems."

Davis said, "We don't want to announce our plan and have someone sharpshoot at it."

Reeves replied, the Board should not "presume that there is harm in exposing its plan to public criticism and consideration. The most effective procedure in having public acceptance would be to expose it. Let the people raise questions, make suggestions, and voice criticisms."

The attorney said it would be more profitable to make adjustments before the Board has to put its plan into effect.

Board member Clyde W. Gleason asked if the Court might not be a better "arena" for working out an amicable solution. Reeves answered "Any resolution of the problem without court action is best for all parties concerned."

Rights Not Happiness

Davis said the reason for the gradual nature of the plan is consideration of Negro students' happiness in being transferred to other schools. Reeves said, "That's why we would like to settle this out of court—in court you deal only in legal rights, not happiness."

Moss, who refused to address the board in open session, said he had come to talk informally. He also represented Supervisors Stuart T. De Bell, Richard P. Ovenshine and A. Claiborne Leigh.

Moss said the plan is "the most important decision in the county in the last 40 years. It has more physical, moral and financial impact than any other decision and will affect every person in the county. The supervisors should not have been bypassed."

Fairfax to Learn Desegregation Plan

Washington, D.C.

School Head Agrees to Reveal 'Secret' to County Supervisors

Thurs. 8-13-59
91-B

The acting chairman of the Fairfax County School Board said today he would be glad to tell the Board of Supervisors about the school desegregation plan and why it is being kept secret.

"There's no reason to hide it from them," said Theodore S. Heriot, vice chairman of the school board. Samuel S. Solomon, school board chairman, is out of town until Tuesday.

Mr. Heriot commented on the supervisors' suggestion yesterday that the school board "clarify" the desegregation plan, which was announced last Saturday. School board members have declined previously to discuss the details or to tell why the details were not being made public.

Mr. Heriot said he did not see any reason why the supervisors should not know "as officials of the county."

"I would be very glad to discuss it with the chairman of the Board of Supervisors," Mr. Heriot added.

"They're like everybody else. They'd like to know, too," he said.

Mr. Heriot said he would tell the supervisors why school officials feel secrecy is necessary, and would tell them details of the plan if requested.

Special Meeting

The suggestion that the school board clarify its policy was made at a special meeting of the supervisors. The meeting was called only for routine county matters that required the official stamp of the board.

Because it was a special meeting, the board could act officially only on the routine matters before it.

But discussion of the desegregation plan was started by Supervisor Thomas S. Gray, who said he thought the "people should know the reasons why" the plan was being kept secret.

Mr. Gray stressed that "there is no conflict" with the school board but that he would like to know the reasons.

Fairfax County has had requests for 26 Negro students to enter white schools this fall. Under existing law, assignments are under the authority of the State Pupil Placement Board.

Suit Threatened

The State board has failed to approve the applications and Negro attorneys have threatened to file suit in Alexandria Federal Court to gain admission of the students.

The recently adopted Perrow "freedom of choice" program will give local school boards authority to make their pupil assignments next March, if the local boards want such control.

Mr. Gray, who said he had received many telephone calls from persons who wanted to know why the plan was being kept secret, said: "Any public body in this county that takes action and keeps it secret is taking improper action."

Supervisor R. P. Ovenshine retorted that "there is no urgency now that requires discussion" of any desegregation plan.

"The school board is responsible for the schools, not this board," Gen. Ovenshine said, adding: "I think we should give them the respect to which they are entitled."

Stuart DeBell, chairman of the Board of Supervisors, told the other board members 'People call me and I can't tell them why" the school board is not disclosing the plan.

"Maybe the school board does have a real good reason," Mr. DeBell said, explaining that he would "just like to know."

Long Discussion Seen

Both Gen. Ovenshine and Supervisor William H. Moss said such a request for information from the school board could lead to long public discussion at the next special meeting of the supervisors at 3 p.m. next Wednesday.

"This is going to trigger a full attendance," Mr. Moss said. Gen. Ovenshine said discussion would be "perhaps acrimonious."

Board members finally agreed informally to have Mr. DeBell talk things over with the chairman of the school board and get some clairification on policy.

The supervisors also decided to discuss next Wednesday:

The possibility of continuing the board of inquiry on Fairfax County Hospital.

The State's policy of assigning convicts to State road camps and prisoner security in the camps.

The road camp question was brought up by Supervisor A. Claiborne Leigh. Mr. Lee reminded board members that two prisoners from road camp 30 in Fairfax County—James E. Hall, a convicted murderer and Connie E. Plott, a convicted forger—had kidnapped 79-year-old Peter Neilson of McLean only recently. Mr. Neilson was released in Pennsylvania and the convicts recaptured.

Virginia Rejects Japanese Teacher; Race Issue Raised

FALLS CHURCH, Va. (AP)—A teacher of Japanese descent says her application for a job in the Falls Church schools was rejected solely because of her race.

Mrs. Yukiko Tamashiro, 35, made the statement Monday night in response to questions about a story on the situation in the Northern Virginia Sun of nearby Arlington.

She quoted school Supt. Irvin Schmitt as saying she had lost out "simply because I am not a Caucasian."

Mrs. Tamashiro is a third-generation American born in Hawaii. She holds bachelor's and master's degrees from Wheaton College in Illinois, has done graduate work at New York University, and taught for two years in Middletown, N.Y., before moving here last February.

Virginia To Integrate First Schools Today; Peace Appeals Voiced

Many Of Norfolk's Students Are Expected To Stay Away

By MORRIS CUNNINGHAM
Staff Writer

NORFOLK, Va., Feb. 1.—A considerable number of Norfolk's public school students are expected to stay away Monday when six schools open on an integrated basis.

City School Supt. J. J. Brewbaker said, at the most, he expects no more than 75 per cent of the 9,709 students in the six junior and senior high schools to be on hand.

As an indication, only about 150 of the 885 students in the Oscar F. Smith Night School, a private institution, have indicated they will re-enter public schools.

There was little evidence Sunday night as to what the situation will be when schools open Monday morning. The "man on the street," who usually has an opinion on everything, just wasn't talking. Even the taxi drivers were silent in the face of questions from out-of-town newsmen.

Segregation Sources Silent

Pro-segregation leaders could not be reached for comment Sunday night, and there were indications they might be in conference somewhere.

There has been little overt sign of disorder since the schools were ordered re-opened on an integrated basis. However, it was learned a cross was burned in front of Norview High School last Thursday night. The incident was not reported in Norfolk newspapers.

The Virginia Legislature will be in session in Richmond Monday with a watchful eye on the situations at Norfolk and Arlington. Any trouble is likely to send pro-segregation leaders into action with proposals to adopt new measures to continue segregation of schools.

If trouble arises here, the most likely place appeared to be Norview Junior High and Norview Senior High, which are urban area where Negro and white residential areas meet. Five of the 17 Negroes seeking admission will enter Norview Junior High, and seven will enter Norview Senior High. Two Negroes will enter Blair Junior High, and each of the three other schools will receive only one Negro student apiece.

Police Leaves Canceled

City as well as state police canceled all leaves and alerted their full forces for possible trouble. State police in plain clothes will be on duty. In addition, FBI agents and representatives of the Federal Civil Rights Commission are expected to be active.

Mrs. W. T. Mason Jr., a Negro leader of the bi-racial Women's Council for Inter-racial Co-operation, said the Negro pupils will go to their schools individually with their parents. "I have the utmost confidence," she said "that integration will proceed in an orderly, mature and accepted fashion."

Norfolk Sets Integration For Monday

Charlottesville Desegregation Is Postponed

From Wire Dispatches

The Norfolk School Board yesterday ordered that six schools closed since September under Virginia's now-defunct anti-integration laws be opened Monday.

When the school bells ring Monday at 9 a.m. white and Negro children will enter public schools together for the first time in Virginia's history.

Seventeen Negro pupils were enrolled in the city's six white secondary schools, attended by 10,000 white pupils, last fall. The schools were closed immediately under the State's massive-resistance laws, which have since been invalidated by State and United States courts.

Pleads for Understanding

The School Board yesterday adopted a resolution directing School Superintendent John J. Brewbaker to take the necessary action to open the three high schools and three junior high schools.

Brewbaker immediately issued a statement urging pupils, parents, and all citizens to "show sincere understanding and cooperation to assure a smooth, orderly opening of these closed schools."

As the Norfolk board was acting, Simon Sobeloff, chief judge of the U. S. Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, postponed mandatory integration in two public schools in Charlottesville, Va. A spokesman for the Charlottesville School Board said the schools probably would reopen next week on a segregated basis.

Plan Dus In 20 Days

Charlottesville had been scheduled to admit 12 Negroes to two schools Monday, but Sobeloff ruled that the City could delay their enrollment while it drew up a plan for desegregation.

Charlottesville City Attorney John S. Battle, Jr., said the City would present its desegregation plan to Federal District Judge John Paul in Harrisonburg, Va., within 20 days.

Sobeloff denied the request of Arlington school officials for a stay of integration. Arlington, just across the Potomac from Washington, has been told to admit four Negro students to a white junior high school Monday.

Arlington School To Open

Ray E. Reid, Arlington school superintendent, said the school, Stratford Junior High School, will be opened on schedule Monday.

"We have made detailed plans for the opening and I expect no trouble," Reid said.

In Richmond, Governor J. Lindsay Almond, Jr., warned a group of die-hard segregationists from the General Assembly that he would veto a package of bills they had hastily introduced to frustrate school integration Monday.

Almond, who is trying to shift the State's anti-integration policy from "massive" to "passive" resistance, reportedly told the segregationists that he could not support slap-dash measures to thwart the federal courts.

Asks God's Blessing

The Norfolk School Board acted less than an hour after it was assured by City Attorney Leonard H. Davis that the City Council must make school funds available for all the City's schools.

A Federal Court this week had prohibited the City Council from cutting off funds for all secondary schools, which the Council had proposed to do effective Sunday.

Mayor W. Fred Duckworth announced at the Council meeting that the Council is now "out of the school business."

Paul T. Schweitzer, chairman of the School Board, opened the board meeting several minutes later with a prayer for God's blessing and guidance for school children, parents, and teachers as Norfolk enters "a new phase" of school operations. Schweitzer said there has never been a time when the City stood in greater need of divine guidance.

Law-enforcement officials said they did not expect violence when the schools open, but that the Police Department was ready to deal with any emergency. They said police have been undergoing special training since last summer to be prepared for possible disorder.

Refers to Little Rock

"I would love to see Norfolk develop into an opposite of Little Rock on this," said Police Chief Harold Anderson. He referred to disorders that followed integration of Central High School in the Arkansas City.

Of the 17 Negro pupils enrolled in white schools in Norfolk by the School Board in September in compliance with a Federal Court desegregation order, seven were assigned to Norview High School, one each to Granby and Maury high schools, five to Norview Junior High School, two to Blair Junior High School, and one to Northside Junior High School.

Monday's activities will be confined to registration and class assignments. Tuesday will be a full day of classes.

Norfolk Will 'Mix' 6 Schools

17 Negroes Start Classes on Monday

NORFOLK, Va. —(AP)— The Norfolk School Board announced Thursday that the city's six closed schools will open Monday on an integrated basis.

Three high and three junior high schools have been closed since September to avoid integration. However, the state laws under which their doors were locked have been nullified by state and federal court decisions.

The reopening will bring the first Negro children in Virginia history—17 in all—into white public school classrooms.

The school board's announcement came immediately after the City Council assured it of operating funds. An earlier council resolution to cut off school monies, fell before Federal Court orders.

The schools affected are Maury, Granby, and Norview High School and Norview, Blair and Northside Junior Highs. A total of 10,000 white children are affected. However, only about 75 per cent of that number are expected to return to school Monday since many are attending school elsewhere or have dropped it altogether.

Meanwhile a Federal Circuit Court judge in Baltimore postponed mandatory integration at two Charlottesville, Va., public schools. A spokesman for the school board said the schools probably would open next week on a segregated basis.

Affected are 1,700 students at Venable Elementary and Lane High Schools. Their schools were closed by the state after a Federal Court judge ordered the admission of 12 Negro students last September.

The decision by Chief Judge Simon E. Sobeloff of the Fourth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals was disclosed by John S. Battle Jr. counsel for the Charlottesville School Board.

Federal Tribunal Rules Closings Illegal and Hits 'Evasive Tactics'

Excerpts from Federal court opinion are on Page 29.

By ANTHONY LEWIS

Special to The New York Times

NORFOLK, Va., Jan. 19—A Federal Court held today that the closing of selected public schools to avoid racial integration violated the United States Constitution.

Such school closings, the court said, discriminate against both the white children shut out of their classes and the Negroes seeking admission. The court also condemned other "evasive tactics" taken or proposed to preserve school segregation.

The decision of the special three-judge court was unanimous.

The real significance of the decision lies in its long-run effects throughout the South. It is the first case holding that the Federal Constitution prohibits a state from keeping some schools open while closing others over the racial issue.

The principle could apply, for example, in Little Rock, where all the high schools are closed. A suit has just been brought in Federal Court there to reopen the schools, alon gprecisely the lines of the Norfolk case.

The decision of a three-judge District Court can ordinarily be appealed directly to the Supreme Court. But there is some question whether that will be possible here, because the issue in the case-the closed schools—may be a dead one before any appeal can be taken.

The three-judge district Court will meet again in Richmond on Friday to issue a formal decree. Such a decree would permanently enjoin Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. and other state officials from enforcing the school-closing laws.

The Issue Would Be Moot

But the expectation tonight was that the Governor, in response to the state and Federal decisions, would soon return the closed schools to control of local school boards. That action would presumably make the Federal case against him moot, or a dead issue. The Supreme Court does not review most cases.

Six Norfolk schools, with 9,900 children enrolled, have been closed since the start of the fall term. About 3,000 other children have been shut out of schools in Charlottesville and Front Royal.

Officials of the Norfolk School Board said tonight that they hoped to reopen the schools here "as soon as practicable." The board was expected to call for a reopening at the start of the second school term, a week from Monday.

The City Council, which takes a pro-segregation view and has differed from the school board, voted last week to withhold funds in the next term from all grades above the sixth.

A suit has already been brought in Federal Court to stop this cut-off of funds. It is to be argued next Monday. The prevailing view tonight was that today's opinion will clearly rule out the City Council action.

The three-judge court said that "schemes or devices looking to the cut-off of funds for schools or grades affected by the mixing of races, or the closing or elimination of specific grades in such schools, are evasive tactics which have no standing under the law."

Decision for the Court

The court was composed of Chief Judge Simon E. Sobeloff and Judge Clement F. Haynsworth of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit and District Judge Walter E. Hoffman of Norfolk. Their opinion was per curiam for the whole court.

The opinion relied on a 1954 Supreme Court decision holding public school segregation unConstitutional, Brown v. Board of Education, and on the high court's strongly worded opinion last fall in the Little Rock case Cooper v. Aaron.

Following those cases, the District Court held the Norfolk school closings a violation of two provisions of the Fourteenth Amendmant. These are the provisions guaranteeing due process of law and the equal protection of the laws.

Virginia is not obligated by the Federal Constitution to maintain a system of public schools, the court said. But if it does, the court held, it cannot close some schools because they are under orders to integrate "and at the same time keep other public schools throughout the state open on a segregated basis."

The opinion went on that while the state uses public funds or "participates" in a school system of any kind, "no one public school or grade in Virginia may be closed to avoid the effect of the law of the land as interpreted by the Supreme Court."

The District Court warned also that if Virginia "withdraws from the business of educating its children," the same Constitutional principles would apply to any county or city that took over and "directly or indirectly" maintained a school system.

The Norfolk case was brought by twenty-six white parents and children who have been closed out of schools. They were represented by Edmund Campbell of Arlington, Va., and Archie Boswell of Norfolk, the state by Attorney General Albertis S. Harrison Jr.

The court said that between 4,200 and 4,500 of the locked-out children had been enrolled in private tutoring groups and that about 2,500 children had transferred to other schools, public and private. Between 2,500 and 3,000 "are receiving no education or tutoring of any kind," the court said.

The six Norfolk schools were closed after final Federal Court orders requiring them to admit seventeen Negro children.

Students Tell How It Felt On Norfolk School Opening

NORFOLK, Va. — The five who entered Norfolk Junior High, Edward Jordan, Lavera Forbes, James Turner, Claudia Wellington and Patricia Turner, reported that they not only were not molested, but also heard no insulting remark nor noted any evidence of disrespect.

They said that the teachers and students treated them as if they had been attending the school for a long period.

CLAUDIA Wellington said:

"They treated us just as though we were all the same—just students and that's what we want to be. I am sure that we are going to make friends."

When the morning session (the only one for the first day of the semester) ended at Norview Junior high and students poured out, photographers went into action. White students crowded about the five and some were heard to remark: "Why can't you take our pictures, too?"

NO CLASSES were held in the morning. All students were acquainted with the school's facilities, told how to change classes, and the type of deportment expected of them.

At Norview High school following dismissal for the day radio and television crews from local stations and the national systems set up business and interviewed white students on their reaction to integration.

A BLONDE girl emphatically stated that she favored the changing school pattern.

"They (the Negro students") have just as many rights as we have," she asserted. Why shouldn't they come into the schools nearest them to get into the courses they want just as we do?"

Mrs. W. T. Mason, leader in the tutoring program attended by the 17 Negro pupils since September, toured all of the schools.

"I VISITED every principal," she said, and "They were wonderful." She stated that one principal ordered out a group of young white girls and boys loitering in a hallway after they told him that they were not students.

Prince Edward Is Deadly Serious on Keeping Schools Closed

By Jean M. White
Staff Reporter

FARMVILLE, Va., Oct. 10 — A deadly serious waiting game is being played here. The stakes are high: A community's public schools and the education of its future citizens.

Prince Edward County, set in the heart of Southside Virginia's peaceful, rural tobacco-land, now finds itself a testing ground for the South's most die-hard stand against school desegration, however slow and deliberate. It has become the first community to abandon its entire public school system when faced with a court order to make a start toward desegration.

"No trespassing" signs have been tacked up on the walls and grounds of the 20 public schools in the County by the School Board.

With the 1959-60 school term already a month under way, no school children, white or Negro, are trespassing on public school property.

On one side in the waiting game, white citizens are working determinedly to operate a good private school system for some 1475 white youngsters and to raise the $310,000 needed this year. On the other side, parents of many of the 1700 school-less Negro children seem willing to sacrifice a year of their schooling if it will mean desegregated public schools.

Legal Move Imminent

In the end, it probably will take court action to decide what happens to the padlocked public schools of Prince Edward County.

Oliver W. Hill, attorney for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, has been saying for several weeks now that a legal move is "imminent" to try to force Prince Edward to reopen its public schools. Hill has not tipped his legal hand yet. One route of appeal might well be under a provision in the State Constitution requiring Virginia to maintain an efficient public school system.

The County itself has a legal move going. It has appealed to the Supreme Court to set aside an Appeals Court ruling that it must begin desegregating its schools this fall. This ruling overturned an earlier decision by Federal Judge Sterling Hutcheson, who gave the County until 1965 to start desegregation.

Meanwhile, Prince Edward schools remain closed, and the waiting game goes on.

"We kept telling people we would close our schools rather than admit one Negro into white classes, and no one believed us. Well, we did," one of the leaders of the white parents said this week.

No School Tax Levied

The white citizens did just that. After the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals ordered the desegregation start this September, the County Supervisors voted unanimously not to levy any taxes for the support of public schools.

Ironically, the only County money allotted for schools was $30,500 for debt service on money borrowed to build the R. R. Moton High School for Negroes opened in 1953 as a "separate but equal" facility.

It was a strike by Negro students at the old Moton School in 1951 that started off the Prince Edward school desegregation case in the courts. It became one of the five original cases in the historic Supreme Court ruling of May 17, 1954.

By now, all the students in the original appeal have been graduated. And, ironically, no Negro student has yet applied to enter a white school this term in Prince Edward County.

No one is happy that the public schools in the County are shut down. Both white and Negro leaders agree that it is a "tragic" situation for a community not to have public education facilities. But so far there has been no organized voice, however small, seeking to reopen the public schools.

Issue More Important

In other Virginia cities where some of the schools were closed for a while—Norfolk, Charlottesville, Warren County save-our-schools groups sprang up quickly.

The semi-weekly Farmville Herald, a powerful voice in Prince Edward, has said editorially that the issue here "more important than public education."

The Negro parents have made no move to set up private classes for their youngsters. They could apply for state-aided tuition grants of up to $250. Observers feel the NAACP has discouraged any formal private schooling setup in order to take a stronger case into the courts of the plea the Negroes have been deprived of a public education.

To keep the youngsters busy, some supervised play groups are being organized and may get started next week.

The white parents also have eschewed the tuition grants, the system has not yet been tested in the courts, and the leaders of the Prince Edward School Foundation feel the grants could make them legally vulnerable for using public funds.

So far, the Foundation has raised in cash almost half of the $310,000 goal, according E. Louis Dahl, treasurer. Nearly all the rest has been pledged, some on a monthly basis. Many parents have paid over their tax savings after the real estate levy was halved, he said.

Vote to Sell Schools

Foundation leaders say they are prepared to run a private school system "indefinitely." There has been talk about calling for a referendum to force sale of the padlocked white schools as surplus if the waiting game continues beyond this year.

Prince Edward has about 16,000 residents, about half white and half Negro. Farmville, the county seat, is the trading and social center of the Southside's tobacco belt. It is a prosperous town of 5000, and its white business and civic leaders live an unhurried life in their ample homes with big porches and shaded lawns.

Like residents of many small towns, there is a spirit of togetherness among the white citizens. They pitched in to build a $50,000 swimming pool and also a night-lighted Little League baseball park.

In just a few months, they have done a remarkable job in setting up a private school system for the white youngsters.

"I get angry when people call it a makeshift system," said Roy R. Pearson, the Foundation director.

Meet in Churches

Pearson, a retired oil company executive, is chairman of the County School Board. He now runs a private school system with two high schools (called upper academies—the principals become headmasters) and six grade schools (lower academies) in 26 buildings through the county. The Foundation has hired 66 teachers, most of whom taught in the public schools last year. They are being paid the same salaries they received then.

In rural areas, classes meet in the Sunday school departments of churches. In Farmville, churches, stores, a former blacksmith shop and private homes are being used.

"We're offering every course the students got in public schools last year except physical education," Parsons explained.

The Foundation has rented 30 typewriters for business students. Power tools have been lent for vocational arts classes in the old blacksmith shop. A second-floor room of a small building on North st. is being converted into a chemistry laboratory.

Parents pitched in to make blackboards and coat racks and install lights, extra washrooms, and fire escapes, Pearson said. They bought 14 school buses to transport the youngsters to classes. Volunteer mechanics keep them running.

A plea for books for a high school library brought in some 10,000, Kate O'Brien, the librarian, reports. Included was a set of the 1959 Encyclopedia Britannica from Sen. A. Willis Robertson (D-Va.).

Pearson estimates it will cost about $225 a pupil to run the private school system this year, most of it going for teachers' salaries.

So far, 1475 white students are enrolled out of some 1530 expected by school officials. They go to classes from 8:30 to 1:30 without any break for lunch.

Parents More Interested

"They are getting a good education," Pearson said. "It's not makeshift. We have fine teachers and alert, interested pupils. The parents now are more interested in the schools and see that their kids study."

The county's Negro youngsters cannot go to school unless they leave the county.

So far, about 55 seniors and juniors have been sent to North Carolina to attend the high school division of Kittrell College.

They were given $150 scholarships there and the Negro Prince Edward County Christian Association is tryin to raise the $210 each for other expenses.

Charges Negroes Denied Free Schooling

NAACP Held At Fault For No Negro Schools In Prince Edward County

By MORRIS CUNNINGHAM

WASHINGTON, Oct. 3.—The most critical spot in the school desegregation picture in the South appears now to be Prince Edward County, Va.

The rural Virginia county has gone entirely out of the school business rather than comply with a Federal court order to integrate.

All of the county's public schools have been closed. And all local taxes for school purposes have been repealed.

The county is located in Southern Virginia near the North Carolina border. Negroes comprise a majority of the population.

Prince Edward County was one of the five localities involved in the Supreme Court's original school desegregation decision in 1954. And it likewise was directly involved in the court's "with all deliberate speed" order of 1955.

Mr. Cunningham

For a time, however, there was no move for a showdown in the county, partly because at the very outset white leaders firmly avowed they would close the schools before they would yield to integration. They even went so far as to make some preliminary plans.

Influential white friends of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People counseled caution. They urged the NAACP to push integration in other parts of Virginia, but to leave Prince Edward County alone for awhile.

In the face of this advice, NAACP lawyers went into Federal Court and demanded immediate compliance. A Federal district judge postponed integration until 1965. But his order was overturned by the Fourth United States Circuit Court of Appeals, and this was affirmed by the Supreme Court.

No Negro Schools

With that, the county closed all of its public schools. White students entered private schools which already had been arranged by the specially-established Prince Edward School Foundation. The 1,700 Negro students were left without schools.

Secretary Arthur S. Flemming of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare promptly assailed the county's treatment of the Negro children as "indefensible." He charged the county was denying the Negro students an education and had "deprived them of their right to free schools."

The Richmond News Leader replied to Mr. Flemming's charge editorially, saying:

"When the county, through its established government, decided to abandon public schools, all citizens of the county became equally free to go their own way.

"This decision was announced in May. At any time during the past four months the Negro people of Prince Edward could have done precisely what the white people have done: They could have exhibited some gumption, some leadership, some pride in seeing their children educated, some get up and hustle. They could have organized an educational corporation (white neighbors in Farmville sincerely offered their help in such a venture). They could have hired teachers (there were more than 70 Negro teachers available in the county for employment). They could have arranged the use of church facilities (the county has at least a dozen well-established Negro churches).

'NAACP Seeks Martyrs'

"More than anything, they could have applied for state tuition grants that would have assured them the necessary funds—up to about $350,000—to maintain a private educational program. And if this had seemed insufficient, they could have solicited financial help from rich and powerful sympathizers.

"They did none of these things. On one recent Saturday afternoon, the white people of Farmville were out in the rain laying cinder blocks for a four-room addition to a church Sunday school; the white people were carrying in books for a library; the white people were making desks and tables for an elementary school. And their colored brethren were loafing on Main Street, taking their ease in Zion (a Negro community) . . .

"The explanation given in the county," the editorial continued, "is that every time two or three Negroes have so much as ventured a gesture toward obtaining a tuition grant or organizing a private school, the NAACP, through its local leadership, has put a foot down. It is said the NAACP would rather see these 1,700 Negro children have no education, than to see them educated in private schools established by members of their own race. They make better martyrs that way. If this be true, then the blame for the plight of these colored children falls not on the courts, and not on the county government, and not the white parents, but squarely on the NAACP."

'Whites Willing To Help'

The Richmond Times-Dispatch also editorially blamed the NAACP, charging that it "bulled ahead, despite the urgings of some of its best friends and most ardent supporters."

The Times-Dispatch said the county's whites are willing to assist the Negro citizens in establishing private schools for the Negro children.

"There is reason to believe that many Negroes in Prince Edward would welcome an opportunity to take part in financing their own system of education, if the NAACP would stop pressuring them not to do so," the Times-Dispatch said. "Lawyers in that organization have led the Prince Edward Negroes to believe that legal tricks are in the offing which will open their public schools. As of now, these attorneys have merely talked about what they are going to do in this regard. Meanwhile, the Negro children of Prince Edward sit in idleness, their fine new high school and all their other schools closed tight."

J. Barrye Wall, editor of the Farmville Herald, pointed out in a letter to the Lynchburg News that Virginia's new tuition payment plan would provide funds for the operation of private schools for Negro children.

Up To Negro Citizens

"The colored people can provide education for their children by two or three easy steps," he wrote.

"1. Form a corporation or an association under the laws of Virginia to operate a private school, either segregated or integrated.

"2. Establish a school accredited by the Virginia Department of Education, which can be done.

"3. Apply for scholarship grants offered by the State of Virginia through the Perrow Plan of Freedom of Choice.

"4. Acquire buildings for school use. These may be buildings privately owned or built, or surplus schools owned by the county. They even may be rented in the discretion of the school board."

The issue appears to be up to the Negro citizens of Prince Edward County. Until now, they have been following the leadership of the NAACP. And, as of now, their children have no schools.

New 'Private' School System Tested in Virginia

FARMVILLE, Va. — (AP) — The school year began again Thursday for 1,300 white pupils in Prince Edward County. For most of the 1,700 school age Negroes, it was just another day in a vacation that has no foreseeable end.

Thus began a unique experiment in American education—a county-wide system of private schools for white children, founded with the sole purpose of avoiding any court-ordered integration.

County supervisors this summer decided to abandon public education as the ultimate means of forestalling integration. No funds were appropriated for school operation.

As the network of private schools opened Thursday morning, the shutdown of public schools was assailed by Arthur Flemming, secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, as a repudiation of this country's "tradition of providing free education for all." The fact that no provision has been made to educate Prince Edward's Negroes, Flemming said, in Washington, "is deplorable and indefensible."

In seven of the eight private schools, the students reported to their classrooms in churches and private buildings for brief opening ceremonies. They registered, were issued textbooks, given homework assignments and dismissed. Regular classes start Monday.

Officials of the Prince Edward School Foundation pledged that the private schools would remain open all this year, and as long as necessary to avoid integration.

Meanwhile, Negro leaders in the county were quietly at work trying to raise enough money to send the Negro children to schools in other areas. Sixteen have already gone on scholarships to Kittrell College in Kittrell, N.C., a Negro junior college with a high school branch.

Virginian Tells Atlanta Of Prince Edward School Woes

By PAUL DELANEY

"There is a private foundation for white children's education, but nothing for Negroes," said Rev. A. I. Dunlap, in an interview at the World office Friday. Rev. Dunlap is vice president of the Prince Edward County Christian Association and former student of Gammon Seminary.

The schools of Prince Edward County, Va., are closed because of a Federal Court order to integrate. The school board preferred closing down rather than complying. Rev. Dunlap said his organization is trying to provide some education for junior and senior pupils.

"Eleventh and 12th grade students have been placed in schools out of the county," he said. "That age group is subject to get into trouble quicker being out of school and with their folks working."

Also helping out is a small junior college in North Carolina that can hardly fill the needs of its own community. Kittrell College has given 55 students from Farmville scholarships of $200 each, and "is in a financial crisis," says Dr. N. A. Camper, president of the school.

AME BISHOP RESPSONSIBLE

Rev. Dunlap, who is also on the staff of Kittrell as professor of religion, said that Bishop Frank M. Reed, chancellor of the AME college, is really responsible for the generous gesture of Kittrell.

Rev. Dunlap pointed out that the county offered to set up private schools for Negroes, as well as whites, but was turned down. "The county is too poor for that. The white private schools meet in inadequate buildings and put heavy burdens on the pupils and the teachers.

"They thought they would put us in a financial strain but they didn't. Actually, the businessmen of Farmville are feeling it. The 70 Negro teachers spent their money with them, but now they are gone. All the teachers that wanted jobs elsewhere got them, and are making more money."

LOW AVERAGE INCOME

Farmville is located in the "Black Belt" of Virginia. It has a population of about 40,000. Rev. Dunlap said rather dubiously that the census bureau says the ratio is 51 to 40 percent in favor of the whites. He said that the average income is about $1,700 per year for both Negroes and whites.

He stated that the Prince Edward Christian Association has received help from many organizations but is still in need of financial assistance. He says that anyone can help by sending a check or money order to the organization in care of Rev. G. Reynolds who is treasurer, and its located at 309 Franklin Street, Farmville, Va.

VIRGINIANS ENROLL FOR PRIVATE CLASSES

FARMVILLE, Va., July 27 (AP) — About four-fifths of Prince Edward County's white school-age children have signed up for private, segregated classes in September, the Prince Edward School Foundation said today.

The Prince Edward case was one of those decided by the United States Supreme Court in its 1954 desegregation decision. The Southside Virginia County has 1,570 white children of school age.

The county board of supervisors declined to appropriate any money the present fiscal year for schools. The board action came in the face of a Federal court order to desegregate public schools in September. Negro plaintiffs have appealed to the Supreme Court in an attempt to force the county to open the public schools.

DALLAS, July 27 (AP)— The school board today said each day of delay in integrating Dallas schools lessened the danger of violence.

The argument was one of several advanced in a brief prepared to answer Negros who demand integration this fall.

Negroes have requested a court roder integrating Dallas schools. Federal Judge T. Whitfield Davidson will hear their pleas Thursday.

PRIVATE SCHOOLS SPED IN VIRGINIA

Most Prince Edward County Whites Transfer—Court's Reaction Awaited

Special to The New York Times.

FARMVILLE, Va., Aug. 1—A showdown is near on whether private schooling can save segregation in Prince Edward County.

This week the Prince Edward School Foundation announced that 1,224 of the county's 1,570 white pupils had registered so far for private classes starting in September.

Plans for Negro schooling are uncertain in this tobacco-growing county of 16,000, divided almost equally between white and Negro.

B. Blanton Hanbury, president of the foundation, said the organization was "very much pleased with the progress so far."

He said that fifty-nine of last year's seventy teachers had signed up for the private schools and that $250,000 had been paid or pledged toward a budget of $300,000. He noted that twice as much classroom space as was necessary had been offered, largely in church buildings.

Hours Not Set

The foundation may set hours for classes from 7:30 A. M. to 12:30 P. M. to offer sufficient schooling without having to provide cafeterias.

The problems of the private schools are being handled by Roy R. Pearson, 53-year-old retired Far East managing director of the Standard Vacuum Oil Company.

He resigned as school board chairman to become full-time administrator for the foundation.

"He is used to tackling a big job and cutting it down to size," said Mr. Hanbury. "That's what he is doing here."

The sponsors were certain that the private school effort would succeed.

They cite the widespread support given by Prince Edward County's white residents.

Church Buildings Better

Observers point out that some of the church and organization buildings being made available outside the county seat of Farmville were better structures than the schools that would be abandoned.

Officials were confident that the curriculum would be as good as before or better.

The big unanswered question for the private school movement is its legality under broad interpretations of the United States Supreme Court's desegregation ruling.

The County Board of Supervisors has refused to appropriate funds for the public schools in the present fiscal year. The action was taken in the face of a Federal court order to desegregate the schools in September.

Negro plaintiffs have appealed to the Supreme Court to force the county to open the public schools.

Scholarships Shunned

Virginia's Legislature has set up a system of scholarships to aid private schooling in areas, such as Prince Edward County. The school foundation, however, has bypassed this program until its legality was established.

The education of Prince Edward's Negroes troubles some of the foundation officials, who have offered their administrative and legal help in setting up a similar private school system for them.

"We'd like to see them do it. We'd be glad to help them," Mr. Hanbury said.

The Negroes have not responded to this offer, it was believed, for fear of prejudicing legal action to uphold the public school system.

'WE MEAN BUSINESS'

Tradition-Steeped Virginia County Vows No Integration

P. 21 Times-Union Mon. 9-14-59

FARMVILLE, Va., Sept. 13 (AP). Here in the pine and tobacco country where the Confederacy finally collapsed 94 years ago, a resolute band of Southerners has raised a new banner of defiance.

"We are determined, absolutely determined, to maintain our way of life," says B. Blanton Hanbury. "We are not going to integrate our schools. We mean business."

Hanbury is president of the Prince Edward School Foundation, which last week opened a countywide system of eight private schools for 1,500 white children. The county abolished public education last June and padlocked 21 schools. More than 1,700 Negro children are left with no schools to attend.

Prince Edward County, and this county seat, are steeped in history. That history is important in the light of what the county has done.

Only 14 Miles

Only 14 miles from the county line is Appomattox Courthouse, where Gen. Robert E. Lee surrendered the Confederate Army of Northern Virginia to Gen. U.S. Grant on April 9, 1865. For all practical purposes, that ended the Civil War.

Two days before, Lee had stopped briefly in Farmville just after daybreak. By noon, Grant was in the town, and wrote his first two notes to Lee concerning a surrender.

Although it may not be accurate to say that the white people of Prince Edward County still are fighting the Civil War, it is a fact that for most of them their roots here go back for many generations.

The men who set up the school foundation four years ago make no bones of their claim that they are fighting their battle for the entire Southland.

'Hopes Will Be Kindled'

Roy B. Pearson, school administrator for the foundation, told 450 high school students, "If you have a successful year, the hopes of hundreds of thousands of people will be kindled."

E. Louis Dahl, foundation treasurer, said cash donations have come in from all over the South because "they think we are fighting their fight."

Mayor W. F. Watkins Jr. told the students: "This is a memorable occasion for all of us. An important day to all the people of the nation."

Virginia, these men will tell you, has had many sons who were not afraid to take a stand—Thomas Jefferson, Patrick Henry, the revered Robert E. Lee, among others.

There is more here than just the sharply etched facts of history. There is the equally forceful pattern of tradition.

Although segregation laws date back only about 60 years, some forms of segregation in Virginia are more than 300 years old.

Negroes Barred

Slavery was introduced into the colony in 1619. A decree establishing a Virginia militia in 1640 specifically barred Negroes from the right to be armed. In 1643 it was decreed that all Negro women servants from age 16 should be included in a list of taxable property.

Although legal discrimination against the Negro slowly is being knocked down in the South, social discrimination may be growing.

Dr. Francis Butler Simkins, head of the history department at Longwood College here, said in an interview:

"Segregation has increased in the South in recent years, despite the acceptance in some places of what is called 'token integration.' When I was a child in South Carolina, it was quite common for white and Negro children to play together. You never see that now."

Line Of Battle

Against this background of history, tradition and personal feeling, the men behind the private school foundation have drawn up their line of battle. They feel they have barred every door through which the federal courts could enter the picture. They are certain they have enough money for this year, and that they'll get enough to keep their plan in operation as long as necessary.

Hanbury fully expects the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People to bring suit to force the county to reopen its public schools.

And he adds that something will have to be done to help educate the county's Negro children — so long as that "something" doesn't mean integrated public schools, nor any action by the foundation that would lay it open to federal court action.

Norfolk's Appeal Also Rejected

County Closed Door In Defiance; City Tried Intimidation

P. 1 & 4

Special to Journal and Guide

WASHINGTON, D. C. The United States Supreme Court Monday rejected an appeal by Prince Edward County, Va., from an order that its schools be desegregated in September of this year.

The court's brief order leaves it standing a decision to this effect issued by the Fourth U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals last May 5. The May 5 ruling by the district tribunal had ordered the county to begin desegregation proceedings by Sept. 1959. It over-rode an earlier ruling by District Judge Sterling Hutcheson of Richmond who had granted Prince Edward seven additional years to start integration proceedings.

ACTUALLY, THE Prince Edward ruling, of last May 5, was the only one following the May 7, 1954 Supreme Court ruling to "spell out" the county's obligation.

Despite the fact that it was told to desegregate its schools in September, Prince Edward — one of the original five districts concerned in the 1954 ruling — took another tack. It closed down all of its public schools with the coming of the current school term, depriving some 3,400 pupils — both white and colored — of public education.

PRINCE EDWARD now is the site of make-shift "private" schools for some of its white school-age children and no schools at all for the colored ones.

In its appeal petition to the highest tribunal, Prince Edward had contended that the 4th District Appeals Court took away Judge Hutcheson's powers to rule in the matter and required him to "conform exactly with its notions."

THE PRINCE Edward school board contended that this ahd been done despite the May 17, 1954 ruling giving district courts broad discretion to accomplish desegregation "with all deliberate speed."

"Did this court mean that district courts should have broad discretion?" the board's appeal asked.

"IF IT DID, court of appeals school classes above the sixth ton should be reversed. If it did not, the word 'deliberate' has been removed from the phrase 'all deliberate speed'," it declared.

The court also rejected an appeal from Norfolk, Va.

NORFOLK had appealed a ruling which outlawed a local ordinance giving the city council power to close (by denying funds to them) all public school classes above the sicth grade.

Norfolk's council had passed this ordinance as a "threat" to the city's "colored" junior and senior high schools. The first desegregation ruling in Norfolk saw 17 colored pupils admitted — by Federal District Court order — to six junior and senior high schools in the city. During the interim between the court's order, the schools involved were closed under the state's then operative "massive resistance" policy.

SANER MINDS prevailed, however, and the schools were opened last February on desegregated bases. Meanwhile the council, noting that the "colored" schools had remained open while the desegregated ones had been closed, enacted the ordinance which the Supreme Court acted negatively on Monday.

In another racial case, the court denied a hearing to Joseph H. Holt Jr., Raleigh, N. C., colored student who tried without success to be transferred to a "white" school. It agreed with a lower court that Holt and his family failed to take all possible steps under state law.

Falls Church Refuses School Post to 3d-Generation Japanese-American

New York N.Y.

Special to The New York Times.

FALLS CHURCH, Va., July 28—A school teacher of Japanese descent has been refused a position in the public schools here because of her race. She was described by a school board member as "perhaps even a little better qualified than the others."

Mrs. Yukiko Tamashiro, 35 years old, said today that she did not plan to take any action over her rejection. But she said she hoped public reaction "will result in more responsible handling of any subsequent applications for teaching posts."

Mrs. Tamashiro described herself as a "sansei" or third-generation American of Japanese descent. She and her parents were born in Hawaii.

Husband an Editor

Her husband, Sam Tamashiro, picture editor of The Northern Virginia Sun in Arlington, is a Nisei, or second-generation Japanese-American. The couple has two children, Ken, 5, and Lynn, 3.

Virginia's segregation laws are mainly directed toward Negroes. They were less stringently applied to Orientals and non-white other than Negroes before the 1959 Supreme Court decision on school segregation.

Observers here could not recall a previous instance of a non-white teacher seeking a post at a white public school.

The Supreme Court ruling has led to orders for the integration of school systems in Arlington, Alexandria and Norfolk.

Lack of Law Is Seen

In Mrs. Tamashiro's case, it is believed that there is no law or court decision to stop school boards from rejecting teacher-applicants for any reason they choose.

The Tamashiros moved from Middletown, N. Y., in January to this town of 10,000 population in the suburban area of Washington.

Mrs. Tamashiro said the family's life here had been "very pleasant" and that the school board's action had been completely unexpected. The disclosure of the boards action had brought only sympathetic reactions from her neighbors, she said.

Mrs. Tamashiro has obtained a teaching position at the Green Hedges school in near-by Vienna, Va. It is a private school run by Mrs. Kenton Kilmer, daughter-in-law of the late poet, Joyce Kilmer.

Mrs. Tamashiro had taught at the Middletown high school after training at Wheaton College, at Wheaton, Ill., and at New York University.

William R. Pierce, a member of the school board until last month, said Mrs. Tamashiro's application had been submitted by the school superintendent, Irvin Schmitt. Mr. Pierce said:

"The lady's mixture of race and all that was discussed and it was the consensus of the board that nothing further should be done about her application. I felt the application was an unnecessary, gratuitous and ill-advised action at this particular time and place."

Mr. Pierce said that there were about twenty-five Negro children of school age in Falls Church and that the town sent them to Negro schools outside the town run by Fairfax County.

PRIVATE SCHOOL STUDIES START

No Classes for Negroes in Virginia County

By G. K. HODENFIELD
A.P. Education Writer

FARMVILLE, Va. (AP) — The school year began again Thursday for 1,700 white pupils in Prince Edward County. For most of the 1,700 school-age Negroes, it was just another day of a vacation that has no foreseeable end.

This began a unique experiment in American education— a county wide system of private schools for white children, founded with the sole purpose of avoiding any court-ordered integration.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS SHUT

County supervisors this summer decided to abandon public education as the ultimate means of forestalling integration. No funds were appropriated for school operation.

As the network of private schools opened Thursday morning, the shutdown of public schools was assailed by Arthur Flemming, secretary of health, education and welfare, as a repudiation of this country's "tradition of providing free education for all." The fact that no provision has been made to educate Prince Edward's Negroes, Flemming said, in Washington, "is deplorable and indefensible."

The first day of school for the white pupils was quiet and without incident. Except for the dozen or so out-of-town newsmen, it was just another late summer day in a quiet southern Virginia town of about 5,000.

ISSUED TEXTBOOKS

In seven of the eight private schools, the students reported to their classrooms in churches and private buildings for brief opening ceremonies. They registered, were issued textbooks, given homework assignments and dismissed. Regular classes start at 8:30 a. m. Monday.

For the upper school of Prince Edward Academy, this year's version of the former Farmville High School, the opening ceremonies were a bit more elaborate.

Between 400 and 500 students gathered at a local movie house this morning and were charged with the responsibility for making the private school system work through diligent study and good behavior.

Officials of the Prince Edward School Foundation pledged that the private schools would remain open all this year, and as long as necessary to avoid integration.

Meanwhile, Negro leaders in the county were quietly at work trying to raise enough money to send the Negro children to schools in other areas. Sixteen have already gone on scholarships to Kittrell College in Kittrell, N.C., a Negro junior college with a high school branch.

"We know we can't do much about all 1,700 of our children," said the Rev. L. Francis Griffin, pastor of the Negro First Baptist church in Farmville. "We're starting with the seniors and working down—the seniors are the ones most apt to get discouraged and drop out of school."

Officials of the foundation have said a number of times that they have offered all assistance short of financial aid to Negro leaders to help them start their own private schools.

Griffin said Thursday, however, "These offers have all been made through the press, not to us personally. Even so, we haven't considered accepting them, because to accept private segregated schooling would be a compromise and not an answer to our problem."

For the same reason, Griffin said, the Negro group would not consider asking the state for help in establishing private schools.

Fairfax Negroes Seek School Entry

By Robert E. Baker
Staff Reporter

Two Negro children have applied to enter white elementary schools in Fairfax County at the beginning of the September term.

School officials announced that the applications would be sent along with all others to the State Pupil Placement Board in Richmond.

Neither Fairfax elected officials nor School Board members expressed surprise at the applications filed by the Negro boys who are applying for the first grade.

One seeks to enter 450-pupil Belvedere School on Columbia pike near Lake Barcroft. The other has applied to the 400-pupil Flint Hill School near Vienna.

Their parents made the applications during pre-school registration a few days ago and the School Board met in executive session Monday night to discuss them.

The Board has frequently discussed policy in executive sessions and has taken no action publicly. But it has adopted assignment criteria similar to those used by the Arlington School oBard and has decided to consider each case on its merits.

Chairman Merton S. Parsons said he would not call a special Board meeting but assumed the applications will be discussed at the regular meeting Tuesday night.

He said the applications would be forwarded with others to the State Pupil Placement Board.

That Board was created by the anti-integration session of the 1956 General Assembly as part of Virginia's "massive resistance" program. It took assignment powers away from local boards and, to date, has not assigned any Negroes to white schools.

The State Board has been ignored by Federal courts in desegregation cases while other "massive resistance" laws existed.

Its supporters claim that it cannot now be ignored since other "massive resistance" havebeen invalidated. The recent Assembly session enacted a local assignment plan, as a local option to the State Pupil Placement Act, but it will not become effective until next March.

The State Board, meanwhile, is being used as a defense by Newport News and Richmond in pending deesegregation cases and rulings on its validity are expected soon.

Fairfax has a total school enrollment of 48,407—of 1975, about four per cent are Negro. Last February, the powerful Fairfax County Federation of Citizens Associations adopted unanimously a resolution asking the School Board to institute a gradual desegregation program before any court action is brought.

The Federation recommended a 12-year program beginning with the first year.

In another development, the Arlington School Board asked the County Board to establish a $150,000 fund for scholarships (tuition grants) for the next school year under Virginia's new "freedom of choice" program dealing with school desegregation.

Arlington School Supt. Ray E. Reid said the fund would be used to pay the county's share of 800 tuition grants—600 already attending established private schools and an estimated 200 others who would choose private schooling rather than attend desegregated schools.

The grants would amount to $250 each, with $192 coming from Arlington and $58 from the State. The State's participation would total about $45,000.

The School Board discussed the request of an unnounced meeting Tuesday night, following which the meeting was opened to make it official.

It is the rst such action by a Virginia school board to comply with the new tuition grant law passed by the recent special General Assembly session as part of the Perrow Commission program.

A survey of Alexandria, Falls Church and Fairfax school officials showed they were still studying the law which requires localities to set up scholarships funds for private schooling entirely divorced from public school appropriations.

The new $150,000 appropriation would equal a 4-cent increase in Arlington's tax rate. But Edgar D Smith, Director of Finance, said he was virtually certain the amount could be absorbed in the budget without increasing taxes

Court Test Faces Loans For Schools

RICHMOND, June 4 (AP).—A new State law authorizing county school boards to borrow school construction money from the Virginia Supplemental Retirement System appears headed for a court test.

New York bonding attorneys retained by the Rockbridge County School Board in connection with the county's application for such a loan have questioned the constitutionality of the act passed at the recent special session of the General Assembly.

Virginia voters last November approved a constitutional amendment to allow county school boards to borrow money from the retirement system for school construction purposes without a referendum.

The Retirement System trustees have received a number of applications from Virginia counties for school construction loans under provisions of the new law. Prior to its introduction, the legislation won the approval of some bonding attorneys.

However, the New York firm of Wood, King & Dawson advised the Rockbridge School Board it questioned the constitutionality of the issuance of an unlimited amount of negotiable bonds backed by a county's credit without a referendum.

INEFFECTIVE, TRAGIC

Almond Is Against Closing of Schools

FRONT ROYAL, Va., June 9 (UPI)—Gov. J. Lindsay Almond, once the South's chief crusader for massive resistance to integration, spoke out tonight against abandonment of public schools.

Almond, addressing the 97 graduates of a private school group which served as the rallying point for Warren County's refusal to support integrated schools, warned that segregated private schools are treading on thin legal ice.

"If public education is abandoned in any county or city, then public support for private education therein on a segregated basis becomes most precarious," he said.

The governor's speech, his strongest since last fall when nine Virginia schools were closed, made it clear he considers school closures an unrealistic, ineffective and tragic way to meet the integration crisis.

No Specific Reference

He did not refer specifically to rural Prince Edward County, Va., which has decided to close its 21 public schools rather than accept integration.

He praised Warren County where the entire white student body of 800 boycotted the only county high school when it admitted 21 Negroes last February and remained in private classes set up last fall when the high school was shuttered.

But Almond urged Virginians to give up "wishful thinking" that integration could be avoided or the Supreme Court's desegregation ruling reversed.

"The only sure prevention of any integration anywhere in Virginia is the total abolition of every public school everywhere in Virginia," he said. "... I tell you now that we cannot secede from the Union; we cannot overthrow the federal government, and we cannot reverse a final decree of a federal court."

"We must improve our system of education and not permit its dissolution," he said. "Its abandonment would be promotion of surrender and acceptance of defeat. I shall continue with all of my energy the struggle for its survival."

Gravest Mistake

He warned that Virginia's gravest mistake would be to "succumb to the blandishments of those who would have Virginia abandon public education and thereby consign a generation of children to the darkness of illiteracy, the pits of indolence and despondency, and the dungeons of delinquency."

Almond admitted some southern Virginia localities could not operate integrated schools and would have to turn to private education but made it clear he believed the federal courts would not uphold private segregated schools chiefly financed through the state's system of scholarships.

"I have taken my stand," he said. "We must save, sustain and support the cause of public education in Virginia. I call upon all Virginians who believe in...that position to rally to my support before it is too late."

Cannot Secede, Governor Says

Almond Warns Virginians Of 'Unrealistic' Defense Of Segregation

By United Press International

FRONT ROYAL, Va., June 9.—Gov. J. Lindsay Almond, once the South's chief crusader for "massive resistance" to integration, spoke out strongly Tuesday night against abandonment of public schools.

Governor Almond, addressing the 97 graduates of a private school group which served as the rallying point for Warren County's refusal to support integrated schools, warned that segregated private schools were treading on thin legal ice.

"If public education is abandoned in any county or city, then public support for private education therein on a segregated basis becomes most precarious," he said.

Considered Unrealistic

The governor's speech, his strongest since last fall when nine Virginia schools were closed, made it clear he considered school closures an unrealistic, ineffective and tragic way to meet the integration crisis.

He did not refer specifically to rural Prince Edward County, Va., which has decided to close its 21 public schools rather than accept integration.

But Governor Almond urged Virginians to give up "wishful thinking" that integration could be avoided or the Supreme Court's desegregation ruling reversed.

'We Cannot Secede'

"The only sure prevention of any integration anywhere in Virginia is the total abolition of every public school everywhere in Virginia," he said. ". . . I tell you now that we cannot secede from the Union; we cannot overthrow the Federal Government, and we cannot reverse a final decree of a Federal court."

The governor obviously picked Front Royal, which staunch segregationists have proudly pointed out as a Southern fortress of defiance to Federal court integration decrees for his major pronouncement.

"We must improve our system of education and not permit its dissolution," he said. "Its abandonment would be promotion of surrender and acceptance of defeat. I shall continue with all of my energy the struggle for its survival."

Gravest Mistake

He warned that Virginia's gravest mistake would be to "succumb to the blandishments of those who would have Virginia abandon public education and thereby consign a generation of children to the darkness of illiteracy, the pits of indolence and despondency, and the dungeons of deliquency."

Floyd School Board Denies Plea for Shift

FLOYD, Va., June 9 (AP) The Floyd County School Board declined to act today on a school desegregation plea and issued a veiled warning that integration pressure could lead to the end of public education in the county.

After a closed meeting the Board issued a statement saying it had taken on action on the transfer requests of 14 Negroes seeking entrance to the county's three white schools because they had not been made on official State forms.

It added that should the applications be made later on the proper forms, they would be forwarded to the State Pupil Placement Board in Richmond, which under Virginia law has all the authority to assign pupils to public schools.

"It is the unanimous opinion of this board that the educational welfare of all children in this county can best be served by a continuation of the present school program, at least for the present time," the Board's statement said.

The Floyd County desegregation petition — the first in southwest Virginia—was mailed to the Board June 5 by Reuben Lawson, a Roanoke attorney. It asked that the 14 Negroes—half of the county's Negro high school population —be transferred from Christianburg Institute in adjacent Montgomery to Floyd County's three white high schols.

Floyd, which does not operate a Negro high school, joins with several other southwest Virginia localities in operating the Christianburg school. It does, however, have elementary facilities for Negro children.

Adequate Plan For Arlington School Desegregation Urged

ALEXANDER, Va. — (NNPA) — Attorneys for the NAACP have asked the Federal District Court here to order the Arlington County, Va., School Board to adopt an "adequate and comprehensive plan" for desegregation of the county's public schools.

The motion they filed requested Judge Albert V. Bryan to require the county school board to submit such a plan by July 27 and put it into effect promptly.

It also asked that Judge Bryan restrain the school board from refusing to admit 22 colored children to white schools this fall.

The applications of the 22 children, on whose behalf the motion was filed, have twice been rejected by the Arlington school board. The children have renewed their legal fight for admission to white schools.

The motion urged Judge Bryan to order the school board "promptly to implement an adequate and comprehensive plan to effectuate an orderly transition of Arlington schools into a racially nondiscriminatory school system."

It also requested that the board be enjoined from 'regulating the admission or assignment of all others on the basis of racial considerations."

BOARD ACCUSED

The attorneys accused the school board of racial discrimination and charged that it will persist in an illegal policy of segregation unless the court intervenes.

The 22 children were in a group of 30 students whom the school board rejected when they tried to enroll in white schools last fall.

Judge Bryan upheld the rejection of 26 but ordered that four of the applicants be admitted to Stratford Junior High School.

The United States Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals in March directed Judge Bryan and the school board to reconsider the 26 applications.

The board did so, but two weeks ago again turned down the colored students, giving lack of scholastic achievement as its reason.

POLICY CONTINUES

Attorneys for the pupils charged Monday that the latest school board action demonstrates that the board "is continuing and will continue the unlawful policy and practices of racial segregation in the public schools" unless the court acts.

Referring to Supreme Court decisions, they said Judge Bryan is empowered to order the Arlington board to draft and submit for his approval a plan for desegregating the school system.

They also said he may order a child admitted to a white school if he thinks the pupil has been discriminated against because of race.

The motion was filed by Frank D. Reeves of Washington, D. C., and Otto L. Tucker of Alexandria and bore the names of three other NAACP lawyers. They are Oliver W. Hill and Spottswood W. Rob-

Liberals Are Winning Battle To Desegregate Va. Schools

By Victor Calverton

RICHMOND (ANP) — The tide against massive resistance to school desegregation at last is turning in Virginia. Leaders of parent-teacher associations, pastors of churches and businessmen have begun to speak out against foolhardy policies to maintain racial segregation in schools even to the point of no public schools.

While leaders of the Defenders of State sovereignty and individual liberties brand educators and ministers as "gullible," the ministers and leading educators are standing their ground in Richmond, Roanoke, Norfolk and other Virginia localities.

MINISTERS ANSWER DEFENDERS

The Defenders talked at length last week about the will of the people, and charged that Virginia political leaders and officials are ignoring the people's wishes regarding segregation. But the ministers countered with the challenge that they were answerable only to God, and that is He whom they must serve.

In Norfolk, for example, several ministers, in answer to the Defenders admonition that ministers stick to the church and refrain from discussing racial and social issues from their pulpits, asserted that their authority is the Bible and that they are committed to obey God rather than man.

Ministers in Richmond won a signal victory several years ago when they insisted that programs which they sponsor must be interracial and unsegregated. The issue was tested in a Mosque case, and the ministers and the NAACP won their contention that such meetings were in the nature of private affairs, giving the sponsors the privilege of inviting anyone they wanted to on an unsegregated basis.

A batle royal is raging in several PTA groups in Virginia over desegregation. In Richmond, Norfolk, Petersburg and other Virginia cities, the Defenders are trying to put their members in key posts of the organizations.

A Defender was elected last week president of the Norfolk PTA council and immediately representatives of four member PTA's walked out of the meeting. Opposition is mounting in several Virginia communities as parents slowly realize that the Defenders are out to wreck the public school system rather than submit to desegregation.

FORMER GOV. GRIFFIN A DIE HARD

Former Gov. Marvin Griffin threw fat into the fire last week in his address at the banquet of the Defenders when he made it crystal clear that he would favor no public schools in Virginia or any other state of the South, rather than have white and Negroes attend public schools together.

Griffin assailed all persons who would preserve the public school system at any price. The former Georgia governor obviously sought to bolster Virginia's sagging massive resistance program against desegregation. Gov. J. Lindsey Almond's shift in the massive resistance program has many leaders in the South worried, who had looked to Virginia for leadership. In fact, they still hope Virginia will provide that leadership.

Griffin made a long plea for more supporters for the current defiant attitude and stand against the Supreme Court. Meanwhile, the small groups that have all along sought law and order in Virginia, appeared last week to be winning more support from parents who in the last analysis may determine what Virginia and the South will do about school desegregation.

NORFOLK WIDENS SCHOOL CLOSINGS

City Council Cuts Off Funds For All Classes Above 6th Grade as of Feb. 2

Special to The New York Times.

NORFOLK, Va., Jan. 13—The Norfolk City Council voted 6 to 1 today to halt all public schooling above the sixth grade effective with the start of the new semester on Feb. 2.

The council approved a resolution cutting off all operating funds for junior and senior high school classes, which cover the seventh through the twelfth grades.

Six of Norfolk's white secondary schools have been closed since last September as the result of a Federal Court order that called for the enrollment of seventeen Negro students. This action affected approximately 10,000 students.

Today's action will affect thirty-six white and Negro schools in the city and a total of 7,173 children, 5,259 of whom are Negro.

Twenty-two white elementary schools will lose their seventh grades and one white school will lose its seventh and eighth grades. Three Negro junior and senior high schools will close outright and ten Negro elementary schools will lose their seventh grades.

Provided in Budget

The resolution stemmed from a special clause in the 1959 school budget that was recently approved by the council. The council announced that it would retain month-to-month control over school operational funds.

At that time observers predicted that funds for the city's Negro schools would be cut off at the start of the February term. Today's action went beyond this, however, denying funds for all grades above the sixth.

Only Councilman Roy B. Martin Jr. voted against today's resolution. He said later that he had done so because of the "economic damage" it would inflict on the city. Before the vote Mrs. W. T. Mason, a Negro leader, said its approval would be "an trocity."

The September school closings resulted from the state's so-called "massive resistance laws, which are now being tested in state and Federal court.

On Monday the State Supreme Court of Appeals will rule on the validity of these laws. On the same day a similar ruling will be announced by a special three-judge Federal court that sat in Norfolk.

Mayor Comments

After today's council meeting, Mayor W. Fred Duckworth said the resolution meant that the secondary schools "will not open unless there is some radical change in the present situation." He did not elaborate.

It was believed here that the resolution would be vacated if the state and Federal courts ruled that the massive resistance laws were constitutional. There appeared little prospect of such a ruling, however.

After the Council acted, Edmund D. Campbell of Arlington, a lawyer representing plaintiffs in the Federal court case contesting the state laws, said that legal action would be taken against the resolution.

He said that the city "cannot be permitted to stop education at the sixth grade; legal remedies will be found."

Check Norfolk Move, Suit Asks

NORFOLK, Va. (AP)—U.S. District Court has been asked to restrain the city of Norfolk from cutting off funds for public school classes.

The City Council voted Tuesday to cut off funds for all grades above the sixth, effective Feb. 1.

The council's action was attacked as an "evasive scheme" in the suit filed Thursday by attorney Archie L. Boswell on behalf of 42 white school children and 17 parents.

Defendants are Mayor W. Fred Duckworth and the other members of the Council; the city treasurer, the city school board and the superintendent of schools.

The suit said closing of the schools and grades affected by the Council's funds cut-off would be a violation of the equal protection of the laws guaranteed in the U.S. Constitution.

Six white schools are closed in this port city by Virgnia's anti-integration laws, letting about 10,000 students. The laws are due to be ruled on Monday by the State Supreme Court. A ruling on the school closure law from U.S. District Court is scheduled to come after the state court rules.

Challenge pledged as Norfolk ends high school funds

NORFOLK, Va., Jan. 14—(AP)—A prompt challenge in federal court to city council's action in cutting off funds for secondary schools was promised today.

Archie L. Boswell said he and another attorney, Edmond Campbell of Arlington, will seek an injunction in the next few days from Federal Judge Walter E. Hoffman.

COUNCIL PASSED by a 6-1 vote yesterday a resolution saying it "does not propose, at this time, to authorize" funds for public schooling above the sixth grade after Jan. 31.

The council's action was regarded as a move to prevent school integration in the event the massive resistance laws fail to survive the court tests.

Boswell said a temporary order would be asked "restraining council from interfering with the school board in its proper function of management and control of school money and affairs."

School Board Chairman Paul Schweitzer said today the council did not consult the school board prior to yesterday's meeting. "This is something the council is doing on its own," he said.

Boswell told council yesterday its resolution "is an illegal act and beyond the scope of your authority."

Norfolk Orders Schools Shut Past 6th Grade

Council Bars Funds Anticipating Upset Of Resistance Law

NORFOLK, Va., Jan. 14 (AP).—The Norfolk City Council has called a halt to all public education beyond the sixth grade beginning February 1 in a move to prevent any integration here.

A resolution adopted by the Council yesterday cuts off payment of any funds for junior and senior high school classes after that date.

Six white Norfolk junior and senior high schools have been closed since September, putting 10,000 students out of class. Those shutdowns took place under Virginia's massive resistance laws after 17 Negro students were assigned to the schools in obedience to Federal Court orders.

Negro School Affected

The council's action would extend the shutdowns to all the Negro junior and senior high schools in the city and to the one remaining white junior high which has been operating. In addition, it would close all of the city's seventh grades, many of which have continued to operate as part of elementary schools.

A total of 7,200 more children — 2,000 white and 5,200 Negroes — are enrolled in the classes involved in the council's new shutdown order.

The council resolution, prompted by the expectation that Virginia's massive resistance laws might collapse next week, states that the city "does not propose, at this time, to authorize" the payment of funds to the school board to operate any grade higher than the sixth in February or any subsequent month.

Ruling Due Monday

A ruling is due Monday from the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals on the whole package of massive resistance laws, including the measure which has closed schools.

A three-judge Federal Court is due to hand down a decision about the same time on validity of the school closing law. That decision is forthcoming on a case brought by Norfolk white students shut out of schools.

School officials last week served notice they would be ready to resume classes if the closing law fell. The Council's action would block the school board's intentions.

The Council resolution was adopted by a vote of 6 to 1. Councilman Roy B. Martin, jr., cast the only negative vote. He said he feared the economic impact of school closings would have on the port city.

After the Council meeting Mayor W. Fred Duckworth said the resolution means that the secondary schools "will not open unless there is some radical change in the present situation." He declined to say what a radical change might be.

Attacked by Lawyer

Immediately after the resolution was introduced by Mayor Duckworth, Attorney Archie L. Boswell, representing the Norfolk public schools committee, rose and said the resolution "is an illegal act and beyond the scope of your (council's) authority."

It was made clear immediately that the council's school fund cutoff will be challenged in the courts.

"Norfolk cannot be permitted to stop education at the sixth grade. Some legal remedy will be found," said Arlington Attorney Edmund D. Campbell. He and Mr. Boswell represent persons who brought the Federal court suit challenging the school closing law.

J. J. Brewbaker, city school superintendent, and Victor J. Ashe, Negro attorney who represented the 17 plaintiffs, declined comment on council's action.

Besides the clear purpose of preventing any possibility of integration if massive resistance falls, there was speculation that the council's action was a retaliatory move against Negroes. Except for the 17 Negro students assigned to the white Norfolk classes, all other Negro students have remained in public schools while the 10,000 white students have been locked out.

Norfolk P-TAs Protest Cutting Off School Cash

NORFOLK, Va., Jan. 16 (AP)—Parent-teacher associations of four white schools and one Negro school have protested City Council's action in cutting off funds for all grades above the sixth.

The Council took the action Tuesday apparently in anticipation of state and Federal court decisions next Monday which are expected to flatten Virginia's laws of "massive resistance" to classroom race mixing.

A resolution adopted by Council provides that no funds will be given the School Board after Feb. 1 for the operation of grades 7 through 12. The cutoff will affect 7200 pupils in 23 white schools and 13 Negro schools. These are in addition to 10,000 pupils locked out of six white secondary schools, closed by the state in September to avert court-ordered desegregation.

Called Ill-Advised

The Bayview Elementary School P-TA adopted a resolution decrying as ill-advised City Council's "decision to limit public education in Norfolk. We deny your moral right to such action and strongly urge you to reconsider."

The Rev. James Brewer, Chairman of the Norfolk Committee for Public Schools, said Council's action "has angered many people who were formerly on the fence. Many businessmen are siding with the view that the cutoff would have a disastrous effect on the economy of the community."

Mayor W. Fred Duckworth said Council has received letters and telegrams from Florida, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, North Carolina and South Carolina, urging that "we continue to do all we can to hold the (school segregation) line." Reaction in Norfolk has been "about as expected," Duckworth said.

Asks Sound Thinking

Sam T. Barfield, chairman of the Civic Affairs Committee of the orfolk Chamber of Commerce, said, "It's time for sane, sound thinging men in this city to express their feelings. In the absence of any expression, City Council has expressed them. Council's action followed a lack of definite, thoughtful statements from the businessmen of the city."

Barfield's Civic Affairs Committee several months ago adopted a resolution asking the Chamber's executive committee to call a meeting of the board of directors "in order to furnish this community with the strong leadership and guidance that it so urgently needs."

Norfolk Parents Ask School Relief

NORFOLK, Va., Jan. 15 (Spl)—A group of 89 white parents and their children asked a Federal court today to stop the Norfolk City Council from closing all secondary schools here.

Through their attorneys, they charged that the Council plan is an "evasive scheme" designed to nullify court desegregation orders, and violates their constitutional rights.

They asked the Federal District Court of Judge Walter E. Hoffman to isue an injunction to stop the Council, and said they would appear in his court on Jan. 26 to argue their case.

That date is a wek from Monday, when both State and Federal courts are scheduled to hand down opinions on Virginia's "massive resistance" laws. The Federal court case was brought by 26 white Norfolk parents and pubils, most of whom are included in the new suit filed today.

The Norfolk City Council voted 6 to 1 on Tuesday to cut off operating funds for all secondary schools, effective Feb. 1, apparently to maintain segregation until the General Assembly can come up with a new program.

One of the "massive resistance" laws already has closed six Norfolk secondary schools to thwart desegregation, ousting 10,000 pupils. The Council action would oust 7300 more.

Attorneys Archie L. Boswell of Norfolk and Edmund D. Campbell of Arlington, representing the white parents, filed the request for an injunction.

They pointed out the schools now closed would be reopened if the state laws are invalidated, except for Council action. They contended the state constitution requires public schools. Under the Council plan, they said, parents would pay taxes for schools but have no schools, and pupils could not expect to receive an adequate education.

The attorneys painted this picture of Norfolk if the Council plan becomes effective:

"The children of the city will be deprived of their educational birthright as American citizens. The public school system of the city will be virtually destroyed. The economic prosperity of the city will be ruined. Property values in the city will tumble. The citizens of Norfolk will be humiliated before the Nation and the world."

Alexandria Board To Meet Next Week

Alexandria School Board Chairman Robert C. Howard said yesterday he would call a meeting next week to reconsider the applications of 14 Negroes applying for entry to white schools.

Howard said he had not fixed the date of the meeting because of commitments of Board members and attorneys. He said the disposition of the applications would be sent "right to Federal Court."

Alexandria Federal Judge Albert V. Bryan told the Board on Wednesday that it could not bar Negroes from white schools because of their race.

The Board denied the applications last August, contending that the State Placement Board had sole responsibility to make assignments. Judge Bryan rejected this argument by refusing to grant the school officials' motion to dismiss the suit.

The judge's antidiscrimination order is effective Feb. 2. He also told the Board its newly adopted 6-point pupil assignment plan must be "fair, just and valid."

The Board has until June 20 to report to the court on its action on the 14 applicants. Judge Bryan said the attorneys for the Negroes could return to his court if they were dissatisfied with the Board's dispositions.

Private school tuition grants are approved

BY JOHN F. DAFFRON

RICHMOND, Va., Jan. 31—(AP)—The Virginia General Assembly Saturday accepted the inevitability of some racial school integration Monday and enacted Gov. J. Lindsay Almond's program to lessen its impact.

A last-ditch fight by a strong Senate group to close the state's pocketbook to areas where schools integrate collapsed in the Senate finance committee. Almond's supporters beat the effort to go beyond his recommendations by a 12 to 7 committee vote.

The full Senate then approved the governor's key requests, which already had pased the House—a $3 million fund for $250 tuition grants for children who won't attend integrated schools and repeal of the compulsory school attendance law.

Both houses planned to return Monday to be on hand when the first public school racial integration in Virginia's history takes place in Norfolk and Arlington County. They also have several legislative matters left on the calendar.

Arlington loses

ARLINGTON, the urban Northern Virginia county, lost a final legal bid Saturday to stay the admission of four Negroes to Stratford Junior High School. Chief Justice Earl Warren refused any delay and said the school board had not shown him a need for extraordinary action.

School authorities, who have been preparing for the admission of the Negroes, said they didn't expect and disturbances Monday. "I think there will be a smooth transition," said Arlington School Supt. Ray E Reid.

For Norfolk, integration of 17 Negroes with the white pupils of six high schools and junior high schools, will mean the schools will be open for classes for the 1958-59 school year. The six schools were closed under a now defunct state law last September when ordered to admit the Negroes by a federal court.

Norfolk safety officials declined to spell out precautions they have taken to prevent any possible violence. But legislators here from the area said the police are well equipped to cope with any disorder.

Victor J. Ashe, an attorney for the Negroes, said at Norfolk the 17 will go to their new schools individually, probably accompanied by their parents.

Tuition available

GOV. ALMOND signed the three key bills of his program at 1:30 p.m. and commented: "I am very deeply grateful with the response of the General Assembly to my recommendations."

The governor said he wanted to assure the parents of children in Arlington and Norfolk that tuition grants for private schooling will be made available to them promptly. He said any delay would be brief.

The real test of strength of the group which felt Almond had notg one far enough to try to block the impending admission of the Negroes to schools Monday was in the finance committee.

A bill sponsored by Sen. Garland Gray and signed by eight others represented the major effort. This bill would have cut state appropriations to the four major public school funds from a total of $139 million to $1 for each fund. The governor would take control of the money taken out of the funds and could give it back to the localities if no tuition grants were being paid there—that is, no integrated schools were being operated in the locality.

Atty. Gen. A. S. Harrison said the administration couldn't accept it and regarded it as incompatible with the governor's own bill.

NORFOLK NAVY DEPENDENT SCHOOL CHILDREN

Navy Plans Norfolk Schools For On-Base Dependents

NORFOLK, Va., Jan. 22 (AP). The Navy said last night that plans are set to provide schools for dependents living on Federal property in the Norfolk area, but that legislative changes are needed to aid those living off its bases.

"An estimated 500 Navy dependent children of school age are presently living on military installations in Norfolk. Approximately 5,000 of school age live elsewhere in the city.

This was the latest development in Virginia's school crisis following the action of the State and Federal courts Monday knocking out the State's massive resistance program.

NAACP May Wait

In Richmond, Negro Attorney Oliver W. Hill said the Federal courts probably will be asked to enforce the reopening of schools in the three areas where they are closed if the school boards don't open them soon.

Mr. Hill, legal counsel for the Virginia unit of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, said the school boards should be given a "reasonable" time to comply with Federal desegregation orders.

The plight of Norfolk's Navy dependent school children came into the national spotlight yesterday when President Eisenhower told his weekly news conference that the administration is studying ways to assure education for military children in the city.

Under terms of Public Law 874, the Navy said, schools can be provided for the on-base students "when local school facilities are inadequate or unavailable." Plans for such schools "will be put into effect if local schools are not reopened within a reasonable time," the Navy said.

2,300 Affected

With regard to the remaining 5,000 dependent students residing outside Federal property, the Navy estimates that about 2,300 have been affected by the closing of six secondary schools in the city.

"It appears possible that additional statutory authority may be necessary for the expenditure of Federal funds to provide education for those children who do not reside on Federal property," the Navy said.

This was taken by some to mean that the Navy Department is contemplating a request to Congress for an amendment to Public Law 874 permitting the establishment of military schools for these students. Navy officials, however, would not amplify.

In reference to a speech by Gov. Almond Tuesday calling for continued resistance to integration, the President said it comes down to the question whether any citizen, either in official or civil capacity, is ready to obey the laws of his State and his Nation.

Almond Replies

Gov. Almond retorted:

"The President as usual is misinformed . . . I am obeying and will continue to obey the laws of this State. . . . The President's position is that he will assist the Supreme Court in destroying the laws of this State in violation of the United States Constitution."

In a filmed television program last night, Virginia's Governor proposed a system of private education for localities that would not permit racially mixed schools.

However, Gov. Almond said he saw no alternative to limited integration in some areas. And he pledged that the State will try "as far as possible" to save public education wherever it can be saved in Virginia.

Interviewed January 8

Gov. Almond expressed these views in an interview with Commentator Edward R. Murrow on a program filmed January 8, 11 days before the State Supreme Court and a thre-judge Federal panel in Norfolk struck down the State's massive resistance laws.

In the interview, Gov. Almond dropped another hint that he may propose some revision of Virginia's tax structure to maintain education on a private basis in sections adamant against integration. He said it probably would involve payment of tuition grants from public funds for private schooling.

Meanwhile, Gov. Almond continued a round of top-level conferences.

There were indications the Governor had settled on the makeup of the commission of General Assembly members he has said he will create to assist him in formulating a new school program for presentation to the Legislature.

Announcement of the commission's members is expected in the next few days.

All-White Commission

Some members of the Assembly have said privately the commission would be built around a nucleus of the old Gray Commission, created by former Gov. Stanley in 1954 after the United States Supreme Court knocked down the State's constitutional requirement for separation of the races in the public schools.

Gov. Almond said the projected emergency commission would be all-white, adding that a biracial commission "would provoke more difficulty than it would do good."

"The lines of communication that once existed between the races in Virginia have been destroyed," he said.

The Governor's office was deluged yesterday with telegrams from persons mainly commending Gov. Almond's pledge to continue the fight against racial integration in the schools. More than 500 messages were recived, and a spokesman said less than a tenth of these expressed criticism of the Governor's stand.

Navy Gets Funds to Open A School in Norfolk Crisis

By BESS FURMAN
Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26—The Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare said today that the Navy would start a school with Federal funds on the Norfolk, Va., base next month if public schools in Norfolk were not opened shortly.

The Norfolk schools were closed under Virginia's massive resistance laws against integration. These laws have been invalidated by Virginia and Federal courts, but the state is preparing further steps to prevent school integration.

Among the pupils locked out of Norfolk schools were the children of Federal personnel, both civilian and military. Of these, about 5,500 are children of military personnel. But only 500 of these are children of parents who live on the base.

The Navy announced last week it would ask Education Department funds for a school at the base if the Norfolk schools were not reopened.

Secretary Arthur S. Flemming said that the new Federal school on the Norfolk base would be for these 500 children. This school definitely would be integrated. Defense Department regulations so require and both white and Negro children live on the base.

He said that the new school would be started unless the Norfolk schools open "by the second semester," this usually means around Feb. 1. Funds are available under the Federal impacted area laws, which provide for full schooling of children whose parents live and work on Federal property; and for Federal aid to school districts having large Federal installations.

The secretary announced plans for legislation that would solve the closed school problem for military personnel not living on base. He said this legislation is being drafted and will be sent to Congress soon. Such measures would cover another 5,000 of the Norfolk children.

The two plans Mr. Flemming presented for the children of military personnel were predicted on statements made by President Eisenhower at this last news conference. The President said the Federal Government definitely was responsible for the schooling of children whose parents lived and worked on a military base; and was trying "to work out a solution" for all parents under military orders.

300 at Little Rock

Mr. Flemming said there are 300 children of military personnel living on Federal property in Little Rock, Ark., where schools are also closed. In the other two areas where schools are closed, Charlottesville and Warren County, Virginia, nothing is known as to whether there are children of military personnel, as these areas do not qualify under Federal "impacted area" laws.

However, the Federal Government will not provide schools for the children of its civilian personnel, Mr. Flemming said. But he did not preclude some sort of emergency action in this are later.

He said that the Federal civilian employes in communities with closed schools, were in an "intolerable situation" with regard to educaion. The closed schools, he said, also confront the Govenrment with a very difficult personnel problem.

"It raises the question if the Federal Government can continue to operate in a community where there are no schools," he said. "The Government would have to come to grips with this problem, and make any decision it would have to make."

Mr. Flemming said his own Department had an important regional office at Charlottesville where personnel and recruiting problems already have come up.

Urge School Reopening

Special to The New York Times.

NORFOLK, Va., Jan. 26—One hundred business, professional and civic leaders here have petitioned the City Council to open all public schools "as promptly as possible."

While conceding that they "would strongly prefer to have segregated schools," the petitioners warned that the alternative to integrated schools would be the abandonment of the public school system.

"The abandonment of our public school system is, in our opinion, unthinkable, as it would mean the denial of an adequate education to a majority of our children. Moreover, the consequences would be most damaging to our community. We, therefore, urge the Norfolk City Council to do everything within its power to open all public schools as promptly as possible," the petitioners said.

Heading the list of petitioners is John S. Alfriend, chairman of the board of the National Bank of Commerce. Also among the signers is Henry Clay Hofheimer, president of the Norfolk Chamber of Commerce.

Today's petition marks the first time that the city's leading figures had entered into the school integration problem. Six of the city's schools have been closed since September when the Federal Courts ordered the school board to admit seventeen Negro students to the six white schools.

Excerpts From Virginia Court's Rejection of 'Massive Resistance' Law

RICHMOND, Va., Jan. 19 (AP)—Following are excerpts from the majority and minority opinions of the Virginia Supreme Court in the school segregation case:

Majority Opinion

(Written by Chief Justice John W. Eggleston, with Justices C. Vernon Spratley, A. C Buchanan, Kennon C. Whittle and Lawrence T'anson concurring.)

In his opening brief the Attorney General took the position that the mandatory requirements of Section 129 of the Constitution that "the General Assembly shall establish and maintain an efficient system of public free schools throughout the state," is no longer effective and binding, because, he said, Section 129 is predicated upon the validity of Section 140 which provides that "white and colored children shall not be taught in the same school," and that when Section 140 was invalidated this "necessarily entailed the simultaneous emasculation of Section 129 and its extirpation from the organic law of the commonwealth."

In short, the Attorney General ays, the General Assembly now has plenary power to deal with the public free school system in any manner it may deem fit, unfettered by any requirements of, or limitations in, the Constitution of Virginia.

The provision of the Constitution do not permit the matter to be so summarily disposed of. . . . There is no word of suggestion in any provision in Article IX, or elsewhere in the Constitution, that these provisions which were incorporated in the Constitution along with Section 140 are conditioned upon the validity of that section.

Sections Independent

We hold that Section 140 and the other sections in Article IX, including Section 129 dealing with public education, are independent and separable, and that the destruction of Section 140 by the decision in the Brown case (1954 United States Supreme Court desegregation decree) did not strike down the other provisions in Article IX. If it be desirable that all of the provisions dealing with the public school system be striken from the Constitution, it should be done by proper amendments to the Constitution in the manner therein provided. It should not be done by judicial construction.

While Section 129 of the Virginia Constitution requiring the General Assembly to "establish and maintain an efficient system of public free schools throughout the state" is still in the organic law and must be complied with.

It will be observed that under Section 141, as amended, the General Assembly has permissive authority to appropriate funds for the education of Virginia stduents in nonsectarian private schools. The language is that it "may" appropriate funds for that purpose. On the other hand, section 129 imposes a mandatory duty on the General Assembly to establish and maintain an efficient system of public free schools throughout the state . . .

Clearly, the language of Section 141, as amended, contemplates that if the state funds are to be devoted to the education of Virginia students in nonsectarian private schools, the General Assembly should make the necessary appropriation threfor. The purposes of Section 141 may not be accomplished at the expense of some public free schools by withholding state funds from their support, and devoting such funds to the payment of tuition grants, as is attempted under the provsions of the appropriation Act of 1958 . . .

Violation Is Seen

This device leaves such schools from which the supporting funds are withheld and diverted entirely without the state support required by Section 129 of the Constitution. That section requires the state to "maintain an efficient system of public free schools throughout the state." That means that the state must support such public free schools in the state as are necessary to an efficient system, including those in which the pupils of both races are compelled to be enrolled and taught together, however unfortunate that situation may be.

It follows then that the provisions of (the closure law and the fund cutoff) violate Section 129 of the Constitution in that they remove from the public school system any schools in which pupils of the two races are mixed and make no provision for their support and maintenance as a part of the system.

It is argued that the closing of schools under these provisions is merely temporary. But the acts do not so provide, and the fact that provision is attempted to be made for education in private schools of children who have been attending these interrupted schools indicates that the condition may be prolonged.

We agree that the General Assembly may determine what is an "efficient system," but it cannot by definition impair or disregard constitutional requirements. . . . While the mixing of the races is a factor which may impair the efficiency of the system, the separation of the races along will not, as the satutory definition implies, constitute an "efficient system."

Again, the act . . . providing for the closing of schools because of integration, divesting local authorities of all power and control over them, and vesting such authority in the Governor, violates section 133 of the Constitution which vests the supervision of local schools in the local school boards.

Police Power Noted

* * * (Little Rock acts) provide for the closing of schools in communities which may be disturbed because of the presence in, and policing of, such schools by Federal troops and personnel * * *. While we agree that the state, under its police power, has the right under these conditions to direct the temporary closing of a school, the provision divesting the local authorities of their control and vesting such authority in the Governor runs counter to Section 133 of the Constitution.

We find no constitutional objection to the prescribed procedure for making tuition grants out of funds properly available for the purpose. * * *

Having reached the conclusion that certain provisions of the acts with which we are concerned violate the provisions of the Constitution of Virginia in the several respects stated, it is not necessary that we consider the question whether these acts likewise violate the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution as interpreted by the recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in Brown v Board of Education * * *.

There is no occasion for us to discuss these decisions other than to say that we deplore the lack of judicial restraint evinced by that court in trespassing on the sovereign rights of this commonwealth reserved to it in the Constitution of the United States. It was an understandable effort to diminish the evils expected from the decision in the Brown case that prompted the enactment of the statutes now under review.

Since the warrants proposed to be drawn by the controller are payable out of state funds which have been improperly withheld from certain public free schools in the state . . . and since there are no other state funds available for the purpose, the writ prayed for is denied.

Minority Opinion

(Written by Justice Willis D Miller with Justice Harold F Snead joining in dissent).

I agree with that part of the majority opinion that recognizes the authority and constitutional right of the General Assembly under Section 141 of the Constitution of Virginia, as amended in 1956, to provide by appropriate legislation for the expenditure of public funds for the payment of tuition grants for the education of Virginia pupils in non-sectarian private schools.

I, however, disagree with that part of the opinion which holds that Section 129 of the Virginia Constitution is still effective and operative and that the several challenged acts are violative of that section, and as a result denies to the controller the right to make payment of such tuition grants. The validity of the acts that authorize tuition grants depends, in my judgment, upon whether the mandate of Section 129 was suspended and rendered inoperative by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Brown V Board of Education . . . which suspended the operative effect of Section 140 of the Virginia Constitution.

My conclusion is that when that decision rendered Section 140 inoperative, it necessarily rendered Section 129 inoperative. I am convinced that Section 129 was intended by the constitutional convention that adopted it to be dependent upon the effective operation of Section 140. Thus my fundamental disagreement with the majority opinion is that it does not accord to Section 129 the manifest intent and purpose of the constitutional convention which adopted it simultaneously with the plain mandate embodied in Section 140. Holding Section 129 to be operative gives to the decision of Brown v. Board of Education, supra, the effect of imposing an affirmative mandate upon the General Assembly of Virginia to operate a system of public free schools though that system be inefficient. The majority opinion makes of Section 129, along with Sections 133, 135 and 136 of Article IX, an instrument by which the General Assembly is required to do what Section 140, simultaneously adopted, forbade it to do in clear and positive language.

When read together, as they must be, Sections 129 and 140 have the following effect: (A) Impose upon the General Assembly the obligation to maintain an efficient system of public free schools, and (B) deny to the General Assembly the right to maintain integrated schools.

In the absence of operative provisions of the Virginia Constitution restricting the power of the General Assembly with respect to public schools, the General Assembly is now fully empowered to enact any legislation it may please with respect to such schools provided that legislation is general in nature. No such limiting provisions have been pointed out, and we have found none.

September 13,000 white children from nine schools of Norfolk, Charlottesville and Front Royal. These nine schools were under order by Federal courts to enroll a few Negroes.

The Virginia court not only struck down the school closing law but also ruled against related laws by which the Almond administration had hoped to avoid even token integration.

These laws included:

¶A provision for cutting off state school funds from any community operating an integrated public school.

¶A statute providing for tuition grants for the private education of pupils assigned to integrated public schools.

¶The so-called "Little Rock laws," under which the Governor could shut down permanently schools policed by Federal authority or disturbed by such policing in a near-by school.

The Governor's Powers

On the Little Rock law, the Virginia court held that while schools policed by Federal troops could be closed temporarily under the Governor's inherent powers, their control could not be taken permanently away from local school authorities.

The majority ruling said that the other statutes violated a constitutional provision requiring Virginia to "maintain an efficient system of public free schools throughout the state."

The almond Administration had argued that this requirement was wiped out when the United States Supreme Court invalidated the segregation section of the state Constitution.

But the majority of the judges ruled that the section requiring state support of the public school system was "independent and separable" from the section on segregation. If the Almond Administration wanted to abandon public education, this should be done by proper amendments to the Constitution, the decision said.

Pleased by the ruling, moderates hoped that the Almond Administration would fall back from "massive" to a more flexible form of resistance. They favored this avenue of retreat: Return the schools to local control and possible token integration, but provide tuition grants for the private school of children whose parents were unshakeably opposed to integration.

Agitation for Repeal

Diehard segregationists were expected to demand repeal of the constitutional provision requiring a state public school system.

This agitation was expected to be especially strong in "southside" Virginia, the counties south of Richmond that have large Negro populations and where the whites would rather close all schools than abandon segregation.

Governor Almond declined comment. He said he would carry out his previously announced plan of appointing a legislative study commission to devise new laws for consideration by a special session of the General Assembly.

Although today was a state holiday commemorating the birthdays of Robert E. Lee and Thomas (Stonewall) Jackson, Governor Almond spent a part of the day in his office studying the majority decision. It was brought to him by a downcast aide, who mourned: "This is a sad day, Governor."

"Don't feel that way" replied the Governor. "I think it will come out all right."

He said he intended to study the decision carefully. Then, perhaps tomorrow night, he will make a televised broadcast that will include some advice to the three communities where schools are closed, he said.

Although friends of the Governor say he is now convinced that some degree of integration is inescapable, they do not expect him to advocate an early reopening of the closed schools.

Today's rulings, made on a friendly test brought last September by the Almond Administration, is not appealable. Governor Almond told newsmen that he had "implicit faith in and high respect for the capacity and integrity of each and every member of the court."

The majority opinion was written by Chief Justice John W. Eggleston of Norfolk, with Justices C. Vernon Spratley of Hampton, A. C. Buchanan of Taxewell, Kennon C. Whittle of Martinsville and Lawrence W. I. Anson, of Portsmouth, concurring. Dissenting were Justice Willis D. Miller and Harold H. Snead, both of Richmond.

Dissenting Contention

Justice Miller contended that Section 129 of the Constitution obliging the state to maintain a system of "efficient free public schools," had been inoperative by the United States Supreme Court desegregation decree invalidating Section 140, which provided that "white and colored children shall not be taught in the same schools."

He said the two sections had been adopted simultaneously and must be taken together. The justice maintained that the framers of the Constitution had considered the separation of the races indispensable to an efficient school system.

The prevailing opinion forbade the Legislature to take the state out of the field of public education and said the state would have to support even those schools where "pupils of both races are compelled to be enrolled and brought together however unfortunate that situation may be."

It warned that tuition grants for private schools must not come from funds "improperly withheld" from public schools.

Part Texts of Rulings On Virginia Schools

RICHMOND, Va. (AP)—Following are partial texts of the majority and minority opinions of the Virginia Supreme Court in the school segregation case.

Majority, written by Chief Justice John W. Eggleston, with Justices C. Vernon Spratley, A. C. Buchanan, Kennon C. Whittle and Lawrence W. I'Anson concurring:

UP TO ASSEMBLY

Clearly, the language of Section 141, as amended, contemplates that if the state funds are to be devoted to the education of Virginia students in nonsectarian private schools, the General Assembly should make the necessary appropriation therefor. The purposes of Section 141 may not be accomplished at the expense of some public free schools by withholding state funds from their support, and devoting such funds to the payment of tuition grants, as is attempted under the provisions of the appropriation act of 1958. . .

This devices leaves such schools from which the supporting funds are withheld and diverted entirely without the state support required by Section 129 of the Constitution. That section requires the state to "maintain an efficient system of public free schools throughout the state." That means that the state must support such public free schools in the state as are necessary to an efficient system, including those in which the pupils of both races are compelled to be enrolled and taught together, however unfortunate that situation may be.

NO PROVISION MADE

It follows, then, that the provisions of . . . (the closure law and the fund cutoff) violate Section 129 of the Constitution in that they remove from the public school system any schools in which pupils of the two races are mixed, and make no provision for their support and maintenance as a part of the system.

It is argued that the closing of schools under these provisions is merely temporary. But the acts do not so provide, and the fact that provision is attempted to be made for the education in private schools of children who have been attending these interrupted schools indicates that the condition may be prolonged.

. . . We agree that the General Assembly may determine what is an "efficient system," but it cannot by definition impair or disregard constitutional requirements. . . . While the mixing of the races is a factor which may impair the efficiency of the system, the separation of the races alone will not, as the statutory definition implies, constitute an "efficient system."

PROVIDING FOR CLOSING

Again, the act . . . providing for the closing of schools because of integration, divesting local authorities of all power and control over them, and vesting such authority in the governor, violates Section 133 of the Constitution which vests the supervision of local schools in the local school boards.

The . . . (Little Rock acts) provide for the closing of schools in communities which may be disturbed because of the presence in, and policing of, such schools by federal troops and personnel. . . . While we agree that the state, under its police power, has the right under these conditions to direct the temporary closing of a school, the provision divesting the local authorities of their control and vesting such authority in the governor runs counter to Section 133 of the Constitution.

FIND NO OBJECTION

We find no constitutional objection to the prescribed procedure for making tuition grants out of funds properly available for the purpose. . . .

Having reached the conclusion that certain provisions of the acts with which we are concerned violate to provisions of the Constitution of Virginia in the several respects stated, it is not necessary that we consider the question whether these acts likewise violate the provisions of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution as interpreted by the recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in Brown vs. Board of Education. . .

There is no occasion for us to discuss these decisions other than to say that we deplore the lack of judicial restraint evinced by that court in trespassing on the sovereign rights of this commonwealth reserved to it in the Constitution of the United States. It was an understandable effort to diminish the evils expected from the decision in the Brown case that prompted the enactment of the statutes now under review.

Since the warrants proposed to be drawn by the comptroller are payable out of state funds which have been improperly withheld from certain public free schools in the state . . . and since there are no other state funds available for the purpose, the writ prayed for its denied.

Minority, written by Justice Willis D. Miller with Justice Harold F. Snead joining in dissent:

. . .I agree with that part of the majority opinion that recognizes the authority and constitutional right of the General Assembly under Section 141 of the Constitution of Virginia, as amended in 1956, to provide by appropriate legislation for the expenditure of public funds for the payment of tuition grants for the education of Virginia pupils in nonsectarian private schools.

. . . I, however, disagree with that part of the opinion which holds that Section 129 of the Virginia Constitution is still effective and operative and that the several challenged acts are violative of that section, and as a result denies to the comptroller the right to make payment of such tuition grants. The validity of the acts that authorize tuition grants, depends, in my judgment, upon whether the mandate of Section 129 was suspended and rendered inoperative by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Brown vs. Board of Education . . . which suspended the operative effect of Section 140 of the Virginia Constitution.

BOTH SECTIONS

My conclusion is that when that decision rendered Section 140 inoperative, it necessarily rendered Section 129 inoperative. I am convinced that Section 129 was intended by the constitutional convention that adopted it to be dependent upon the effective operation of Section 140. Thus my fundamental disagreement with the majority opinion is that it does not accord to Section 129 the manifest intent and purpose of the constitutional convention which adopted it simultaneously with the plain mandate embodied in Section 140. Holding Section 129 to be operative gives to the decision of Brown vs. Board of Education, supra, the effect of imposing an affirmative mandate upon the General Assembly of Virginia to operate a system of public free schools though that system be inefficient. The majority opinion makes of Section 129, along with Sections 133, 135 and 136 of Article IX, an instrument by which the General Assembly is required to do what Section 140, simultaneously adopted, forbade it to do in clear and positive language.

EFFECT OF SECTIONS

. . . When read together, as they must be, Sections 129 and 140 have the following effect: (A) impose upon the General Assembly the obligation to maintain an efficient system of public free schools, and (B) deny to the General Assembly the right to maintain integrated schools.

. . . In the absence of operative provisions of the Virginia Constitution restricting the power of the General Assembly with respect to public schools, the General Assembly is now fully empowered to enact any legislation it may please with respect to such schools provided that legislation is general in nature. No such limiting provisions have been pointed out, and we have found none.

Just whom are they trying to fool?

(An Editorial)

In spite of all of the hoopla and window dressing being waged over the consideration of the report of the Perrow Commission by the Virginia Legislature, the plan which is widely heralded as a substitute for Massive Resistance is nothing of the sort.

It is just another attempt to attain the objectives of Massive Resistance by another technique which fools nobody but those deluded by their own cleverness.

Although the report shows a little crack in the dike of stubbornness, the struggle now going on in Richmond is not a contest between the forces of reaction and the forces of liberalism but between those who want no integration at all and those who want as little as possible and still remain within the letter of the law.

The proposals advanced simply provide the mechanics by which the state can nullify, through administrative procedures, what they could not revoke through the courts.

The plans represent a number of major points — (A) Vesting the pupil placement authority in the local school boards instead of being controlled by the state; (B) Permitting the local communities to determine whether or not they will maintain public or private schools; (C) Providing grants to individual citizens who elect to send their children to private instead of integrated public schools; (D) Permitting the various communities to maintain or reject compulsory school attendance laws.

While these makeshift changes might give some lattitude to progressive communities which want to abide by the Constitution and get on with the business of educating their children, the laxity of the proposals creates an administrative hodgepodge and makes a shambles of any attempt to establish a uniform state policy. It is like playing a game in which each player is permitted to make his own rules.

The most diabolical feature of the plan is the item covering private grants which will be made available to private schools.

This opens the flood gates for every get-rich schemer, demagogue and charlatan to establish a school, so-called, to cash in on the taxpayers' dollar.

The impracticality of this was shown under the G.I. Bill of Rights by which millions of former G.I.'s were mulcted out of both their money and their time by taking courses in hot house schools which wasted their time and failed to prepare them to earn a living.

Because the appeal to prejudice is never guided by reason, it can be expected that the abuses will be even more lucrative and the consequences worse.

This feature seems to strike at the very foundation of the Supreme Court decision which will undoubtedly be attacked in the courts. The original ruling was based on the theory that the states could not maintain schools at taxpayers' expense from which any segment of the population is barred.

We see little difference between the state maintaining jim crow schools and private citizens maintaining schools by letting the pupils carry the tax money to the institution instead of sending it directly.

Taxpayers' money is still their money, it matters not what means of conveyance is employed. The Perrow scheme is a hoax pure and simple and its sponsors know it as well as we do.

Maximum Segregation Seen in Perrow Plan

State Senator Armistead L. Boothe declared yesterday that the Perrow Commission's local option plan will keep Alexandria schools almost entirely segregated for decades.

At the same time, he warned that, in their efforts to preserve a segregated public school system, Virginians will gain nothing by circulating venereal disease and illegitimacy rates among Washington school children.

Addressing the Alexandria Kiwanis Club at the George Mason Hotel, Mr. Boothe called the Perrow Commission plan the fairest and most realistic yet propounded.

"It will keep the framework of our public school system. It will afford local option to withdraw from the system. It will maintain a maximum amount of segregation," he said.

"In Alexandria it will keep the white schools 99 per cent segregated within the lifetime of everyone in this room."

Denounces Pessimism

Denouncing "decadent pessimism" concerning the future of Virginia and the country, Mr. Boothe urged an imaginative and constructive approach to local and State problems.

"We need to stop deprecating ourselves and degrading our citizens. It does not help us in Virginia to figure out how we can keep our schools open and segregated by circulating pamphlets of hatred and fear," he said.

"We do not help our community by degrading non-professional people and by throwing all persons belonging to labor unions into the category of gangsters and Communists. Some of our most conservative citizens, homeowners, voters and taxpayers belong to unions. And in Virginia there has not been one suggestion of graft or corruption among these citizens."

Defends Record

Asserting that he is a segregationist, Mr. Boothe said he has been the victim of often vitriolic and untrue personal charges emanating from a group of people he described as the "Reardon Ring." He said the group had been merciless to consideration of amendments.

The 55-delegate vote bore out predictions of the Perrow plan backers, who feel they will be able to send the bill to the Senate Thursday by that margin.

During the debate, southsiders attacked the assignment bill as a "retreat from the State posture of resistance."

Administration forces sought to make the measure more palatable to bitter-end segregationist forces by altering it to let them continue under the present State pupil placement law until and unless Federal courts knock it down finally.

Del. J. J. Williams Jr. (D-Henrico) presented the administration measure and offered the local option amendment. Del. Stuart Wheatley (D-Danville) led the fight against it.

Wheatley, whose forces want the Legislature to continue the fight at the state level as long as possible and stand by the Pupil Placement Act, attacked the new proposal as a change of state policy, rather than on particulars.

He said to approve the bill, even with the amendment on local option, would have the effect of telling Federal courts to go on and throw out the Pupil Placement Act "because we don't think its any good either."

"This would be a retreat before the shot is fired," he said.

Not Cooked up Overnight

But Williams told the House the local placement plans was "not something we cooked up overnight," but was drafted after six weeks of study. He said the Commission subcommittee he headed "wanted to come up with something that would stand up in the courts" and withstand attempts at desegregation.

He said the Committee's counsel advised the present placement act "has outlived its usefulness."

The subcommittee and Commission felt, Williams said, the State should be prepared with something in its place "lest we have massive integration."

Perrow Bill Survives House Test

Assignment Plan Wins Tentative Approval 55-43

RICHMOND, April 15 (AP)—The Almond administration's local pupil assignment bill survived a vital test of strength with opponents by a 55-43 vote in the Virginia House today.

By that margin backers of the heart of the Perrow Commission plan defeated efforts to send the bill back to committee—a move to kill it.

Almond's floor leaders then beat back a number of parliamentary moves designed at delaying advancement of the bill, and the House moved on Earlier, a Commission member proposed the General Assembly let the voters say whether the State should get out of the public school business.

Del. Fred G. Pollard (D-Richmond) introduced in the House a bill calling for a statewide advisory referendum next November on whether to take the public school mandate for public schools out of the State Constitution.

Public Hearing Set

Pollard's bill, with a number of backers of the Perrow Commission plan as co-patrons, was intended to offset a proposal by massive resistance forces favoring constitutional changes. The latter measure is set for public hearing Friday before the House Privileges and Elections Committee.

The Commission and Gov. J. Lindsay Almond recommended to the Assembly that no changes be made in the Constitution at this time.

The Pollard measure would put to the voters two questions:

"Do you favor amending the Constitution of Virginia so that all public education will cease if that course is necessary to prevent any mixing of the races in any public school anywhere in Virginia?

"Do you favor amending the Constitution of Virginia so as to abolish the State system of public schools and to have substituted in its place a guarantee that each county and city shall have the right, but not the duty, to operate public schools . . . even though some of such schools may be integrated?"

The results of such a referendum would be purely advisory to guide the Assembly on what changes, if any, to propose in the Constitution.

Integration Foes Besiege Va. Capitol

5,000 Demand State Nullify U. S. Rulings

RICHMOND, Va., Mar. 31 (UPI).—Virginia segregationists, 5,000 strong, marched on the state Capitol today demanding that Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. and the Legislature adopt and unyielding stand against further school integration.

The marchers urged that Virginia, as a sovereign state, attempt to interpose its power to nullify Federal court rulings that result in mixing of the races in classrooms. The plan of so-called "interposition" or nullification has bene talked about in Virginia for several years.

Special Session

The crowd, drawn mostly from rural southside Virginia, which has the state's heaviest Negro population, was orderly. It thronged the Capitol grounds as the Legislature met in special session to take up a new anti-integration program believed based on local option.

Gov. Almond ignored the demonstrators. He invited the leaders to meet with him in his office, but they declined.

The demonstrators assailed the Governor for the integration of schools in Norfolk, Alexandria and Arlington following the collapse of the state' so-called "massive resistance" laws.

The Legislature officially snubbed the protest march by the self-styled Bill of Rights Crusade although a majority of its members sat on the Capitol steps to hear Gov. Almond denounced.

"You must snatch up the torch of liberty from where the executive branch has let it fall," they were told by Edward J. Silverman, executive director of the crusade.

Studies Report

Gov. Almond was in his office during the meeting studying a report on new anti-integration measures presented by a forty-member legislative commission.

Sen. Mosby Perrow, chairman of the commission that drafted the new anti-integration recommendations, handed the report to Gov. Almond as the crowd began to gather. Copies were mailed tonight to the legislators, giving them nearly a week to study it before debate.

VIRGINIANS DIVIDE ON SCHOOL BILLS

Integration Foes Ask Repeal of Public Education Proviso in Constitutional Change

Special to The New York Times.

RICHMOND, Va., April 9—Virginia's massive-resistance bloc introduced its program for combating racial integration in the Legislature here today.

The program calls for the repeal of the state's constitutional provision for public schools and provides for pupil placement controlled by the Legislature.

The proposals and a hearing today on several bills to carry out recommendations of the Perrow Commission on Education pointed up the sharp divisions in the Legislature over methods for minimizing integration.

The resisters, ready to take localities out of public education unless it can be segregated, seek to hold the line tighter than the Perrow Commission, the proposals of which are supported by Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr.

Delegate Stuart Wheatley of Danville introduced the key bill to repeal Section 129 of the state constitution. The section now reads: "The General Assembly [Legislature] shall establish and maintain an efficient system of public free schools throughout the state."

He said the bill had twenty-nine patrons and a good chance of passage in the hundred-member house. Mr. Wheatley, a lawyer, declared that the measure was designed to strengthen the Perrow Commission's program and not oppose it.

'Other Means' of Education

For the section would be substituted this language: "Every country, city or town, if the same be a separate school district, is authorized to establish and maintain public schools or to provide other means of education or school aid to children or both."

The Perrow Commission voted 22-to-16 against recommending such constitutional change. Its report declared that a program nearly as effective could be achieved by continuing public schools with the minimum required financing supplemented as localities desired.

The pupil placement proposal would substitute for one recommended by the Perrow Commission. The resisters suggest a seven-man placement board from the Legislature to make tentative school assignments. This group would report to the whole Legislature, which would make the final assignments.

The commission, in its program of free choice for localities suggested pupil assignment by local boards using state-wide criteria set up by the State Board of Education. This is a departure from the present system, under challenge in the courts, by which a three-member state board assigns pupils. In two years of operation it has not assigned a Negro pupil to previously white schools, although its criteria are legally non-racial.

Widened Tuition Grants

Another revision proposed by the resisters is to widen a tuition grant system by providing $250 a year toward tuition of any pupil enrolled in any Virginia school. The Perrow Commission's suggestion was for a maximum of $250 toward educating any pupil attending a non-sectarian school whether directly affected by integration or not.

State Senator Mosby G. Perrow of Lynchburg, chairman of the forty-member legislative commission, said this week he was confident that his group's local option proposals would be approved substantially as offered.

Faubus Hints Compromise

Special to The New York Times.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., April 9—Fov. Orval E. Faubus said today that he did not intend to initiate a compromise in the Little Rock school dispute but that he would accept one if opposing sides got together.

He had previously expressed a desire that Little Rock's public high schools be reopened on a basis "acceptable to both sides." He said then this possibly could be taken integration.

Mr. Faubus devoted part of his remarks at a news conference to criticizing three Little Rock School Board members who said Wednesday they expected the public schools to open this fall with some degree of integration. He said the three—"the moderate" half of the board—were "again acting contrary to their pledges as candidates."

During the election campaign last December the Governor criticized the three members—Ted Lamb, Everett Tucker Jr. and Russell H. aMtson Jr.—and said they were "integrationists."

VIRGINIA TO WEIGH SCHOOL PROGRAM

Legislature Will Study Plan by 40-Member Panel to Minimize Integration

Special to The New York Times.

RICHMOND, Va., April 9—Virginia's Legislature will resume on Monday its battle over how best to minimize school integration.

Battle lines formed again this week, with disclosure of a local-option plan backed by thirty-one members of a forty-member legislative commission, which studied the problem for eight weeks.

Reaction to the report was varied. Representative Watkins M. Abbitt of Southside Virginia, where the Negro population is large, termed the report "a complete surrender to the integrationists."

Lieut. Gov. A. E. S. Stephens of Smithfield called it "realism, drawing up lines for the next battle in a long, long war."

Local Option Plan

The program offers localities a choice between continued public education, where areas will accept some integration, and state-aided private education, where they will not. Areas preferring private education would be enabled to reduce their public schools to litle more than a maintenance program.

The program was drawn up without advice from Senator Harry F. Byrd, leader of the dominant conservative wing of the state Democratic party and originator of the earlier massive resistance or no-integration effort.

Throughout the commission's report there were indications that the members were seeking to avoid court reversal of the plan. The massive resistance laws were declared unconstitutional earlier this year.

A program of joint state-local scholarships of up to $250 a year, for instance, was broadened to cover all pupils preferring nonsectarian private schooling, whether directly affected by integration or not. This was to improve the legal defensibility of the program.

Considerable argument is expected on whether to submit to a referendum a move that could take Virginia out of the public school business. The commission is reported to have rejected this proposal by 22 to 16. The indicated reason was to avoid a political battle.

Wide support for the general local-option approach and for some specific proposals was expressed by many legislators.

Comments from politicians and educators indicated that the commission recommendations faced an uphill battle.

Minority commission members, without suggesting their own program, urge more resistance aimed at halting any integration beyond that started in four communities on a limited basis in February. They reserve the right to support any proposal aimed at continuing the state's traditional segregation policy.

This pointed toward renewal of the battle that started at the brief January opening of the current special session on the school problem. Then, Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. won approval of a limited program moving toward "containment" of integration. He overcame strong opposition from a block seeking to revive some form of massive resistance. The session was recessed while the commission, headed by State Senator Mosby G. Perrow, mapped its program.

Governor Almond is expected to support the commission's report in an address to the Legislature Monday. Bills will be introduced then to put the program into the legislative machinery.

Some victories for the containment effort are expected, but analysts pointed out that much of the proposed legislation carries an emergency clause. This requires four-fifths approval of legislators present and voting.

The firmest segregationists thus appear to be in a favorable position to bargain on some points or remove emergency clauses, which are aimed at getting the program operating before the next school term.

Montgomery Suit Hearing Planned

RICHMOND, Va (AP) — The U. S. Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals has scheduled a hearing here Thursday on a plea from 45 Montgomery County, N. C., Negroes for admission to that county's white schools.

U. S. District Judge Edward M. Stanley of Greensboro dismissed the suit on the ground that the Negroes had not exhausted their administrative remedies under North Carolina's Assignment and Enrolment of Pupils Act.

Va. Placement Board Again Named In Suit

RICHMOND, Va. (AP) — The State Pupil Placement Board for the second time in several weeks has been named a co-defendant in a school desegregation suit.

Federal Dist. Judge Sterling Hutcheson said Thursday he was naming the board co-defendant in a case seeking desegregation of several public schools in Richmond.

Dist. Judge Walter E. Hoffman recently added the board as a defendant in the Newport News desegregation. His action marked the first time that the board was formally named a defendant in one of the school cases.

Hutcheson, who heard the Richmond case in March, reserved a decision until the board becomes an additional party. He also denied a motion by the city to dismiss the suit.

Richmond had moved that the suit be dismissed on the ground the city school board does not have authority to assign pupils. Under Virginia law, all assignment powers have been taken away from local school boards and vested with the three-man state board.

In the original Richmond suit, six Negroes applied to attend two all-white public schools, three each at Westhampton and Nathaniel Bacon elementary schools. All six applications were turned down by the placement board.

Nathaniel Bacon since then has been converted into a Negro school.

Later, 11 Negroes applied to enter the white Chandler Junior High School and were turned down by the placement board. No suit has been filed in their behalf.

NORFOLK TO OBEY INTEGRATION ORDER

The Pilot Norfolk

NORFOLK, Va., Nov. 2 (UPI)—The controversial Pupil Placement Board, threatened with a contempt citation in Federal court, agreed Monday to the assignment of four Negroes to previously white schools here.

It marked the first time that the board, the last remnant of the state's "massive resistance" doctrine, had approved integration after making thousands of classroom assignments on a segregated basis.

p. 34 M

The three-member board was told last month by Federal District Judge Walter E. Hoffman that it would be cited with contempt if it did not approve the four transfer requests.

Judge Hoffman, who ordered white schools here to integrate last February, had assigned the four on a temporary basis, while giving the placement board an opportunity to explain its rejection of the applications and reverse its decision.

Placement Board Faces Court on School Entry Rule

The Evening Star Washington, D.C. Thurs. 11-22-59

NORFOLK, Va., Oct. 22 (AP).—The State pupil Placement Board appears in Federal District Court today to defend its policy of denying Negroes admission to white schools.

The board, defendant in a suit brought by Negro pupils, contended in an answer filed several weeks ago that it does not discriminate illegally against Negroes.

The placement board said its policy is to reject Negro applicants for white schools until a Negro files an appeal from such action, and that no Negro applicant has filed such an appeal.

Appeals, the board said, would give it a better opportunity to study the individual merits of each case.

At a hearing before Judge Walter E. Hoffman in August, placement board members admitted that racial considerations played a part in their rejection of several Negro applicants.

Judge Hoffman later directed that four of 23 Negro applicants be admitted to white schools temporarily until the placement board could be heard in its own defense.

NORFOLK — Virginia's Pupil Placement Board avoided a contempt of court citation Monday by assigning four colored pupils to predominately white Norfolk public schools.

Acting under protest, the board assigned the pupils to schools which they have been attending since September under a temporary court order and on assignment by the Norfolk City School Board.

The temporary court order to enroll the pupils was issued by Federal District Judge Walter E. Hoffman in August after the placement Board had rejected the applications.

They entered the schools in September.

On Oct. 23 Judge Hoffman directed the Placement Board to reconsider its rejection of the pupils' applications and to report to him by Monday.

In its report, submitted at the last minute, the Placement Board said that it was "respectfully objecting" to the assignment, declaring:

"The Board is uncertain in its own mind as to the meaning and extent of the court's (Oct. 23) order.

"The Board was of the opinion that until it was directed to take specific action, in precise and exact terms, it would be right to respectfully disagree with the conclusions of the court and act accordingly without submitting to a possible citation for contempt.

"However, the Board has been advised by its counsel that the failure of the Board to assign the children . . . would in his opinion, render the members of the Board liable to a citation for contempt. . . ."

PUPIL PLACEMENT LAW

Hearing Set Wednesday On Negro Admissions

Federal District Judge Albert V. Bryan yesterday set Wednesday to hear a plea from 14 Negro students for "immediate" admission to five white schools in Alexandria.

The session will amount to Judge Bryan's hearing of a motion filed last fall by the students' attorneys requesting their admission to the schools while the city's desegregation case as a whole is being argued.

Judge Bryan said he also will hear arguments next Wednesday on the city school board's request that the case be tried by a three-judge Federal panel to determine the constitutionality of Virginia's pupil placement plan.

Date Causes Surprise

The date, named by the judge at a pretrial conference with the opposing attorneys, came as a surprise.

State officials, at least, had expected a delay until after January 19, the day the Virginia Supreme Court is expected to rule on the constitutionality of the State's "massive resistance" laws.

Judge Bryan said a full schedule would not permit him to wait. He pointed out that arguments on the merits of the suit itself could not be heard before the two motions are disposed of.

Commonwealth's Attorney Earl F. Wagner and J. Barton Phillips, school board attorneys, asked for a delay which they said was requested by the attorney general's office in Richmond.

"The State," Mr. Wagner said, "would like more time to prepare its case. It particularly wants to argue the motion for a three-judge court."

Frank D. Reeves, Otto L. Tucker and James M. Narbrit, 3d, attorneys for the students, opposed a delay on grounds the Alexandria School Board and School Supt. T. C. Williams, defendants in the case, "have had since last October (when the suit was filed) to prepare their case."

Mr. Reeves also told the court that the 14 pupils "still are in segregated schools" and should not be asked to "await the pleasure of the attorney general's office any longer."

The hearing also saw a disagreement among the opposing lawyers on possible admission dates.

Qualification Data Ready

Mr. Reeves said he would like to see the students enrolled in three elementary and two high schools "in time for the spring term."

Mr. Wagner, who then pointed out that the Alexandria school system has a one-term rather than a two-term year, conceded later that the system admits "transfer students" any time between September and June.

In the event integration is ordered, Mr. Wagner said, the school board is prepared to present the court with individual qualification jackets on each student, based on seven pupil admissions criteria approved last October.

VIRGINIA

The Governor And Public Schools

WHEN GOVERNOR ALMOND, in his address to the reconvened special session of the General Assembly of Virginia, gave his unqualified support to the PERROW Commission report, recommendations, and proposed legislation it became almost certain that the major items of the report would eventually win the legislators' majority support.

In the next several days, well organized opposition to most of the report, led by some "Organization" stalwarts, developed.

Among these stalwarts of the "loyal opposition" is State Senator HARRY F. BYRD JR., which clearly indicates that the ALMOND admission that neither he nor the Assembly can override the federal government and its courts has created a sharp schism between the governor and United States Senator BYRD (Senior), long-time unchallenged leader of the dominant wing of the Democratic Party in the state.

The Governor's Address

Three facets of the governor's address bear emphasis. (1) He is abandoning his attitude of stoical silence in the face of criticism, some of which he termed "slanderous calumny." (2) He is more than ever convinced that some integration is inevitable under rulings of both the federal and state courts. (3) He is strongly opposed to a general abandonment of public schools, although he supports some localized closures under the PERROW proposals for freedom-of-choice by individual school districts and their governing bodies.)

As regards the legislative proposals under consideration in Richmond, most of them are dubious in intent and probable effect, and some are downright dangerous to the future of sound public education—dangerous to both white and Negro pupils. Some give ample grounds for the intensified sense of insecurity and uncertainty reported among the teaching and administrative personnel.

Zoning And Schools

Among the most unthinking of the PERROW plans is one which would remove all zoning, safety, health, and related requirements from the location of (private) schools, their structural characteristics, and so forth.

Local and other ordinances and regulations would be void as to schools. Any sort of fire-trap structure need only get the nod of the State Board of Education and the State Fire Marshal, to begin enrolling pupils unwilling to attend public integrated schools.

Any legislators who vote for the removal of safety and other requirements as to school buildings, public or private, will have to close their minds to the history of holocausts that claimed lives and maimed the bodies of helpless boys and girls in days past, and to the likelihood of repetitions of such tragedies, such as by fire and structural collapse, in any haphazardly approved buildings.

Monetary Control

Chairman PERROW and his 39 colleagues on the commission obviously took their cue from the abortive attempt by Norfolk's City Council, when they came up with the complicated plan whose plain intent is to remove control of the schools from the respective boards of education and place it in the hands of the schools of the political governing bodies.

Under this plan, monies for school operations and teachers' salaries would be itemized in budgets—but only for "information"—and the budgets "are never to be adopted" officially by the local governing bodies. Instead, funds would be parcelled out month to month, or even week to week, to the boards—instead of as now, for a fiscal year.

PERROW and ALMOND insist on the retention of the integration-inspired clause in teachers' contracts, permitting dismissal on 30-days notice. Reading the handwriting on the wall, one Norfolk assistant superintendent, professionally highly regarded, has resigned for a college professorship in a western state. Unless sanity returns to Virginia, others will join the trek to other climes.

Surplus Buildings Plan

At least one federal court has had occasion to express doubt that the present state laws dealing with disposal of "surplus" public buildings would stand up in a scheme to sell public school buildings to private school sponsors "for $1.00 and other valuable considerations" as a way to evade legal obligations. So the PERROW Commission came up with ideas, now before the Assembly, whereby localities could (after a referendum) force the sale of "surplus" public schools that were made surplus because the localities closed them.

Interminable litigation would result from another of the commission's recommendations which, we repeat, are just a poorly re-laundered package of the dirty linen of massive resistance. That recommendation is for a law under which five white parents of pupils in a given school could contest the admittance of a Negro.

ROBERT E. BAKER of the Washington Post and Times-Herald comments: "... the moderates' dilemma (is that) if they fight the overall PERROW Commission program, or any of its parts, they may split up the governor's slim majority in the General Assembly and open the door to extreme legislation from the massive resisters."

Dilemma Of Moderates

Perhaps the moderates in Virginia, as in the entire South, do face a dilemma. It may not help them escape from it by remarking that the dilemma is largely of their own making by virtue of their silence while Virginia officialdom was putting the state in a posture of total disregard for obedience to the courts.

Only during the five-month closure of some schools did influential and moderate spokesmen of the majority race begin to speak out in numbers, and some to seek relief in the courts.

Continued silence by moderates, while the extremists are busy and vocal, could mean an even more tragic forfeiture of the hard-won advantages of sound public education.

Against the laudable view of the PERROW Commission for retaining in the Virginia Constitution the provisions requiring public education, a movement is afoot to force a statewide referendum leading to elimination of such constitutional requirements. Should this move be successful, those Virginians who have seen the tragedy of closed public schools and the shortcomings of hit-and-miss substitutes may vote against amendments in the referendum. We deeply hope that they would in no uncertain terms.

Segregation Group Promises To Aid 'Negro' Schools

FARMVILLE, Va. (ANP) — A segregationist group seeking funds to operate all-white private schools in Prince Edward County next September said, if asked, they will help Negroes set up private schools.

All school funds last Wednesday were deleted from the 1959-60 budget, closing 2 white and Negro schools to impede possible integration.

Blanton Hanbury, president of the Prince Edward School Foundation, announced that his group "would be glad to render any assistance we can" in helping Negroes set up private schools.

act does not annul the act. It means only that the actual placements by the school board—even on order by the placement board—are subject to review by the court, for racial discrimination without resort to the placement board."

NEGROES WIN REVIEW OF SCHOOL REFUSAL

ALEXANDRIA, Va., June 3 (AP)—Federal Judge Albert V. Bryan ordered the Arlington School Board today to review before June 22 the applications of twenty-six Negro students denied admission to white classes.

He directed the board to reconsider the applications "without regard to race or color and with the use only of just, reasonable and undiscriminatory criteria, fairly applied."

Judge Bryan said the state's Pupil Placement Board could intervene as a party, but he made it clear that the Arlington School Board was responsible for making pupil assignments.

Any objections to the school board assignments, made by the June 22 deadline, must be filed in the United States District Court within seven days after the filing of the school board report, the judge said. He set July 7 as the date to hear any objections from the Negroes' attorneys.

Judge Bryan cited earlier Federal court decisions that made the local school boards immediately responsible for pupil assignments.

He said, "The court's disregard of the [state] placement

Almond Asks Fight to Save State's Schools

Tells Graduates at Front Royal Public Education Is Threatened

By Robert E. Baker
Staff Reporter

FRONT ROYAL, Va., June 9—Gov. J. Lindsay Almond called upon Virginians tonight to join him in a fight to save public schools in the state "before it is too late."

Abandoning public education, he said, would "consign a generation of children to the darkness of illiteracy, the pits of indolence and dependency, the dungeons of delinquency."

He urged Virginians not to "succumb to the blandishments of those who would have Virginia abandon public education."

The Governor's strongest embrace of the public school system to date came at a time when one county — Prince Edward—has already decided to abandon its public schools rather than desegregate them. Every community has that power under the state's new "freedom of choice" program.

Victims of Shutdown

Significantly, the Governor took his stand for public schools in a speech to the 95 graduates of the Warren County Educational Foundation High School, a private makeshift school established when Virginia's "massive resistance" laws shut down Warren County High School last fall.

When the public high school reopened in February, white parents declined to send their children there and 21 Negroes attended for the remainder of the year.

The Governor's speech was more than advice to the white parents here. It was a warning that he anticipates an all out battle over the future of public schools at the General Assembly session in January. It was a plea for help in fighting those persons who believe abolishing public education in the state is preferable to desegregation anywhere.

One group here had petitioned the private school directors to withdraw their speaking invitation to Almond.

"The issues revolving around public education will confront the next session of the General Assembly," Almond said. "I have taken my stand. We must save, sustain and support the cause of public education in Virginia.

"I call upon all Virginians who believe in the soundness and righteousness of that position to rally to my support before it is too late."

Federal Encroachment

Warning that public education is "indispensable to the strength and security of the Nation," Almond said the Federal government will take over that function if the State abandons it.

He said Virginians must decide which they want: Federally- or State-administered public education.

The Governor praised residents here for their handling of the situation. And he acknowledged that private schooling must be supplied in those areas which will not support public schools under desegregated conditions.

But he warned of the great problems involved and the "precarious" legal position of segregated private schools if they are publicly financed.

"The time for hurling the firebrands of criticism, charges and countercharges and recriminations has passed," he said. "The time has arrived to take stock, not of theory and indulgence in wishful thinking, but in actual conditions and realities . . ."

Challenge to Critics

He again challenged his critics to come forth with a plan which can keep public schools segregated.

"The only sure prevention of any integration anywhere in Virginia is the total abolition of every school everywhere in Virginia," he said. "If this is what they (the critics) advocate, the people of Virginia should now be told with complete clarity . . ."

"We must not allow the welfare of our children and the future of our state to be victimized by the bitterness of disappointment, the pang of frustration, the demon of hate, the threat of political purge, appeal to base passions and prejudice and the stirring of emotions productive of violence and disorder," the Governor added.

Condemning a generation of children to illiteracy, he said, would be disgraceful and "relegate Virginia from the brilliance of her place in the sun of achievement to the engulfing shadows of impotence and decadence."

School Closing Is Lamented By Flemming

WASHINGTON, D. C. (NNPA) — Dr. Arthur S. Flemming, Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, told a press conference June 4 that it was not only a sad day for Prince Edward County, Va., when the public schools there were abandoned, but also for the nation.

The question came up when a reporter asked Dr. Flemming if he would comment on the action of Prince Edward County in voting to provide no funds for its public schools or for scholarships for private schooling.

Dr. Flemming said that at a fairly early date he will make a round-up on the school situation similar to one he made last December showing how pupils were affected in areas where public schools were closed to avoid school desegration.

Answer the reporter's question, Dr Flemming said:

"I, of course, feel that it is a sad day for any community when that community decides not to provide adequately for the education of children in the community.

"I would go beyond that. It is not only a sad day for that community but it is also a sad day for the nation because the total impact of the situation is such that as a nation we need to do everything we possibly can to provide all children with an opportunity for realizing their highest potential.

"I would certainly hope that in the short run that decision would be reversed"

Dr Flemming also said the two Health, Education and Welfare Department bills included in the Administration's civil rights program "would contribute in a truly constructive manner to solution of educational problems which understandably arise from desegregation in some areas"

He added that the two bills "contain no trace whatsoever of coercive intent or punitive action"

Negro Named Principal Of Montgomery School

Margaret Jones, for 28 years a teacher and principal in Montgomery County, has been tentatively named principal of Bannockburn Elementary School in western Bethesda.

Mrs. Jones, a Negro, is the first member of her race to head a predominantly white school in the County. There are no Negroes among the 443 students now enrolled at Bannockburn.

Rose G. Kramer, president of the School Board, said School Supt. C. Taylor Whittier has already discussed the matter informally with the Board and has received its approval.

Mrs. Jones is now principal of the Rock Terrace Elementary School, one of the County's four segregated elementary schools.

She graduated from Howard University and holds a master's degree from Columbia University.

She began teaching in Montgomery in the one-room Scotland School in 1931. More recently she was principal of the now-closed Lincoln Junior High School in Rockville, and was a supervisor of Negro elementary schools for four years.

The Maryland News, a weekly newspaper published in the County, said yesterday in an editorial:

"A few years from now there will be no special news significance to an appointment of this type . . . She has proven to be an outstanding educator and we are glad that her ability has once again been recognized."

Mrs. Jones lives at 2038 18th st. nw. Her husband, Howard I. Jones, is an analyst with the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

Virginia to Decide Race Stand Today

RICHMOND, Va. —(UPI)— An estimated 300,000 Virginians will vote today in a Democratic primary that could determine the course the state will take on school integration.

ALMOND

At stake is Gov. J. Lindsay Almond's control of the legislature, which chose a local option "freedom of choice" program when the courts struck down "massive resistance."

The issue was clearly whether to accept Almond's plan, which permits racial mixing on a local basis, or to restore unyielding resistance to integration.

Forty-six of the 140 seats in the General Assembly are at stake, and if Almond's supporters are upset in too many areas, especially in the Senate, it could mean the Legislature will junk the "freedom of choice" plan and look for stiffer means of maintaining segregation.

The "freedom of choice" plan, which permits a locality to do everything from accept integration to abolish its public schools to circumvent it, squeezed through a special session last spring. It passed the Senate by one vote.

The new plan triggered sharp criticism from diehard segregationists, and more than a dozen of the campaigns were fought over it, generating more interest in the primaries than in previous years when they were settled on local issues.

The estimated turnout of 300,000 was forecast despite a forecast of scattered rain. The polls open at 6 a.m. and close at 7 p.m.

Twelve Senate seats are to be decided with at least seven considered critical tests for Almond's program.

Thirty-four House seats will be decided by the Democrats, who face only token opposition from the Republicans in November in most of the districts. Most observers agreed that Almond's nine-vote margin in the House of Delegates was not in as great danger as his Senate edge.

Virginia County Officially Shuts Public Schools

FARMVILLE, Va. (UPI)—The 21 public schools of rural Prince Edward County closed officially today in the most drastic move taken by a southern locality to avoid the effects of an integration decree.

The schools in effect closed indefinitely when the school term ended early in June but the closure became formal today when the county began operating under its new budget.

The school closures end public education for more than 1,600 Negro students and 1,300 whites in the "southside" Virginia county, a defendant in the Supreme Court's historic 1954 desegregation ruling. The action puts 70 white and 70 Negro teachers out of work.

The county Board of Supervisors voted a month ago to close the schools in defiance of an integration order handed down by the Fourth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which canceled a seven-year integration delay granted by Federal Judge Sterling Hutcheson of Richmond.

Virginia, Token Integration

'Old Dominion' State Senator Contends Local People Should Make Decisions

BY JAMES FREE
News Washington Correspondent
WASHINGTON

WHAT CAN ALABAMA learn from the harsh experience that Virginia has had in trying to preserve segregation in its public schools?

With this in mind we joined in a discussion the other night with State Sen. Armistead L. Boothe of Alexandria, Va., who has played a key part in Virginia's attempted solutions to this critical education problem since 1954.

Freedom Of Choice Plan, No Forced Integration

AT THE OUTSET, Boothe wanted one thing clear: "I am not an integrationist. I am a segregationist. We have tried to preserve 100 per cent segregation, but we failed not only in the federal courts but in the state courts as well. So now Virginia is back to where it was in 1955, to a local option, freedom-of-choice plan under which no parents will be forced to send their children to an integrated school against their will."

Sen. Boothe does not think Virginia has solved the public school problem created by Supreme Court decisions. Nor does he believe that other Southern states can, or necessarily should, use the same approach that Virginia has.

"The important thing," he said, "is that school problems must be solved on a local basis. Dictation from a state capital can be just as wrong as dictation from Washington. The decision as to the kind of schools that will be operated, or not operated, must be made by local citizens who use the schools and who have the most at stake."

In Boothe's home town, Alexandria, several high schools are admitting a few Negro students on orders of the federal court. Under local option, the city has chosen what it expects to be token integration.

BUT WILL the National Association for Advancement of Colored People be content with token integration? Won't admission of this first few open the gates for hundreds more?

"No, the NAACP won't be satisfied," said Boothe. "But that doesn't mean it can get its way. Remember we have a pupil assignment plan, and Negro students applying for transfer have to meet certain standards—standards which most of them simply do not meet. School authorities in Alexandria estimate that we will not, in the foreseeable future, have more than 1 per cent Negro enrollment in the public schools that in the past have been all-white."

Only two years ago a decisive majority of whites in Virginia favored "massive resistance." This year a majority of the voters backed candidates who went along with Gov. Almond's view that "massive resistance" would not do the job. What happened to cause so drastic a change in public sentiment?

"First," said Boothe, "and perhaps more significant, there was the impact—direct and indirect—of the actual closing of public schools in Norfolk, Front Royal and other places. Sen. Harry F. Byrd and others had said it couldn't happen, but it did happen.

"Then there was the crushing business of the State Supreme Court throwing out all the massive resistance laws, holding them unconstitutional under state law. The court said our Constitution meant what it said when it set out that the state has responsibiliy for running a free, effective public school system.

"Then we had the experience of token integration in a few places, with a minimum of trouble and no violence. That changed the thinking of a lot of people.

A Third Ready To Hold For Massive Resistance

"LASTLY, AND THIS is important, too. Along with these other developments—and because of them—Gov. Almond and a number of other leaders changed their ideas about what the state should try to do. I'd say, as a generalization, that perhaps a third of the whites in Virginia are adamant in support of massive resistance, that another third would have gone along with token integration from the start. This means to me that the middle third tends to go along with the top state leaders; they were for massive resistance when the leaders favored that, when the leaders changed over to local option with freedom of choice they were for that."

What is Boothe's personal aim in future school desegregation disputes?

"To do all I can to keep the public schools open, with a maximum of segregation," he replied.

Almond Opposes Dropping Schools

HARRISONBURG, Va., Oct. 1 (AP).—"We cannot afford to abandon schools at any level," Gov. Almond said here yesterday.

Gov. Almond, addressing a convocation marking the 50th anniversary of Madison College, said: "Virginia must maintain its high position in the education field. I am determined it will do so."

He said the State must "continue to improve the educational opportunities offered to our youth" and institutions such as Madison "must continue to provide more and better trained persons to meet the demands for teachers by all schools, both public and private."

6 School Loans Voted by Board

The Washington Post
Washington D.C.

RICHMOND, Oct. 22 (AP)—The State Board of Education today authorized release of Literary Fund money totaling $925,000 to six Virginia counties for school construction projects.

Board President William N. Neff of Abingdon, in presenting the finance committee's report, said the six projects were selected on a basis of urgency and size from some 20 previously approved.

A seventh project came before the Board at today's meeting and received prompt approval. This was the request for $30,000 for the Z. C. Morton Elementary School (Negro) in Louisa County. An application for $240,000 for the same project had been approved earlier with five others.

The other projects approved were:

Frederick County, Stonewall Elementary School, $30,000; Bedford County, Thaxton Elementary, $75,000; Lee County, Dryden Elementary and High School, $250,000; Roanoke County, Cave Spring High School, $200,000, and Wise County, Dwina Elementary, $100,000.

The Board approved the following applications, subject to approval of plans and specifications and the availablity of funds:

Albemarle County, Esmont Elementary (Negro), $185,000, and Albemarle High School, $100,000; Carroll County, Lamsburg Elementary, $100,000; Louisa County, Shelfar Elementary (Negro), $105,000; and Smyth County, Marion Senior High, $75,000.

The Board also approved the Nottoway County School Board's application for release of the remainder of the County's Battle Fund money. Neff said the money, $7894, will be used by the County to acquire a mobile school unit, which he said will be the state's first classroom on wheels.

In other actions the Board gave final approval to the revised school building manual and authorized Virginia State College to issue and sell revenue bonds totaling $565,000 for the construction of a new dormitory.

Davis Y. Paschall, State Superintendent of Public Instruction, told the Board final editorial changes had been made in the new building manual and that the text was ready to go to the printer. The new manual, given tentative approval by the Board at a September meeting, will be effective Jan. 1, 1960. The Board, however, has authorized its immediate use by localities presently preparing construction plans.

Floyd County To Assign 13 Negro Pupils

The Evening Star
Washington D.C.

ROANOKE, Va., Nov. 7 (AP).—Floyd County will assign 13 Negro children to white county high schools next week as directed by United States Judge Roby C. Thompson, School Superintendent James Combs said Thursday. The Negroes would actually begin attending integrated classes January 25.

Pending notification of the parents, he declined to say which schools they will be attending.

At one time, there were hints that Floyd would close rather than integrate its schools.

At the windup of a desegregation suit in Roanoke September 10, Judge Thompson directed Floyd school authorities to assign 14 Negro children "to the white schools in Floyd County at the beginning of the second semester . . . January 25, 1960."

The court's final order, however, directed the admission of only 13, said Mr. Combs, because one child listed as a plaintiff in the case did not file a proper transfer application.

The school board was ordered to assign the 13 by Monday "to one or more" Floyd white schools.

The children applied for admission to schools at Floyd and Check. Floyd has no Negro high school. The 13 have been attending Christiansburg (Va.) Institute, a Negro school jointly operated by several nearby localities.

NAACP Official Sees Failure of Placement Laws

The Black Dispatch
Oklahoma City, Okla.

DANVILLE, Va.—A high NAACP official predicted this week that school placement laws "will be declared unconstitutional by the U. S. Supreme Court because of the way they are being used."

Speaking before the Virginia State Conference of NAACP branches, Gloster B. Current, director of NAACP branches, declared that "this law gives prejudiced officials a device with which to deny admission of Negro pupils to previously all-white schools."

These laws have permitted "only a token number of schools to be desegregated in North Carolina, iVrginia and Arkansas," he said.

Mr. Current then called for more "Negro parents and pupils to make applications for admission to local schools in order to receive the best education afforded in their communities.

"We must prepare our children for the new opportunities which exist," Mr. Current continued, "and motivate them to earn better grades and aspire to even higher standards of performance."

The iVrginia State Conference of NAACP branches was holding its 24th annual meeting attended by delegates from the 85 branches throughout the state.

iVrginia, like other NAACP conferences, is in the midst of a national NAACP drive for 500,000 members during 1959, Golden Anniversary year of the NAACP.

Closings Are Deplored By Ministers

Norfolk-Portsmouth Pastors Urge City To Reopen Schools

Special to Journal and Guide

The Baptist Ministers Conference of Norfolk, Portsmouth and Vicinity—the largest organization of its kind in Tidewater — went on record this week as being opposed to the Norfolk City Council school funds cut-off action of last week which would close even more schools in the city.

The ministers, in a resolution drawn Monday, describe council's action as "retaliatory, revengeful and unChristian." The conference feels that the council has caused community disharmony and friction not only between the races, but also has divided families by its attitude and actions.

THE REV. S. L. Scott, Jr., is president and the Rev. H. L. Long is secretary of the conference which feels that the responsibility of implementing decisions of state and federal courts in the school matter lies with members of both races.

The social action committee of the conference which drew up the resolution includes the Revs. F. P. Wise, chairman; H. N. Johnson, H. Y. Myers, W. L. Hamilton and E. C. Walton.

THE FULL TEXT of the ministers' resolution says:

"We, the Baptist Ministers' Conference of Norfolk, Portsmouth and Vicinity have observed with great concern the schools of our city that are already closed and the threat of closing other schools through the cut off measures of our City Council. We especially deplore the Council's attitude. For it is retaliatory, revengeful and un-Christian. The members of the City Council have brought to our community disharmony not only between the races but between people of the same race and have even divided families.

"WE CONCUR with Rabbi Schecter that the abrupt closing of the Council session of last Tuesday was indeed the abuse of freedom of speech. This was an exhibition of intemperance and pride. We would remind the gentlemen of the Council of the word of the Lord; "Pride goeth before destruction and a haughty spirit before a fall."

"This Conference joins with the many liberty-loving people in Norfolk, the State of Virginia and throughout the nation in welcoming the decisions of the Supreme Court of Virginia and the district Federal Court handed down on Monday, January 19, 1959 regarding the unconstitutionality of Virginia laws enacted in an effort to circumvent desegregation of public schools in Virginia as ordered by the Supreme Court of our Nation.

"HOWEVER, there is no disposition on our part to glory or gloat in racial triumph, we are humble as we face the joint responsibility of both Negro and whites to join in implementing these decisions despite fierce opposition. It is our ardent hope and our sincere prayer that the public officials of our city and state will cease their resistance and begin a united effort to comply with the state and federal court decisions. We recognize the fact that changes are often difficult and that the present required changes are delicate. But we believe that the law abiding people of goodwill in our southern communities will dedicate themselves to peaceful solutions of the problems that will arise and will cooperate in the true spirit of Christianity and democracy.

ALMOND CONCEDES A SCHOOL DEFEAT

Tells Virginia's Legislature He Is Helpless to Prevent Integration in 3 Cities

By HOMER BIGART
Special to The New York Times.

RICHMOND, Va., Jan. 28—Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. told an emergency session of the Virginia Legislature today that he was helpless to prevent the imminent desegregation of public schools in Norfolk, Arlington and Charlottesville.

His statement was received in silence in the crowded chamber of the House of Delegates. Most of the delegates reacted calmly.

Only a handful of the most ardent segregationists in the Legislature were still hopeful tonight of some drastic action to prevent Negro students from entering nine previously all-white schools next week.

Some Schools Shut

The nine schools include six in Norfolk, two in Charlottesville and one in Arlington. The schools in Charlottesville and Norfolk have been closed since last fall to avoid court integration orders.

All the Governor could offer today was a two-point program to assist a voluntary boycott of integrated schools.

He asked the legislators to repeal the compulsory-attendance law and to enact a new statute to provide tuition grants for parents who wanted to shift their children from integrated public schools to private schools.

Governor Almond tried to head off an expected demand by segregationist diehards that he use the state's police powers to close the schools affected by court-ordered integration.

Rejects Arbitrary Force

He said he was under pressure to seek authority from the eGneral Assembly to padlock and police any school threatened with imminent desegregation. But he warned the Assembly that it could not validly direct him to use such force on an arbitrary basis.

He said he would not use the police to thwart or override the desegregation decrees of the Federal courts. He would use the police, he said, only "to protect the safety and good order of the community, to restore order and protect life and property."

The Governor said he would face martyrdom in a Federal penitentiary if he thought it would do any good.

"I am willing," he said, "to serve in durance vile if it will accomplish the desired purpose." But, he went on, "I know of nothing more futile than a penal sentence that contributes to nothing but the ridiculous."

Governor Almond made it delegates of Southside Virginia—the tobacco counties below Richmond where segregation sentiment runs highest—for some show of defiance of Federal law.

Loud applause and whistles, but no rebel yells, punctuated the Governor's review of efforts to stave off Federal pressure. These he denounced as "relentless, brutish and formidable."

"Only my love for Virginia and the Pillar of the Almighty sustain me in this hour," the Governor said. Then, after invoking Thomas Paine's "These are times that try men's souls," he left the rostrum and, head bowed, strode from the room. There was fervid applause.

Arlington Plea Rejected

Special to The New York Times.

ALEXANDRIA, Va. Jan. 28—A last-minute effort to block the admission of four Negro children to a white junior high school in Arlington next Monday was rejected today by Federal District Judge Albert V. Bryan.

The Arlington school board asked Judge Bryan to postpone until next September the effective date of his previous order to admit the four Negroes. The judge said the board had shown no "change of circumstances" to justify a postponement.

An attorney for the board, James H. Simmonds, said he would next seek a stay from the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit. This court has already affirmed the order requiring admission of the four children, and the chances of its granting a delay are considered next to nothing.

The school board intends to petition the Supreme Court for review of the case, and it could seek a stay in the meantime from a single Supreme Court Justice. But here again legal observers believe there is virtually no possibility of the board's getting such relief.

School Board Reconciled

Arlington is a densely populated suburb across the Potomac River from Washington. Many of its residents come from Northern states, and there is probably more acceptance of clear that he wanted the Assembly to do no more than adopt his two-point program. Then it should recess, he urged, to await the recommendations of a legislative commission that will devise a long-range anti-integration program.

He said he would recommend that the commission consider procedures for the sale of integrated public school buildings that might become "surplus" as a result of the wholesale withdrawal of white children.

He said he would also urge careful study of an amendment to that section of the Virginia Constitution requiring the maintenance of a public school system.

To provide for long-range financing of tuition grants, the Governor said he would recommend the imposition of a sales tax.

Asks Tuition Fund Now

He urged the immediate appropriation of $2,250,000 for tuition grants in 1959-60. This money would come out of the general fund of the State Treasury with no risk of incurring a deficit, he said.

Bills implementing the Governor's program were introduced immediately after he had finished speaking. These included a tuition-grant measure to provide up to $250 per pupil and a companion statute authorizing localities to supplement the state grants with funds of their own.

The Governor pledged the maintenance of order when schools were opened to integration and said with sarcasm that he would thank the Federal Government to keep out of this function.

From the mood of the Assembly it appeared that Governor Almond's program might prevail over the demands from school integration than in any other part of the state.

The school board, reconciled to the probable failure of its final legal moves, has already ordered all necessary steps taken to enroll the four Negroes Monday. They have been assigned to classes.

The four, three boys and a girl, are all in the seventh grade. They will go to Stratford Junior High School.

In support of the motion for postponement today, the Arlington school superintendent, Ray A. Reid, said a transfer in the middle of the year would be detrimental to the Negro children.

But Judge Bryan noted that last September, when he ruled that the four must be admitted, he put his order off until midterm on the ground that such a delay would not prejudice them.

Frank D. Reeves, counsel for the children, said the school board had not made any argument against mid-term transfers until today. He accused the board of "bad faith" and said it had used "every device and strategy" to avoid integration.

VIRGINIA SEEKS WAYS TO LIMIT INTEGRATION

Federal and State Rulings Interfere With Massive Legal Resistance To Mixed Public Schools

BUT OPPOSITION REMAINS

By ARTHUR KROCK

WASHINGTON, Jan. 31—From the beginning of Virginia's "massive resistance" to the Supreme Court's 1954 decision that State and local laws requiring racial segregation in the public schools are unconstitutional, its political leaders have limited the methods of this resistance to "every legal means." That was the phrase used by Senator Harry F. Byrd, the head of the Democratic organization which rules Virginia, and by Governor J. Lindsay Almond, throughout the long period in which Virginia sought and successively failed to obtain Federal and State court rulings that would enable it to maintain the racially separate system of its public education.

But during this same period the leaders also encouraged the impression among the people that somehow they would hold intact this segregated system.

Yet fractional integration is about to begin in the hitherto all-white schools of Arlington and Norfolk; the board of education in Charlottesville has satisfied the Fourth Circuit Federal Court of Appeals that it is proceeding "in good faith" to meet the conditions laid down by the Supreme Court five years ago; and the process of compliance will begin in other counties and localities. The proudest State in the Union, with ample basis for its pride, has yielded to what it protested, and still protests, as the "Federal judicial oligarchy" which issued court orders "with shocking impact on our public school system." But it has yielded with dignity and with this public pledge from Governor Almond:

> Whatever may ensue * * * law and order must prevail to the end that the good name and honor of Virginia be not defamed. With fairness and impartiality to all, I am determined to keep the peace and good order.

Wider Impact

There is a wider impact to the end in Virginia of "massive resistance by every legal means" to public school integration. By history, tradition, and because it is the birthplace of Robert E. Lee, Virginia is the spiritual leader of the former Confederate States. When the Confederacy lost the Shenandoah Valley to the Union armies, it lost its granary and hence the War Between the States. When racial school integration came to Virginia, its ultimate spread in the whole South became as inevitable.

Virginia's hard choice and eventual submission were obvious from the time "massive resistance" was first proclaimed. The choice was between opposing the Federal Government with State force or limiting resistance to judicial process. When a succession of Federal court decisions invalidated "every legal means" to which the State resorted, and then its high court struck down the laws which bound the school boards to "massive resistance," the time to acknowledge this choice had come. And Governor Almond did that in his statement to the General Assembly at Richmond Wednesday that "the police power of Virginia cannot be asserted to thwart or override the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, State or Federal."

Another System

But though Virginia has exhausted "every legal means" to maintain intact the State's segregated public school system, its Government, with the undoubted support of the vast majority of the citizens, is now legislating another segregated system of education within the area left valid by the Supreme Court and by the high court of Virginia. In this area individuals may exercise the constitutional freedom of not attending mixed schools, and, to the purpose that those who do this may get an education, the General Assembly is providing tuition grants for use in private teaching arrangements.

Under the Supreme Court ruling of 1954 these grants cannot be conditioned on their use in segregated classes. Under the decision of the State's highest court the grants cannot be made from funds raised by taxation to maintain the public school system. And under an existing Virginia statute school attendance is compulsory. Therefore, the legislation must leave recipients of the grants free, if they choose, to use them in mixed private classes; other State funds must be diverted to supply the grants; and the compulsory public school attendance law must be repealed. The prospect is that all these steps will soon be taken at Richmond, and then will come the test how much of an efficient public school system will remain in Virginia.

Tests to Be Made

The outcome of this test will depend on the rate of racial integration that white parents in each school district will accept for a trial period; on the numbers who will make use of the private tuition grants; and on the ability of the state to finance these and keep them within the bounds of the high state court's ruling and the Supreme Court's 1954 decision. It also will depend on when and whether the Assembly will legislate a pupil placement law like Alabama's, which the Supreme Court has accepted as "constitutional on its face." This law sets up criteria for the admission of children to schools that, if adjudged to be used in good faith by the local boards of education, will make the rate of racial integration very slow indeed in many communities, and in some Southern counties could preserve segregation for generations.

But the present temper of Governor Almond and the General Assembly is strongly adverse to putting any reliance on the effect of such criteria long to defer total racial integration, even in districts where it would be a certain invitation to violence.

Meanwhile, the Federal courts have taken two steps to ease the Southern anguish of compliance. The first was the affirmation by the Supreme Court of a lower court finding that the criteria of the Alabama law are constitutional.

Period of Grace

The second was the statement of Chief Judge Sobeloff of the Fourth Federal Circuit in granting a further stay of the integration at Charlottesville: "A school board should be afforded reasonable time [to make the] adjustments essential to a positive and effective transition from a racially segregated to a non-segregated public school system * * *."

But these steps will not change the Southern conviction Governor Almond expressed when he told the General Assembly that "forces motivated by political expediency" have 'destroyed the right of the people to have a voice in the education of their children." And public education in the South has already become the first victim of this resentment.

ALMOND DISPUTED ON SCHOOL ATTACK

Capital Educators Denounce Virginian's Remarks on Their Mixed Classes

By BESS FURMAN

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22—Carl F. Hansen, superintendent of school here, today denounced the attack on District of Columbia integrated schools made Tuesday night by the Governor of Virginia.

Dr. Hansen issued a joint statement with Walter N. Tobriner, Washington attorney and President of the District of Columbia Board of Education.

It was directed at the phrase Governor J. Lindsay Almond Jr. had used on radio and television

" * * * those who defend or close their eyes to the livid stench of sadism, sex, immorality and juvenile delinquency infesting the mixed schools of the District of Columbia, and elsewhere."

Dr. Hansen told a news conference that school officials here wanted to go about their business of educating children without entering into political controversy.

"But the intemperateness of that comment could not be ignored," he said.

Dr. Hansen said his intention was "not to invove the school system in the concerns of another political jurisdiction," but rather "to inform Governor Almond his statement concerning the schools is unjustified, that he does not understand the significance of the school program here."

Dr. Hansen and Mr. Tobriner said in part:

"This statement is a gratuitous and intemperate attack upon the innate decency of 114,000 children and youth in our public schools." It maligns the parents and teachers of those children * * *

"It condemns the many for the misfortunes and the deviations of the few. It implies that the conditions relative to morality among some children are peculiar to Washington and cannot be found in other cities as well, whether segregated or integrated.

"It subjects to profound indignity and unprovoked assault a public school system that is dedicated to the educational improvement of all the children in accordance with the highest ideals of democracy. * * *"

Dr. Hanson said the district schools considered tackling "Educational and moral retardation" as "a better policy than ignoring and secreting such problems." He said a program of education in morals was being instituted in the schools.

Under questioning, he said that there had bee nno instances of mixed race pregnancies in the district schools. He said there were 209 pregnancies last year (1957-58) in girls under 16 years of age. The total girl enrollment then was 55,818.

There were 242 pregnant girls under 16 in 1956-57, when female enrollment was 54,394; and 192 pregnant girls under 16 in 1955-56 when the enrollment was 53,815.

Seventy-four per cent of the more than 114,000 students in the district are Negroes.

Hard To Find New Ways Of Defiance

Legislature Marks Time; Segregationists Put On Pressure

RICHMOND — The Virginia General Assembly was set Tuesday to receive the widely-heralded report of the Perrow Commission — but it wasn't exactly ready.

Although the commission, appointed by Gov. Almond to find ways to keep as much segregation as possible, has been working for weeks, the group had trouble getting a report together for the opening day of the special session of the legislature.

AS A RESULT, the legislators were obliged to mark time while the militant band of segregationists held a "mass march" on the state capitol in an effort to intimidate the government and members of the assembly into a program of defiance of rulings by both the Virginia Supreme Court and the U. S. Supreme Court. This "Bill of Rights Crusade" brought racists into town under a rallying cry of "interposition."

The 40-man Perrow Commission, working feverishly over the weekend, had a meeting Monday afternoon for a "last review" of the recommendations it would make toward a new legislative program designed to replace the outlawed massive resistance program. It became obvious that the commission's report could not be printed and distributed in time for legislators to give it serious consideration by the Tuesday noon opening of the assembly.

Both the governor and the legislators wanted time to study the report. Besides, Gov. Almond also had to prepare some recommendations of his own to send to the assembly.

Virginia Laws Closing 9 Schools Voided by State's Supreme Court

SomeIntegration Held Possible

By The Associated Press

Richmond, Va., Jan. 19.—Virginia's legal barriers against racial integration, under which nine white schools have been closed since September, toppled Monday in the State Supreme Court.

The unappealable 5-to-2 decision brought the immediate prospect of some classroom race mixing before the Legislature can attempt to erect new blockades.

It also brought from Governor J. Lindsay Almond, Jr., an expression of "faith in the ability and judgment" of the seven members of the State court, plus the announcement that he will confer with other State leaders on the best future course to take.

Federal Court Voids Law

The State court opinion was followed moments later by the decision of a three-judge Federal Court in Norfolk striking down the State law under which six Norfolk schools have been kept closed. The Federal Court said it wasn't attempting to tell Virginia—aside from State constitutional requirements—it had to operate public schools.

But as long as the State did operate such a system, it added, the closing of some of the schools, or even grades of the schools, violates the rights of a citizen to equal protection under the law.

The State Supreme Court, however, ruled that Virginia still is subject to a requirement of the State Constitution to operate a public-school system throughout the state.

This was the nub of the Almond Administration's test of the so-called massive-resistance laws before the court.

Operation Up to State

The Administration argued that when the Supreme Court of the United States knocked out the school-segregation section of Virginia Constitution it also invalidated the requirement for public-school operation.

Attorney General A. S. Harrisections were interdependent and inseparable. The 1954 United States opinion left Virginia with the authority to operate or not operate schools as it saw fit, the Administration argued.

"The provisions of the constitution do not permit the matter to be so summarily disposed of," said the 22-page majority opinion by Chief Justice John W. Eggleston. ". . . The language (requiring public free schools) is clear and positive in its terms and provisions. . . . We are not permitted to speculate on what the framers of that section might have meant to say, but are of necessity controlled by what they did say."

School-Closing Law Voided

The court then proceeded to throw out the school-closing law which has been invoked in Norfolk affecting 10,000 pupils; Charlottesville, affecting 1,700, and Warren County High at Front Royal, 1,000. Almost all of the displaced pupils in Warren and Charlottesville have been attending makeshift private classes in churches and other community buildings. About 4,500 of the displaced Norfolk pupils are in private classes or tutoring groups.

The court held the closure and State seizure violated a constitutional section vesting supervision of local schools in local school boards.

It also held the Governor had no authority to set up a substitute State-school system for pupils displaced by State-school closure under federal integration orders.

The court also threw out the two "Little Rock" bills which would give the Governor authority to close any schools in areas, or near areas, policed by federal forces. It said the Governor had certain inherent police powers for use to preserve the peace but that the schools could not be taken permanently out of the hands of local school authorities.

And the Legislature's efforts to restrict State-school funds to segregated schools also came a cropper. The court rejected the use of the word "efficient" to mean "segragated." The word efficient was so defined in the appropriations act as a means of shutting off State funds to any locality which might attempt to operate integrated schools under a federal order.

Payment Not Mandatory

The test was brought by agreement on the tuition-grant act under which the State would subsidize the private education of any displaced pupil or pupil who declined to attend an integrated school. The court found no constitutional objection to the payment of tuition grants "out of funds properly available for the purpose" to help educate children in private, nonsectarian schools.

But, the court added, the State controller could not be compelled to pay tuition grants from funds improperly withheld from the localities under the fund-cutoff law.

There was no reaction to the opinion from school officials in Norfolk, Charlottesville, or Warren County, where some schools are closed, or Arlington, where desegregation has been ordered by a federal court for next month.

Governor Almond said he wanted to read the State and federal opinions before commenting on them. But after he had a chance to talk to some associates he said he planned to name a legislative commission to help him chart a program for a special session of the General Assembly to enact.

Virginia Decisions Are More of Same

Virginia's massive resistance laws to school integration as they existed apparently were handed mortal blows yesterday in decisions handed down by the state's supreme court and a three-judge federal court.

The federal court struck down the state's school closing law, thus returning at least temporarily control of Virginia's closed schools to local boards of education. The decision did not order the schools reopened but left the way clear for the boards to do so if they so desire.

The state's own supreme court struck down a Virginia law authorizing payment of tuition grants for private schooling and related statutes. This was somewhat similar to a law on Georgia's statute books with the same provisions.

In their decision on school closings, the federal judges announced their intention of issuing an injunction against such closings. This obviously leaves it up to local boards to decide whether to reopen now on an integrated basis. Unless there is further action by the Virginia Legislature, not now in session, the situation stands.

In view of past court decisions, these in Virginia should not have caused great surprise. The U.S. Supreme Court's ruling on the Little Rock case of Sept. 30 of 1958 stated plainly that "State support of segregated schools through any arrangement, management, funds or property cannot be squared with the amendment's (the 14th) command that no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

The court decreed further on Little Rock that its orders "can neither be nullified openly and directly by state legislators or state executives or judicial officers nor nullified indirectly by them through evasive schemes whether attempted 'ingeniously or ingenuously.'"

The Virginia decision thus further narrows the field for legal action and legislation in the struggle to maintain segregated public schools. Any effort to follow the Virginia pattern in Georgia eventually would suffer the same fate on the basis of legal precedent thus established.

The proposed plan to permit state income tax and other tax deductions for donations to private schools is certain to be approved by the Georgia General Assembly. On its face it appears to be about the only new proposal not now affected by some previous legal decision. It accepts as inevitable shutting off of public funds for any school ordered integrated.

Still unresolved is how Georgia and several other Southern states are to provide education for their children who are caught in this legal maelstrom between state and federal governments.

Rulings Due On Virginia School Law

By Robert E. Baker
Staff Reporter

The validity of Virginia's "massive resistance" laws will be decided on two fronts Monday—by the State's own Supreme Court of Appeals in Richmond and by a three-judge Federal court in Norfolk.

Almond

The laws were enacted by a special General Assembly session in 1956 after Virginia leadership shelved a plan envisioning minimum—compliance with the Supreme Court's school desegregation decisions.

The laws were designed to keep Virginia's public schools open and segregated as long as possible. But in September, when Federal courts refused to suspend desegregation orders for another round of litigation, Virginia law shut nine schools in Norfolk, Charlottesville and Warren County and ousted 13,000 white students.

On Sept. 13, the State launched its own friendly suit to test the "massive resistance" program in the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals.

Defenses at Stake

At stake are the school closing law, a provision cutting off State funds to desegregated schools and the use of tuition grants for private schooling, all defenses in "massive resistance."

But in its November arguments, the State also contested the constitutionality of Section 129 of the Virginia Constitution which requires the General Assembly to maintain a public free school system throughout the State.

On Oct. 27 in Norfolk, 26 white parents and pupils filed suit in Federal court to force the reopening of the State-closed schools there. They attacked the validity of the school-closing law in November arguments.

The state's own test of "massive resistance" was interpreted as a move to forestall Federal court action. Moderates saw it as a healthful move, believing that invalidation of "massive resistance" by the state's highest court would have a more salutary effect upon unyielding segregationists than an identical ruling by Federal courts.

Withheld in Deference

The three-judge Federal court came to its opinion quickly, but when assured that the State Supreme Court would hand down a ruling in its case on Monday, withheld its decision until that date in deference to the state court and "in the interests of the people of Virginia."

Gov. J. Lindsay Almond, who inherited and embraced "massive resistance" when he took office last year, has said he will appoint a legislative commission to form a new program for submission to the General Assembly if the present laws fall.

Between the fall and the special session, however, he said, there will be "very probably" Negro students in the schools of "Norfolk, Charlottesville and elsewhere." With the school-closing laws, local school boards could reopen schools on a desegregated basis.

Norfolk Order Challenged

Norfolk City Council, however, announced that it will close all secondary schools beginning with February by withholding its own local fund cuts. That action, designed to prevent desegregation until the General Assembly acts, is before the Federal courts this age of litigation. Decisions on Monday are to Arlington County, where the School Board has been ordered to enroll nine Negroes in Stratford Junior High School on Feb. 2. If the "massive resistance" laws fall, Stratford could continue to operate.

The decisions will be handed down on the 152d anniversary of Robert E. Lee's birthday—Lee-Jackson Day in Virginia. The Confederate hero was born on Monday, Jan. 19, 1807.

VIRGINIA SCHOOL RULING MONDAY

State Court's Decision to Decide Courses

BY JOHN E. DAFFRON

RICHMOND, Va. (AP)—Virginia reaches a vital fork Monday on the foggy road to the future of public education.

In one direction lies the probability of some race mixing in the classrooms, conceivably as early as next month. The other points to a continuation of the state government's unyielding resistance. This means additional school closings under state laws and thousands of other pupils turned away from locked schools.

The direction marker will become visible Monday. The Virginia supreme court will announce its decision in the test of the massive resistance laws under which the state has closed nine public schools in three communities rather than obey federal court orders to admit a relatively few Negroes.

But the key point of the decision is expected to be on this point: Did the US Supreme court opinion knocking out the Virginia constitutional requirement for separate schooling for the races also kill the state's requirement to operate a system of public schools throughout the state?

ALMOND'S ARGUMENT

The administration of Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. argued that both sections fell together.

This view was sharply challenged by a state-employed legal expert in the friendly test case.

If the court rules against the administration—and the possibility is readily conceded — the closure laws will be found to violate the state constitution.

Thus the main state barrier against race mixing will crumple.

If the decision goes the other way, the state could pursue a course of abandoning public education in the face of other integration orders. There is substantial sentiment for such a radical change of policy—especially in rural southside Virginia where the Negro population equals, and in some areas outnumbers, the white.

In addition to the state court decision, a three-judge federal court will disclose its ruling in a test of the law under which six white high and junior high schools were closed in Norfolk in September. The federal case in Norfolk—the state hasn't won a federal test on the desegregation issue except to gain more time—is on the one specific point of school closure.

FIVE ACTS TESTED

Five statutes are being tested in the state court—the cutoff of state education funds to a locality that tries to operate integrated schools; tuition grant proposals that would subsidize the private education of pupils deprived of public schools or who declined to attend mixed schools; the school closure act itself; and two acts (the so-called Little Rock bills) that give the governor authority to close schools where violence might erupt or could erupt.

Far more than academic legalisms are involved in the state and federal tests. In both cases some way out is being sought in a dilemma that has deprived more than half of Norfolk's 10,000 displaced pupils of any school training since the start of the term. Also, about 1700 pupils in Charlottesville and another 1000 in Warren county have had to turn to makeshift private schools in churches and other community buildings.

What's ahead if the courts upend the existing legislation?

First off, the governor said he plans to name a large commission of the Legislature to help him design new legal defenses for later construction by a special session of the general assembly.

But won't there be the likelihood of some integration between the time the courts act and the time required for a study commission and the assembly to act?

COULD STILL CLOSE

Almond conceded it was probable some integration could take place. In addition to the three areas where schools are closed after integration orders were handed down, Arlington is under orders to admit four Negroes to a junior high school in February. Neighboring Alexandria has been told to process the applications of 14 Negroes seeking admission to white schools without regard to race.

But Almond also said the upset of the laws wouldn't strip him of all authority to close schools. He told a news conference there were certain inherent police powers the governor could exercise—not arbitrarily, he said, but where there was justification. He obviously meant if there was an immediate threat to public safety.

Whatever the courts may do, Norfolk city council has made a move to block the admission of any Negroes. Council voted—with only one dissent—to cut off local funds to all schools—white and Negro—for classes above the 6th grade. Such action would idle an additional 7000 pupils—mostly Negro.

Rival Raps Mrs. Stone As 'Integrationist'

Thomas J. Broyhill labeled State Delegate Kathryn Stone an "integrationist" last night as the Arlington House of Delegates race picked up steam in the last week of he Democratic primary campaign.

"It seems I have been singled out by Mrs. Stone for special attention and criticism," Mr. Broyhill told a meeting in Lyon Park Community House. "Let's set the record straight."

Earlier this week, Mrs. Stone said Mr. Broyhill was an outspoken supporter of "massive resistance."

"I have always been a champion of the public school system and I have no intention of submitting peacefully to any plan to abolish it," Mr. Broyhill said.

Sees Alternatives

He said that the Perrow "freedom of choice" plan which Mrs. Stone supports "offers only creeping integration for areas which wish to retain their public schools, and closed schools for areas which refuse to accept integration. . . . Enforced integration or closed schools seems a poor recommendation for a plan said to give freedom of choice and a way to save public education in Virginia."

"Mrs. Stone has always believed in total integration," said Mr. Broyhill. "She was the founder and operated the only integrated school in the State for many years prior to the Supreme Court decision. This fact is well known to all members of the General Assembly, and she is not likely to find much co-operation for anything she might attempt to do to benefit Arlington County," Mr. Broyhill said.

Mr. Broyhill is seeking one of the House seats now held by three incumbents who are seeking re-election. They are Mrs. Stone, Harrison Mann and William L. Winston. All three have backed the Perrow plan.

Three-School Plan

Mr. Broyhill again proposed a three-school system—white, colored and integrated — to meet court desegregation orders. Mrs. Stone has said such a plan is unconstitutional.

Mr. Broyhill also proposed a "zoning court" to handle all rezoning in Arlington County. He suggested a three-member panel appointed by the circuit court judge to decide rezoning cases now handled by the county board.

"Judicial procedure and determination will not only provide orderly procedure but will also remove the flavor of politics from zoning decisions which is so often voiced by the public, whether warranted or not," Mr. Broyhill said.

The candidate also said he is in favor of zoning policies which would encourage "high revenue" projects to locate in the county. He said this includes "high density" apartment developments.

'Massive Resistance' Outlawed in Virginia

School Segregation and Closings Forbidden by U. S., State Courts

By United Press International

RICHMOND, Va., Jan. 19.—Federal and state courts struck down Virginia's "massive resistance" laws by which the state closed public schools when faced with orders to admit Negroes.

The decisions, with far-reaching significance across the South, came simultaneously from a Federal constitutional court sitting in Norfolk, Va., and from the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals.

In a unanimous ruling which can be appealed only to the United States Supreme Court, a three-judge Federal court based its blow at "massive resistance" on the principle of equal protection of law under the Constitution. It said Virginia could not close individual schools because of integration and "at the same time keep other public schools throughout the state open on a segregated basis."

It added that Virginia also had accepted the responsibility of maintaining its public schools—a point equally emphasized in the "friendly" test case which the state had brought before the State Supreme Court.

The Federal panel also echoed the United States Supreme Court in previous decisions holding unconstitutional any "evasive schemes which are discriminatory or are designed to evade the court (desegregation) orders." It called school closings under the "massive resistance" laws "tragic." Its decision struck down the law under which the state could close a school to thwart integration. That was the keystone of "massive resistance," authored by Virginia's dominant political figure, Sen. Harry F. Byrd, D.

The State court by 2-5 to 2 decision held invalid a "massive resistance" law which automatically would close a school in which classrooms were integrated and cut off state funds to that school.

New Moves Expected

The two rulings were not unexpected. State officials were prepared to call for a new, as yet undisclosed anti-integration program. But it would take weeks, perhaps months to draft something else to replace the set of "massive resistance" legislation enacted two years ago as the strongest anti-integration laws in the South.

In the meantime, it appeared likely that some school integration might occur in Arlington County, Va., which lies in the metropolitant area of Washington, D. C. Arlington is under Federal Court order to admit four Negroes to the junior high school Feb. 2.

In effect, the court decisions wiped out the state's control over nine schools closed since the start of the 1958-'59 school term, affecting 13,000 pupils in Norfolk, Charlottesville and Front Royal. It left it up to local school boards to decide whether to reopen the closed schools, all of which are under Federal Court orders to admit Negroes.

Urged to Stand Firm

Gov. J. Lindsay Almond jr. planned to appoint a legislative commission to recommend new anti-integration legislation. In the meantime, state officials urged local school boards to stand firm against reopening the schools on an integrated basis.

It was unlikely that any of the closed schools would be reopened immediately.

Several Southern states have laws providing for the closing of schools in the event of integration is ordered. But officials generally declined immediate comment.

Reopening Ordered

In Little Rock, Ark., the courts have ordered a reopening of closed schools. In Georgia, which has a school closing law, Gov. Ernest Vandiver declined comment on what effect the Virginia action might have on his legislative proposal last week that a new individual school closing law be enacted.

In Richmond, Gov. Almond and State Attorney General Harrison reserved comment.

Mr. Harrison brought the test case before the State Supreme Court, basing it on a minor law in the "massive resistance" package—one covering tuition grants to students displaced from integration-closed schools.

Contention Disputed

The state court ruled out Mr. Harrison's contention that Virginia no longer was required to operate a public school system because of the United States Supreme Court's 1954 desegregation ruling. It pointed out that the state "argued that the closing of schools under these provisions is merely temporary."

However, the opinion continued, "indeed, it is a matter of common knowledge that under the provisions of these acts a number of schools in several localities in the state have been closed for months."

Mr. Harrison unsuccessfully contended the state constitution provision requiring a public school system was stricken along with a provision requiring segregated schools, which obviously was ruled out by the United States Supreme Court.

Also struck down by the state court were two so-called "Little Rock" laws that automatically would close schools patrolled by orders of Federal courts and permit the governor to close other schools in the same area.

Justices Willis Miller and Harold F. Snead dissented from the majority in the state ruling on grounds that the Constitutional provisions requiring public school system fell when the United States Supreme Court outlawed segregation, as Mr. Harrison contended.

The majority said that the provision for furnishing state tuition grants, while not unconstitutional on its face, would be unconstitutional when used in connection with the other "massive resistance" laws.

Asks Public For Support On Schools

Gives Only Hint Of New Tactics On Desegregation

By Robert E. Baker and Muriel Guinn
Staff Reporters

Gov. J. Lindsay Almond vowed last night to continue an unyielding stand against school desegregation. He asked Virginians for their support.

In a state-wide radio and television speech, Almond delivered his most fiery and bitterest denunciation of desegregation.

It came a day after Virginia's "massive resistance" laws had been invalidated by the State Supreme Court of Appeals and a three-judge Federal court, and Virginians were awaiting an indication of what the next State move would be.

The Governor gave only a cryptic hint of his plans for reconstructing defenses against desegregation.

"I proposed to restore the tax revenues of this Commonwealth to the control of the people," he said. "They and they alone will decide these issues."

The Governor, as expected, said he would appoint a legislative commission soon to draw up another program for submission to a special session of the General Assembly

And he apparently conceded that Norfolk, Charlottesville and Warren County cannot be stopped legally from beginning desegregation, now that the school closing law has been knocked out.

The law shut down nine schools and ousted 13,000 white children to thwart desegregation in the three communities.

But the Governor complimented the stop-gap private schooling and tutoring set up in the three communities, and urged that it continue without interruption.

He urged that similar private schooling be established "wherever it may become necessary"—apparently a reference to Arlington where four Negroe are scheduled to enroll in Stratford Junior High School on Feb. 2.

Almond made it clear he saw no solution to the desegregation problem by permitting it in those communities willing to accept it. In a virtual call for another "massive resistance" program applied throughout the State, the Governor said:

"The grave Constitutional crisis which has been thrust upon us makes it imperative that our energy, resources and efforts be launched and applied on a State-wide basis.

Dissolution and Chaos

"Abandonment of the principles involved anywhere is to forsake them everywhere. The inevitable result will be total engulfment wit hthe progress of dissolution and chaos measured by the combination of forces confederated and arrayed to divide, conquer, rule and ruin."

Initial reaction to the Governor's speech came from Paul Schweitzer, chairman of the Norfolk School Board:

"We're not interested in perpetuating tutoring groups but in getting on with public education."

Robert A. Peck, chairman of the Arlington School Board, said his Board has stood with the State and will continue to do so—as far as it can legally. The Board announced Monday it would try to obtain a delay in the Federal desegregation order, but would desegregate if necessary.

In Charlottesville, school and city officials were silent on the Governor's speech.

Unyielding Stand

In Warren County, School Board Chairman E. T. Shiner said he wanted to approach the problem "with an open mind." He said he believed it would be "most unfair" to children now in private classes if the closed Warren County High School were reopened only to be shut again by the state.

But the Governor's speech was bound to be greeted with overwhelming acceptance in Southside Virginia and other areas where resistance to the Supreme Court's desegregation decision of 1954 has been unyielding.

"Let me make it abundantly clear for the record now and hereafter, as Governor of this State I will not yield to that which I know to be wrong and will destroy every rational semblance of public education for thousands of the children of Virginia," he said.

"I call upon the people of Virginia to stand firmly with me in this struggle . . . we have just begun to fight."

He addressed those particular remarks to the "faint of heart," to "integrationists," to "false prophets of a 'little or token integration" and, among others, "to those who defend or close their eyes to the livid stench of sadism, sex, immorality and juvenile pregnancy infesting the mixed schools of the District of Columbia and elsewhere."

(The latter comment brought a rejoiner from District School Supt. Carl F. Hansen who said:

("Governo... places 114,000 children and their families in a kind of moral jeopardy.

("Unfortunately allegations of this general kind are so unsupported by fact that we can only say that our children, their families and our teachers are unjustly maligned in his comment.")

Some legal authorities interpreted the Governor's reference to restoring tax revenues of the State to local control to mean that State funds would be appropriated to localities with no strings attached, and the localities then could use the money to support public education or not.

Such a plan probably would mean that Section 129 of the State Constitution would have to be amended. That, section requires the General Assembly to operate a public school system and was upheld as legally binding by the State Supreme Court on Monday.

That court also held that the school closing, fund cut-off and tuition grant laws laws—the "massive resistance" program—violated the State Constitution. A Federal court in Norfolk held simultaneously that "massive resistance" violated the 14th Amendment of Junior High School next Monday remains in effect.

IN DENYING the school board's petition, the judge said he did not feel there had been any showing of changed circumstances or conditions to justify him in delaying admissions.

The school board has made arrangements to enroll the Negroes if last-ditch legal maneuvers fail to win a delay. It has told pupils not to protest integrated classes and warned that any violence would bring expulsion.

The board contended today that it would be detrimental to the Negroes to shift to the white junior high school during the school year.

Attorneys for the Negroes contended the school board had not raised this contention previously.

FRANK D. REEVES argued that the school board was not acting in good faith. He said he hoped for some action from a special session of the Virginia General Assembly convening today which would prevent the Negroes from entering Stratford.

Reeves said the school board for three years has used every device to avoid compliance with the Supreme Court order in 195...

striking down racial segregation in public schools as unconstitutional.

Governor unable to offer plan to slow integration

RICHMOND, Va., Jan. 28.—(AP)—Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. told the Virginia General Assembly today he sees no way to keep the races separate in the state's public schools.

But the imminent classroom integration under the overriding power of the federal government, he said, means thousands of children will have to turn to private schooling for their education.

Thus it appeared Almond wasn't prepared to offer the special school session any specific plan to prevent admission of Negro children to schools in Arlington, Norfolk and Charlottesville—perhaps as early as next week.

HE DID SAY, though, that he would use his authority to put down any threat to public safety that might crop up, ostensibly a reference to any disorder that might accompany school integration.

The governor asked the assembly to repeal the state compulsory school attendnce law and provide for state tuition subsidies for private education of children who declined to attend mixed schools. Then, he suggested, after enacting these statutes immediately the assembly might recess while a study commission he will name ponders a long range course for a partial transition from public to private education.

To critics who have said Almond hasn't been willing to go to the mat with federal authority under the sovereignty of the state, Almond said:

"It is not enough for gentlemen to cry unto you and me: Don't give up the ship', 'stop them', 'it must not happen' or 'it can be prevented.'

"If any of them know the way through the dark maze of judicial aberration and constitutional exploitation, I call upon them to shed the light for which Virginia stands in dire need in this, her dark and agonizing hour.

"No fair minded person would be so unreasonable as to seek to hold me responsible for failure to exercise powers which the state is powerless to be-stow."

AND ALMOND told the assemblymen they were powerless to give him the authority to padlock and police any school in the immediate shaw of integration — a move suggested by some.

He said he would be willing to go to jail with the advocates of such a plan if he thought it would accomplish anything. But he added:

"I know of nothing more futile than a penal sentence that contributes to nothing but the ridiculous."

HE REMINDED the Assembly that Virginia's own Supreme Court as well as federal courts have thrown out state laws designed to prevent the mixing of the races.

Turning to another statute that the more massive resisitors have long regarded as an untested bar against integration, Almond said:

"Contrary to the opinion of some, I cannot conceive how the pupil placement act can be asserted either as a buffer or bulwark between the overriding and superior power of the federal government and the operation of a segregated school.

"That which the state itself is powerless to do, it cannot confer on an administrative agency."

AND, HE ADDED, the state could find no comfort in adopting an assignment plan similar to plans in use in North Carolina and Alabama unless it is willing to set up a conduit "through which to channel an ever increasing stream of Negro children into white schools.

As the legislators gathered to hear Almond, plans moved forward that could lead to the integration of schools in Norfolk, Charlottesville, and Arlington.

Earlier, U. S. District Judge Albert V. Bryan today rejected a plea of the Arlington County school board to delay the admission of four Negroes to a white school until next September.

The judge's order for the admission of the four to Stratford sponsored by the Charlottesville Educational Foundation, a group organized to provide racially segregated classrooms.

The CEF has announced plans to conduct private classes next fall for children who prefer not to attend integrated schools.

Enrollment at Lane High School totaled 1,025. The school faculty has been conducting emergency classroom instruction at the Elks Club, in a number of churches and other public buildings, under sponsorship of the Joint High School Committee.

The latter committee is sponsored by the CEF and the Parents Committee for Emergency Schooling.

Fewer Pupils Expected

Enrollment today was expected to be less than that of last June owing to the transfer of an estimated 200 pupils to other localities and an undetermined number who have dropped out of classes entirely.

A full day's schedule was planned at both schools today.

Venable students were instructed to report to the classrooms of the teachers who had been instructing them in private facilities for the last four months. Lane pupils, who had registered prior to the State's closure order, were directed to go directly to classes assigned them last fall.

GOV. ALMOND
. . . Has no solution

Virginia Voters Choose Route of Local Option

Virginia voters have given a rather convincing endorsement to Gov. Lindsay Almond's "freedom of choice" school plan as the alternative to closing the state's public education system.

Results of the Democratic primary in which "massive resistance" forces attempted to gain control of the State Legislature are highly significant. For the time being, at least, the state's course is clear. Local communities will decide the extent to which they will remain in the public school business.

Virginia, as everyone knows, has been in a condition of crisis for many months as a result of the school integration issue. After "massive resistance" laws one by one were struck down in the courts, Gov. Almond, himself a leader of those opposed to even token integration, found himself in a position of having to preside over the demise of the state's public schools. Either operate all public schools or close them all, the courts had ruled.

Faced with this desperate choice, Gov. Almond turned to the local-option plan. It passed the Legislature by a narrow margin. Voters in Tuesday's election test affirmed the decision. In a choice of no schools at all versus leaving it to individual communities to determine their own future, they have chosen the latter.

On the surface the election appears to be a major defeat for U.S. Sen. Harry F. Byrd, chief architect of the state's integration policies whose political strength has been impregnable in Virginia for as long as most of us can remember.

This does not mean that all Virginia communities will try to adjust to court rulings. But at least it leaves the way open for those who want to do so to make the effort.

The major political significance lies in the fact that in test after test in Tuesday's election, Virginians voted against closing the schools and for local option. In other states, including Georgia, the people themselves ultimately must make a decision.

Legislature Unit Passes Local Option Pupil Assignment

9-8 Vote Sends Almond-Backed Bill to House

By Robert E. Baker

RICHMOND, April 13 The Governor's local pupil assignment plan squeaked by its first hurdle in the General Assembly today after it was amended to give localities the choice of using it or not.

The House Education Committee approved the measure by a 9 to 8 vote. A "massive resistance" bloc failed to kill the proposal in Committee. They sought to leave intact the present State Pupil Placement Act to keep the State in control of all assignments.

The bill came out of Committee with even more local option than proposed by Gov. J. Lindsay Almond and the Perrow Commission.

It was amended to allow the local governing body, upon recommendation of the local school board, to vote a locality out from under its provisions.

This would permit a community to make its own assignment plan without any appeals procedure or the community could operate under the plan, make assignments under criteria set up by the State Board of Education, and use an administrative appeals procedure set out in the measure.

Exempts Two Cities

The bill also was amended to exempt Richmond and Newport News from its provisions because these cities have cited the present State Pupil Placement Act as a defense in pending school desegregation cases.

Ordinarily, the Governor's bill would not go to the House floor for debate on Tuesday. But Del. Harry B. Davis of Princess Anne, House Education Committee chairman, did not report the measure to the House immediately—in deference to legislators who want to avoid voting on controversial measure until after the Wednesday filing deadline for the Democratic primary.

The Governor is expected to have enough support in the House for passage of his bill. But his opponents apparently have enough strength to strip it of its emergency clause which required a four-fifths majority. Without the clause the measure would not become law until 90 days after passage. Heated debate in the House and in the Senate is expected.

Del. Edward M. Hudgins of Chesterfield introduced a bill offered as a compromise between the Governor's local assignment plan and advocates of state pupil placement.

Establishes Board

It would set up a 30-member State assignment board, three members from each Congressional district. The three members would serve as a local assignment board for each district. Appeals would be made to a 5-member board created by the 30-member body.

In other actions:

• The House Education Committee approved without dissent or debate four less controversial Perrow Commission bills.

• The Senate passed, 33-0, the Commission's bill permitting a locality to close schools patrolled by Federal troops—a local option version of the State's "Little Rock" bill which was invalidated by the State Supreme Court in January.

• The Senate Courts Committee postponed action on the Perrow Commission's bill to repeal invalidated "massive resistance" laws.

House Votes Perrow Bill In Virginia

Assignment Plan Faces Tough Test In Hostile Senate

By Robert E. Baker
Staff Reporter

RICHMOND, April 16 The House passed Gov. J. Lindsay Almond's local pupil assignment bill today by a 53-46 vote and set the stage for a tense and far-reaching showdown in the Senate on Friday.

Action in the House came after an opposition bloc made a last minute move to upset the Governor's control there by injecting the powerful name of United States Senator Harry F. Byrd (D-Va.).

Del. A. H. Richardson of Dinwiddie in Southside Virginia warned that passage of the Governor's bill would mean the sellout of Virginia "for a few ambitious politicians."

It would be a "direct slap in the face" of Byrd, Richardson said, "in the twilight years of his life."

This was the first reference to Byrd in the debates of this special General Assembly session although Richardson stressed he was not speaking for the Senator. Byrd has been silent on the "freedom of choice" program offered by the Perrow Commission and Almond as a successor to Byrd's "massive resistance" program.

Richardson's speech made clear the belief of many opposition bloc leaders that the Governor is making a "power play" to capture a realignment of political forces in Virginia and emerge as the State's political leader.

The Governor's local assignment plan is the only measure of considerable controversy in the Perrow Commission's package—and the Governor has refused to compromise on it.

His supporters in the House which passed the measure consist of some Byrd machine lawmakers, the four Republican to 19 vote today after the bitterest debate in years.

They successfully moved the Senate into a Committee Of The Whole to consider the House-passed bill—the first such parliamentary maneuver in 75 years in the Senate.

The Governor's men thus by-passed the Senate Education Committee, which earlier had killed the Senate version of the Governor's bill by a 9-6 vote.

With the successful strategy, the Governor maintained his narrow control of both houses of the General Assembly in his efforts to win approval of the Perrow Commission's "freedom-of-choice" program for dealing with school desegregation.

The vital test vote cracked a deadlock caused by a hard-core bloc seeking to maintain State control of all pupil assignments and a resumption of Virginia's "massive resistance" program which was invalidated by State and Federal courts in January.

"High-handed Tactics"

Gov. J. Lindsay Almond and Sen. Mosby Perrow of Lynchburg were charged with employing "high-handed tactics" by Sen. John H. Temple, of Petersburg.

"I've never seen the likes of it in this Senate," Temple shouted. "I want the people of Virginia to know where the direction for this came from."

The opposition bloc argued that the bill properly should go to the Education Committee which could be discharged by the Governor's supporters if they didn't like the Committee action.

Some of the Senate's biggest names vigorously opposed the majority move, including Harry F. Byrd Jr. of Winchester, who said it would prove to be a "very, very dangerous precedent for many, many years to come."

They appealed to the tradition-conscious Senators with the argument that no rule existed for moving the Senate into the the Committee of the Whole.

But Sen. Armistead L. Booth of Alexandria countered by reciting historical precedent dating from the English parliament through Jefferson's Manual, which guides the Virginia Senate in its deliberations.

The move was not unexpected. Both sides had been caucusing for days on their strategy. A last-minute attempt to reconcile the sharply divided Senate was made during a three-hour recess, but neither side would compromise.

The Governor's men needed the vote of Sen. Stuart B. Carter of Fincastle who flew here yesterday, despite illness, to be on hand for the showdown.

When Lt. Gov. A. E. S. Stephens turned the gavel over to Sen. Edward L. Breeden of Norfolk, as chairman of the Committee Of The Whole, the opposition bloc successfully appealed for a public hearing on the Governor's bill at 10:30 a. m. Monday.

Hard-core senators agreed not to fight again against formation of the Committee of The Whole after the Senate convenes at noon Monday.

During the debate, almost the entire recessed House of Delegates came to the upper chamber to watch the struggle between the Almond supporters and massive resisters.

When the battle was over, Temple helped to cool tempers by presenting a birthday cake to Sen. E. E. Willey of Richmond, who supported the Committee of the Whole and Sen. Curry Carter of Saunton, who didn't.

Senate President Stephens sent members into laughter when he remarked:

"In dividing the cake, in the circumstances, gentlemen, I'd advise against using knives."

The House, meanwhile, passed by large majorities eight relatively uncontroversial Perrow Commission bills. But the fight was not over.

The House Privileges and Elections Committee reported out two rival measures for floor action. It approved a hard-core resolution seting up machinery to wipe out the state public school system.

It also approved a bill—designed to counteract the resolution—which provides for an members and independent and anti-Byrd machine legislators. The opposition bloc consists largely of Byrd machine legislators.

The bill now heads for the Senate, where the Education Committee, controlled by the opposition bloc, already has killed the Senate version by a 9-6 vote.

Strategy of the Governor's men in the Senate has been to move that body into a committee of the whole to consider the House bill, thus by-passing the hostile Education Committee.

But this tradition-breaking move has met resistance even from some Senators who favor the local assignment bill.

The Governor's men may try a different maneuver: voting to send the House bill to the sympathetic Senate Courts Committee.

19 in Opposition Bloc

Reportedly, the Senate opposition bloc has 19 solid votes. The Governor's men hope to hold the remaining 20 members—including State Sen. Stuart Carter of Fincastle who flew in from his sick bed today to be on hand for the crucial voting and maneuvering Friday.

Last minute discussions of the struggle were held with the Governor by Senate leaders.

The House tentatively approved uncontroversial Perrow Commission bills which would allow:

• Local governing bodies to make appropriations on a 30-day basis so they could withdraw financial support from public schools on short notice and turn to private education.

• A 2-year exemption from local zoning ordinances for private schools set up in existing buildings.

• Local governing bodies, with the approval of school boards, to establish compulsory school attendance for their school district.

State Referendum

• A referendum, initiated by 10 per cent of the voters, to force a reluctant school board to sell surplus schools.

• Teachers to repay state scholarships by teaching in private schools.

• Transportation of pupils in each locality to private non-sectarian schools.

When the Governor's supporters attempted to dispense with formalities and place several of the bills up for final House passage, an often routine maneuver requiring four-fifths majority, the opposition bloc stymied the move.

Their leaders reasoned the Governor's supporters were attempting to send the uncontroversial bills to the Senate with the local assignment plan in a play to get approval of the Perrow Commission program as a package.

Enacts Little Rock Bill

The House gave final passage to one bill—allowing localities to close schools if patrolled by Federal personnel—by a 92-4 vote and sent it to the Governor for his signature.

Bill Abolishing Schools Backed by House Unit

By a Staff Reporter

RICHMOND, April 17—The House Privileges and Elections Committee approved 9-4 today a proposal to abolish the state public school system.

The vote came after a two-hour hearing at which most speakers bitterly opposed the measure, which would allow localities to decide whether or not they wanted to operate schools.

The Committee also approved and sent to the House a bill calling for an advisory referendum which would let voters say whether they wanted to abolish the public schools if necessary to bar desegregation.

The Committee room was jammed with citizens who sought to testify against the school abandonment bill. Many left for their homes unheard.

Opponents led by Del. Kathryn Stone of Arlington charged that the "opinions of responsible public groups have been flouted" by the Committee.

Seen Bar to Industry

The hearing brought out divergent views on whether Virginia's industrial development would be injured by wiping out the school system.

John T. Wicker Jr., Richmond attorney, said he thought that is an imaginary fear."

But O. B. Newton Jr., Lynchburg industrialist, said two of that city's newest industries have indicated they would not have moved to Virginia had a public school system not been guaranteed.

The Committee allotted 40 minutes to each side; 16 persons talked against the proposal, four for it.

Opposing the resolution were spokesmen representing the Virginia Committee for Public Schools, Virginia Congress of P-TAs, Virginia League of Women Voters, various local committees for public schools, faculty members of Bridgewater College, Fairfax County Democratic Committee, Fairfax Federation of Citizens Associations and other organizations.

The 10th District was represented heavily by spokesmen opposing the measure, including one from the P-TA of desegregated Stratford Junior High School in Arlington.

J. Bernard Bradshaw, president of that P-TA, said "to change the Constitution is a dangerous thing."

Thomson Is Sponsor

The resolution to abolish the State school system was drawn up by Del. Stuart Wheatley of Danville, Del. James M. Thomson of Alexandria and other lawmakers who oppose the Perrow Commission's recommendations to leave the Constitution unchanged at the present time.

Wheatley in explaining the measure, said: "It amounts to this: You've got to trust the General Assembly to educate your children."

The resolution would guarantee that each community coudl operate a public school system if it desired. To effect the constitutional change, it would have to pass this General Assembly session, the regular session of next January and then be approved in a state-wide referendum next spring.

County Approves No-School Budget

FARMVILLE, Va., June 23 (Special)—The Prince Edward County Board of Supervisors approved a tentative spending program for the coming year today with no provision for public school operations.

The budget is the first of its kind in modern times in Virginia.

The action followed a brief public hearing at which four white speakers opposed the decision to abandon education as a public function.

One was C. G. Gordon Moss, chairman of the history department of Longwood College. He said the Board action seemed to be premature, unChristian, likely to promote juvenile delinquency, and representative of a philosophy he termed "unintentionally evil."

An economics and government professor at Longwood, Henry Bittinger, said the Supervisors should take final appeal from a desegregation order effcetive next September.

The two other critics of the decision were Annie V. Putney and her daughter-in-law, Grace Putney, both of Farmville. They questioned whether the action might leave the education of Negro children either to the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People or to the Federal Government.

But 12 other speakers including Farmville Mayor William F. Watkins Jr. told the Supervisors that the overwhelming sentiment was for abandonment of public schools rather than acceptance of desegregation.

"We have reached the point of no return," said Watkins.

Mrs. Leslie Hamilton, a county school teacher, said the Board was in the position of a teacher who had threatened to discipline an unruly pupil—"you have to go through with it."

The Supervisors announced several weeks ago that they would levy no taxes and make no appropriation for either public school operations or tuition grants.

The Prince Edward Educational Foundation said simultaneously that it would seek to educate white children with private funds in private buildings made available by churches and fraternal groups. The Foundation offered to help the Negroes set up a similar organization, but the offer has not been accepted.

Negro ministers in the Farmville area sent a resolution to the Supervisors asking them to rescind their school closing decision, but no Negro appeared at the hearing.

The County's proposed spending program for general governmental operations is $210,654. The current budget totals $940,000.

Expectations are that the Supervisors would vote next week to cut the real estate and personal property tax rate from $3.40 to about $1.60. Property is assessed at about 20 per cent of market value.

Excerpts From Federal Court Decision on Closing of Virginia Schools

Special to The New York Times.

NORFOLK, Va., Jan. 19—The following are excerpts from a Federal Court ruling here today striking down Virginia's school closing law.

We are not unmindful of the difficulties confronting Virginia and other Southern States following the Brown decision of May 17, 1954. It is not for us to pass upon the wisdom of state legislation, but it is our duty to apply constitutional principles in accordance with the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, and when state legislation conflicts with those constitutional principles, state legislation must yield. Irrespective of what may be said by those in public life, we are gratified to note that counsel for the defendants, including the Attorney General of Virginia, concede that the decisions of the United States Supreme Court are not only binding upon this court but also constitute the law of the land. If there ever existed any room for doubt as to the controlling force of the principles of law enunciated in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U. S. 483, 349 U. S. 294, these doubts were effectively removed when, on Sept. 29, 1958, the Supreme Court handed down its opinion in Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U. S. 1, wherein Brown was expressly and unanimously reaffirmed. Guided by these principles we arrive at the inescapable conclusion that the Commonwealth of Virginia, having accepted and assumed the responsibility of maintaining and operating public schools, cannot act through one of its officers to close one or more public schools in the state solely by reason of the assignment to, or enrollment or presence in, that public school of children of different races and, at the same time, keep other public schools throughout the state open on a segregated basis. The "equal protection" afforded to all persons and taxpayers is lacking in such a situation. While the State of Virginia, directly or indirectly, maintains and operates a school system with the use of public funds, or participates by arrangement or otherwise in the management of such a school system, no one public school or grade in Virginia may be closed to avoid the effect of the law of the land as interpreted by the Supreme Court, while the state permits other public schools or grades to remain open at the expense of the taxpayers. In so holding we have considered only the Constitution of the United States, as it is unnecessary, in our opinion, to pass upon the specific provisions of the Constitution of Virginia which deal directly with the free public school system of the state. We do not suggest that, aside from th Constitution of Virginia, the state mus maintain a public school system. That is a matter for state determination. We merely point out that the closing of a public school or grade therein, for the reasons heretofore assigned violates the right of a citizen to, equal protection of the laws and, as to any children willing to attend a school with a member or members of the opposite race, such a school-closing is a deprivation of due process of law. It follows, therefore, that the defendants must be permanently enjoined form enforcing or attempting to enforce the statutes in question as the same may apply to the public schools of the City of Norfolk.

Resistance to law

In the instant proceeding the six schools are closed solely because of resistance to the law of the land as interpreted by the United States Supreme Court. The underlying reason is, of course, the mixing of races in these schools by the school board's assignment of seventeen Negro children into schools previously attended only by white pupils. The plaintiffs thereupon became a class created by reason of the operation of the massive resistance statutes. They, together with the seventeen Negro children, are the subjects of discrimination and are unable to obtain the benefits of public taxation on the same basis as the parents of other children similarly situated. The statutes and the action of the defendants thereunder manifestly constitute a clear and unmistakable disregard of rights secured by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution.

In the event the State of Virginia withdraws from the business of educating its children, and the local governing bodies assume this responsibility, the same principles with respect to equal protection of laws would be controlling as to that particular county or city. While the county or city, directly or inderectly, maintains and operates a school system with the use of public funds, or participates by arrangement or otherwise in the management of such school system, no one public school or grade in the county or city may be closed to avoid the effect of the law of the land while other public schools or grades remain open at the expense of the taxpayers. Such schemes or devices looking to the cutoff of funds for schools or grades affected by the mixing of races, or the closing or elimination of specific grades in such schools, are evasive tactics which have no standing under the law.

Code of Virginia, 1950, as amended, 22-188.6. If we were to assume the validity of this statute, it would certainly be chimercal to conclude that the Governor could ever order a reopening of any of the six schools where an effective objection may be registered by any one parent of a child cheduled to attend the school in question. There are a large number of Virginians who are determined that there shall be no mixing of races in public schools under any circumstances, and who cannot be expected willingly to comply with the anti-descrimination rule established by the 1954 decision of the United States Supreme Court. To anticipate that there would be no objection on the part of any parent to the operation of an integrated school would require us to completely desregard what everyone knows to be the fact. To postpone the reopening of a school until the end of all opposition to racial mixing cannot possibly be regarded as a temporary measure.

Other Relief Doubted

Nor is any relief afforded by22-188.12 of the Code of Virginia, 1950, as amended, wherein it is provided that the closed school or schools shall become a part of the public school system of the political subdivvision in which the school is located upon a certificate of the school board and board of supervisors of the county or council of the city. It should be noted that this statute, as originally enacted in 1956, made it mandatory upon the Governor to proclaim the closed school as a part of the public school system of the political subdivision upon certification of either the school board or the local governing body.

"Where a state or local government undertakes to provide public schools, it has the obligation to furnish such education to all in the class eligible therefor on an equal basis. Missouri ex rel Gaines v Canada, 305 U. S. 337. As the United States Supreme court has ruled out any classification by race as a condition of eligibility, it follows that all eligible children must be accorded equal treatment with respect to admission or attendance in public schools, subject to reasonable rules and regulations. Disassociated with racial questions, the plaintiffs herein, and the class they represent, are not being accorded education on an equal basis.

The injunction to be issued will simply prohibit the defendants, and all other persons in active concert or participation with defendants who receive or have notice or knowledge of the injunctive order, from in any manner, directly or indirectly, taking any steps in pursuance of the unconstitutional statutes here involved. The effect of this injunction will be tantamount to restoring to the school board its rights, duties and obligations which existed prior to the enactment of the unconstitutional statutes, including, of course, its obligation to comply with the order of this court heretofore entered on Feb. 28, 1957, in the Beckett case. The decree to be entered will not restrain the Commonwealth of Virginia in any sense of the word—it will only prevent defendant state officials and others from endeavoring to enforce the package of unconstitutional laws designed for the purpose of defeating the "law of the land" as expressed in Cooper v. Aaron, supra.

Abundant Authority

What we have just said is abundant authority for denying the motion to dismiss the school board as a party defendant, as well as holding that this is not an action against the Commonwealth of Virginia. The school board may not attempt to enforce these unconstitutional acts any more than the Governor or Attorney General. Neither the board, the other defendants, nor any persons in active concert or participation

Alabama Governor Gives Warning at Inaugural —Ellington Sworn in

MONTGOMERY, Ala., Jan. 19 (AP)—John Patterson was sworn in as Governor of Alabama today. He said he would preserve segregation even if it meant closing the schools.

The 37-year-old son of a Phenix City crime fighter, Albert L. Patterson, who was murdered, warned Negroes in these words after taking the oath of office:

"If you wish to preserve your public education system and educate your children, you should stand up and speak out against the agitators of your own race whose aim is to destroy our school system.

"If you do not do so, and these agitators continue at their present pace, in a short time you will have no public school system at all. Our public schools once destroyed and closed down may not be reopened in your lifetime and mine."

Negro Groups Excluded

A four-hour inaugural parade from which Negro college and high school bands were excluded on orders of the new Governor preceded the swearing in of Mr. Patterson and other constitutional officers.

Outgoing Gov. James E. Folsom rode with his successor at the head of the parade, but left he stands before Mr. Patterson took the oath. Mr. Patterson has gone into court on several occasions to get injunctions against what he called excessive spending of the Folsom Administration.

Three former public officials were indicted for the elder Patterson's murder in the clean-up drive that followed his death. The crippled former State Senator had been nominated on the Democratic ticket for Attorney General in 1954 on a promise to rid Phenix City of vice.

He was shot down outside his Phenix City law office June 18, 1954, just seventeen days after winning the nomination.

Young Patterson was elected Attorney General in his father's place, without opposition. In his first state-wide campaign four years later, was elected Governor.

Inaugural Tennessee

Special to The New York Times.

NASHVILLE, Tenn., Jan. 19—Buford Ellington was sworn in today as Tennessee's forty-second Governor and promised his four-year term would be an "era of readjustment in the light of our existing tax sources."

In one of the briefest inaugural addresses on record for this state, the 51-year-old incoming governor recalled his campaign pledge to hold the line on taxes, and said:

"A relief from new taxation is the most important contribution that the new Administration can make to your welfare."

This, he said, will require better management and "curtailing certain services of lesser critical status in favor of expanding those services of higher ranking importance to the majority of our people."

Mr. Ellington succeeds Gov. Frank G. Clement, who was ineligible to succeed himself after having been in office six years. Both are Democrats.

He promised to "vigorously seek new advantages" for the state, including new efforts to encourage industrial development.

"We shall give new industry not just an invitation but justification for coming here," he said.

Gov. Almond Calls Virginia Assembly To Enact New Anti-Integration Laws

RICHMOND, Va. —(UPI)— Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Sunday night called a special session of the General Assembly to convene Wednesday for enactment of new anti-integration laws.

ALMOND

Almond, faced with the strong likelihood of school integration Feb. 2, yielded to urgent appeals to convene the legislature quickly and pass stop-gap laws to preserve segregation.

Telegrams were dispatched to the 140 assembly members.

Almond said the session was called "for the purpose of receiving such recommendations as I deem necessary to make in the public interest and to consider such matters as the general assembly may deem appropriate relating to the school crisis."

Influential political leaders and a pro-segregation group had urged Almond to call a special session of the general assembly within the coming week in an attempt to circumvent the integration of schools in Arlington, Norfolk and Charlottesville.

Almond, an outspoken segregationist, moved quietly behind the scenes in a series of weekend conferences with key legislators to seek some defense for new anti-integration proposals.

Virginia's "massive resistance" program was stricken last Monday by federal and state courts.

Rep. Watkins Abbitt (D., Va.) and State Sen. Charles Moses both deemed a special session this week imperative if the state hoped to stave off integration for the balance of the school year.

Want Schools Reopened

RICHMOND, Va — ANP) — White parents who prefer to have all public schools open in Virginia even if they have to be integrated are organizing all over the state. Th Richmond Area Committee for Public Schools elected a seven - man board of directors and adopted by-laws last week. The committee heard reports from similar groups in Norfolk and Charlottesville.

These parents are determined to have the nine closed schools in the state re-opened. They have grown tired of the state's massive rsistance under Governor Almond, and are alarmed over the stubbornness of certain state officials.

The Richmond group has distributed information sheets to prospective members in which the committee says it does not seek to promote either integration or segregation. The sole objective of the committee is to have closed schools re-opened so that the state can discharge its solemn obligation of providing an education for its citizens.

EDUCATION PRIME ISSUE

Ellis James of Norfolk told an audience of 350 the desertion by many Virginians of the American concepts of democratic processes, government and individual freedom far transcends the issue of public education.

Mr James scored some members of the City Council in Norfolk. He said some of these members evidently believe "government by law isn't necessary and should not be followed." The Norfolk leader in the public school movement who is a member of the executive committee said individuals in Norfolk who express a preference for public schools are subject to harassment of every kind.

Members of the Norfolk Committee for Public Schools, according to Mr James, are branded as Communists, as radicals who have no sense, and as members of the NAACP.

Similar reaction to those groups is reported from other sections of Virginia. The anti-integrationist are out to rule or ruin. They are following the same tactics which caused President Lincoln to charge that rebels in the South who opposed the abolitionist movement were out to "rule or ruin"

CLOSED SCHOOLS COSTLY

Virginia has spent nearly $1,500,000 on its nine white schools closed in the state to prevent the mixing of the races in classrooms. The total loss to the pupils locked out of schools, the lost of business in school areas, the loss of some materials that would be used by the pupils and other items will push the total loss beyond $3,000,000.

The bill for six closed schools in Norfolk was $924,574 at the close of the year. The six white secondary schools were closed by Governor Almond to prevent integration ordered by the district federal court.

Meanwhile, a report from Washington indicates that no federal money will be used for public scrools closed or converted into private institutions in the current fight against desegregation. The federal government has appropriated $80 million for schools.

Issues bristling statement—

Almond vows no retreat on schools

RICHMOND, Va., Jan. 21—(AP)—Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. has responded to court rulings knocking out Virginia's chief anti-integration laws with a pledge of unyielding resistance to integration in the public schools.

If there was doubt that the administration would pursue massive resistance along some other line, Almond scotched it last night in a radio-television report to Virginians.

THE PEOPLE OF VIRGINIA through their elected representatives and at the polls "have repeatedly made it crystal clear that they cannot and will not support a system of public education on a racially integrated basis," he said.

"I make it equally clear that I cannot and that I will not break faith with them."

Almond's 15-minute speech, his first real comment after Monday's court rulings, was significant also for what was left unsaid. He gave no new details of what course the state will pursue now, hinting only that the key to the plan of battle would have something to do with state tax revenues.

His closest approach to a specific recommendation was an "urgent request" that private school classes for children from nine closed schools in Norfolk, Charlottesville and Warren County continue without interruption.

Almond seemed to reject any local option plan that would allow integration in the schools. He spoke scornfully of "false prophets of a little or token integration." He said it is imperative for Virginia to have one statewide basis for fighting school integration.

MONDAY'S STATE and federal rulings wiped away the state's school closing law. Almond has no statutory power to keep the nine schools closed. There are no state laws to prevent local officials from reopening the schools, shut in September to prevent integration.

Still, there is no indication of a move to reopen schools in any of the three localities.

Almond said:

"To those who defend or close their eyes to the livid stench of sadism, sex, immorality and juvenile pregnacy infesting the mixed schools of the District of Columbia and elsewhere . . . Let me make it abundantly clear for the record now and hereafter, as governor of this state, I will not yield to that which I know to be wrong and will destroy every rational semblance of public education for thousands of the children of Virginia."

Gov. Almond Signs Bills Promptly

3 GOP Senators Dissent in Vote On Attendance

RICHMOND, Jan. 31 (AP) The State Senate today completed action on Gov. J. Lindsay Almond's principal legislative program by enacting the repeal of compulsory school attendance by a 36-3 vote.

(See over)

Gov. J. Lindsay Almond signed the three key bills of his program promptly and commented: "I am very deeply grateful with the response of the General Assembly to my recommendations."

The Governor said he wanted to assure the parents of children in Arlington and Norfolk that tuition grants for private scholing will be made available to them promptly. He said any delay would be brief.

The vote, with only the three Republican Senators dissenting, came after a flurry of debate. Sen. Ted Dalton of Radford attacked the bill as something that might contribute to juvenile delinquency, hurt education in the State and be damaging to the future education of thousands.

"Let it not be said that we have met here and struck a blow for ignorance," he said.

Minutes before, the Senate gave unanimous approval to the administration's tuition grant bills, the other measure Almond recommended.

Opposing school closure along with Dalton were Sen. Roy Wolfe of Gate City and S. Floyd Landreth of Galax.

Passed the House Friday

The House passed the measures Friday.

Answering Dalton were Sens. Edward L. Breeden Jr. of Norfolk and Eugene B. Syndor of Richmond.

Breeden said the bill would not let children roam the streets. He said parents would still have the same control over children that they now have.

In a situation as critical as this, with compulsory desegregation facing many localities, Breeden said, parents "should have a free election" on whether children attend desegregated schools.

Sydnor noted that the repeal was merely a move to prevent any child from being forced by law to attend a desegregated school. He noted that Almond had suggested that repeal of the law might well be reviewed by a study commission he will name to chart a long-range school program.

The two tuition grant bills enacted were the appropriations measure and the tuition grant bill itself.

The appropriations bill appropriates $3 million for the current biennium specifically for the payment of tuition grants.

The tuition grant bill provides that the State will pay up to $250 per pupil for private schooling of children without public school facilities or refusing to attend desegregated public schools.

The vote on both bills was 37-0.

As emergency measures they become effective immediately upon the Governor's signature.

The tuition grants had been approved by the Senate Finance Committee earlier today.

The committee turned down a bill introduced by Sen. Garland Gray of Waverly, which would draw the State's purse strings tight against desegregation with Norfolk and Arlington preparing to open desegregated schools Monday backers of the hold-the-line at all costs position, made strong pleas before the Finance Committee for the Gray measure.

But the Governor stood firm against any great change from his program. Attorney General Albertis S. Harrison told the committee the Senate purse strings bill was incompatible with the Governor's plan.

The pro-segregation Defenders of State Sovereignty and Individual Liberties tolled out their big legal guns on behalf of the Gray bill to supplant Almond's tuition grant proposal.

Collins Denny Jr. of Richmond, counsel for the Defenders, argued that something beyond the Governor's plan was required to ward off desegregation. The bill would reduce the state's multimillion-dollar appropriation to the four main education funds to $1 each. This total of $139 million would be channeled into a fund under control of the Governor for return to localities where no desegregated schools were in operation.

"This bill, to put it simply, just won't supply state money for integrated schools," Denny told the committee.

But Harrison presented the administration's view that the Governor's tuition grant plan was the best that could be accomplished on short notice. He said the administration plan was one that would not run afoul in the State Supreme Court or Federal courts.

The votes came in executive —or secret—session. There was no dissent recorded against the Almond bill—but the test came on the Gray bill and that was by voice vote. A member of the Committee said it appeared the Gray bill had about 7 or at the most 8 supporters in the 19 member Committee.

The Committee showdown apparently meant that those seeking to hold the line for the Governor's plan had beat back the strongest move to go beyond it.

The House met briefly and then stood by to await action by the Senate on the administration proposals after anothre hold-the-line gesture was introduced. This one was a bill by Del. A. H. Richardson of Dinwiddie to create local pupil placement boards and freeze all pupils in the schools they now attend.

The Senate Education Committee approved one of the die-hard measures. The bill would permit the Governor to close any school deemed inefficient, as defined in the bill. But the Committee knocked off the emergency clause which took the bill out of the immediate picture.

This Committee also approved, with Republican Ted Dalotn only dissenting, the repeal of school attendance, already passed by the House.

Davis Y. Paschall, State Superintendent of Public instruction, explained the compulsory attendance repealer to the Committee. He said that in normal times the law should be retained.

He added, however, that these are not normal times and the retention of the compulsory attendance law "would jeopardize other intended legislation . . . designed to continue public education . . .

"I would have to be in favor of its abolition at this time."

Dalton told the Committee he was opposed to the bill and is preparing an amendment to give local governing bodies an option or retaining the compulsory attendance law.

An inefficient school is defined under the House school closure bill as one in which there were not sufficient teachers; one in which any large number of pupils refused to attend or withdrew for reasons deemed reasonably essention to the pupils' welfare by their parents, guardians or custodians; one in which pupils were forced to participate in any "sociological experiment" or any plan not before employed in Virginia.

Also it is defined as one in which soldiers, police "or other law enforcement officers or personnel" were stationed either in or around the school or its grounds; one in which order among pupils could be maintained only by coercion or threats of dismissal, or one in which attendance of certain pupils "forces an association objectionable to" the parents, guardians or custodians of other pupils, or to other pupils.

Arlington to Honor Police Press Cards

Press cards issued by the Metropolitan Police Department will be honored by Arlington Police in the Stratford Junior High School area Monday. Reporters have been asked to display the cards on their outer garments.

Reporters who do not have Metropolitan Police cards may obtain press credentials by bringing proper documentation to Arlington Police headquarters in the County Court House.

VIRGINIA HIGH COURT KILLS SCHOOL LAWS

U. S. Judges Also Jolt Segregation

Richmond, Va., Jan. 19 (AP)—The Virginia Supreme court Monday knocked down the state's anti-integration school laws under which nine public schools in three communities have been closed nearly five months.

The effect of the ruling was to return the public schools to local control as they were prior to the state legislature's enactment in 1956 of the so-called program of massive resistance to racial integration.

Federal Court Kills Law

Monday's decision ended a friendly suit brought by the state administration to determine the validity of the key resistance laws.

Shortly after the decision was made known a three-judge federal court at Norfolk threw out the closure law which had displaced 10,000 pupils in six secondary schools at Norfolk. Three other schools also have been closed at Charlottesville and Front Royal to prevent compliance with federal court orders to integrate the schools.

In a 5 to 2 decision, the state Supreme court rejected the principal contention of the Gov. J. Lindsay Almond administration. This was that when the United States Supreme court knocked out the segregation section of the Virginia constitution it also invalidated the section requiring the state to provide for a system of public schools.

Provisions Stand Alone

This was not so, said the state court. The two constitutional provisions stood alone in their respective sections, the court ruled in a 22 page opinion written by Chief Justice John W. Eggleston.

The state court also rejected the legislature's definition of efficient schools as being schools operated only on a racially segregated basis.

In the dissenting opinion, Justice Willis D. Miller said he was convinced the United States Supreme court's invalidation of the state constitution's school segregation requirement also wiped out the requirement for a state system of free schools.

Special Session Likely

The state court action apparently will result in the appointment by Gov. Almond of a special legislative commission to help him work out a program for adoption by an extra session of the legislature. Almond said he planned to do this as quickly as possible if the courts struck down the program.

The action of the state court brought the probability that some school integration in Norfolk, Arlington, Alexandria and other areas under federal court orders would occur within a few weeks.

The federal court at Norfolk did not order reopening of the schools there, something requested by a group of white parents. Judge Walter E. Hoffman said, however, the court would meet Jan. 23 at Richmond and enter its decree. Lawyers said such a decree would be appealable to higher federal courts.

11 Negroes To Va Schools In September

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va.—Eleven Negroes have been assigned to attend two white schools in September, the Charlottesville school board announced Friday.

Two of the students will be allowed to enter the white school without a federal court order, the others are nine of the 12 previously ordered admitted by federal courts.

Nine of the students were assigned to Venable Elementary School and two to Lane High School. Another application to enter the all - white Johnson Elementary School was turned down.

The assignments were made under the city's non racial assignment plan adopted last February and approved by Federal Judge John Paul. This was the first time the school board has assigned Negro pupils voluntarily to previously allwhite schools.

Virginia School Mixing Will Not Affect Georgia Attitude

ATLANTA (AP)—Virginia's losing school segregation battle has not changed the attitude of the Georgia Legislature "one whit," a House floor leader says.

The Legislature would rather see all schools closed in Georgia than have any integration, said Rep. William Trotter of LaGrange, a floor leader for the forces of Gov. Ernest Vandiver.

Schools in Norfolk and Arlington, Va., were scheduled to reopen today on an integrated basis under federal court orders. They had been closed under state laws which the Virginia Supreme Court later ruled invalid.

Trotter, speaking on a panel television show, WSB-TV Press Gallery, Sunday,, said Georgia's tuition grant law has not been tested in the courts and that the mechanics of educating thousands of school children if the schools are closed has not been worked out.

"A solution we can live with," he said, "is a pupil placement law similar to that in force in North Carolina. That state has no more than 10 Negroes integrated into its school system."

A different view was taken by another panelist, former Rep. Hamilton Lokey, who said the Virginia court decisions made it plain that if one school is closed by state segregation laws, eventually all the schools in the state would be shut down.

Lokey, an Atlanta lawyer, said "There must be equal protection under the law and schools which probably would never have any sort of integration problem will be closed right along with the schools in Atlanta.

Lokey favors local option as a means of preserving the public schools.

South Is Unmoved By Virginia Mixing

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

The start of racial integration at seven public schools in Virginia apparently didn't cause much of a stir among Southern political leaders.

Reactions were as varied as the feelings among the people of the region, with deep South states still determined to resist and the governor of one border state pleased that some progress was being made toward school integration.

Generally, there was little to indicate that the end of massive resistance in Virginia might have any marked affect on other states determined to maintain the South's traditional way of life.

Gov. Ernest F. Hollings of South Carolina said public schools in that state would remain segregated.

Gov. Orval E. Faubus of Arkansas said he remained "unalterably opposed to forcible integration from any source."

On the other hand, Gov. A. B. Chandler of Kentucky said he was pleased that the people of Virginia "have now decided that some progress ought to be made in the direction of integration."

The governor continued: "They have to live with it and it is something we ought not to object to because it is past due. I am glad to see Virginia take its place with Kentucky and other states in integration. That is the contribution toward democracy which we must make. The step Virginia has taken will be helpful in having other states adopt some similar course of action."

In Louisiana, State Sen. W. M. Rainach, chairman of the joint legislative committee on segregation, said he felt that "a much more vigorous use of state executive power, in Virginia's case, would have prevented the token integration in that state."

Sam Engelhardt, Alabama state Democratic chairman, said he was certain the Virginia move "doesn't indicate any weakening on our part. And we must face these things realistically—in Alabama there would be bloodshed." He said this would be true in any section of the state "and we're just not going to integrate, period."

White Students Mostly Cooperative

By Charles J. Livingston

RICHMOND — Twenty one Negro students walked calmly into classrooms in previously all-white schools in Norfolk and Arlington Monday, and integration came as peaceful to Virginia, a state which had offered loud and "massive resistance" to the Supreme Court decision of 1954.

17 IN NORFOLK SCHOOLS

In Norfolk, where 17 Negro youths integrated six senior and junior high schools without incident, white students, anxious to continue their education even if it meant integration called for and were successful in spearheading peaceful and orderly mixing of the races.

SEGREGATIONISTS FALL IN ARLINGTON

Integration in Arlington, a stone's throw from the U. S. Capitol, was just as orderly. Four Negro students entered previously all-white Stratford Junior High. They are Michael Jones, Gloria Thompson, Lance Newman, and Ronald Deskins. They were neatly dressed, composed, and seemed unafraid. All said they expected to get along with their white schoolmates.

STUDENTS COACHED?

The only incident at Stratford came when four white students, apparently coached by segregationists, asked to be allowed to return home.

In Norfolk, where some 10,000 white and Negro students were shut out before opening of schools, when Gov J. Lindsey Almond invoked a state segregation law, since ruled unconstitutional, closing the city's public schools, white students were particularly determined to see the schools reopened without incident. At one school, Norwood High, white students reportedly formed a cordon for their new Negro classmates and escorted them into the school.

STUDENTS CALL FOR SANITY

One students group, the Key Clubs of Norwood, issued a statement signed by 63 members, calling for orderly integration. The statement, which undoubtedly influenced most of the estimated 7,000 returnees, was carried in the Norfolk Virginian - Pilot newspaper. It read:

"It is of the utmost importance to all of us that the orderly reopening is completed as smoothly and as quickly as possible so that we may proceed with our immediate objective to obtain an education.

"We realize that we are faced with many problems. We shall try to solve them in a MATURE manner and under no conditions will rowdiness be condoned. We believe that, regardless of their persoal feelings, the students of our respective schools will conduct themselves with a dignity that will bring credit to our city."

This the students at Norwood seemed to have seized the spot light from local politicians, particularly members of the city council, whose efforts to force the school board to keep the schools closed were struck down by the federal courts.

In Arlington, the last efforts of segregationists to forestall integration was struck down by U. S. Chief Justice Earl Warren himself, who ruled Saturday that the city could not delay any longer the enrollment of the four Negroes at Stratford High.

INITIAL PHASE PEACEFUL

In Norfolk, so orderly was the iinitial phase of the changeover, that one school board official remarked "This proves that everything would work out all right if public officials are sincere and firm."

Of the 17 Negro pupils entering white schools in Norfolk 10 were girls and seven, boys.

POLICE TAKE PRECAUTIONARY MEASURES

Gloria Thompson was the lone Negro girl entering Stratford at Arlington.

In the latter city, a threat by segregationist Jack Rathbone to throw up a picket line around the school failed as the young NEGRO AMERICANS walked quietly to classes. However, as in Norfolk, police had taken precautionary measures to cope with any racial demonstrations or riots. A total of 50 policemen, wearing white helmets and carrying riot weapons, circled the school.

At Stratford, the first integrated school day was devoted mostly to enrollment and class assignments.

The mortal blow to segregation at Norfolk was delivered by Federal District Judge Walter E. Hoffman, who on Jan 27, issued an injunction barring the city council from cutting off funds from the public schools.

Significantly enough, although the NAACP, led by such local stalwarts as Victor Ashe and Mrs Vivian Carter Mason, initiated the action which broke the back of the resistence, much support came from whites who did not want to see the education of their children scuttled for the sake of segregation.

Among whites who carried much of the burden in recent months were liberal white ministers, parents, and white educators, including former Gov Colgate W. Darden Jr, now president of the University of Virginia.

ANP reporter Victor Calverton, on the Norfolk scene, reported the activities of this group of liberals, predicting they defeat any future moves by segregationists.

There were indications also, that Gov Almond may have let himself quietly off the political hook. His hastily called session of the Virginia legislature went no further than to approve tuition grants for students allowed to attend private schools and repeal the state's compulsory attendance law. However, the legislature also passed a law making the bombing of schools and other public places punishable by severe fine and imprisonment.

The integration fight in Virginia started seven years ago, when five Negro students in Prince Edward County challenged the old "separate but equal" doctrine in a suit May 23, 1951. Prince Edward was joined by four other counties, including Arlington.

The case dragged through the courts but last week finally terminated by federal edict.

Decisions Significant Across The Entire South

By CHARLES E. MARSHALL

RICHMOND, Va. — (UPI) — Federal and state courts Monday struck down Virginia's "massive resistance" laws by which the state closed public schools faced with orders to mix the races in their classrooms.

The decisions, with far-reaching significance across the South, came simultaneously from a federal constitutional court sitting in Norfolk, Va., and from the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals.

In its unanimous ruling, which may be appealed only to the U.S. Supreme Court itself, the three-judge federal court based its blow at "massive resistance" on the principle of equal protection of law under the U.S. Constitution. It said Virginia cannot close individual schools because of integration, and "at the same time keep other public schools throughout the state open on a segregated basis."

It added that Virginia also had accepted the responsibility of maintaining its public schools—a point equally emphasized in the "friendly" test case which the state had brought before the state Supreme Court.

CALLS CLOSING "TRAGIC"

The federal panel also echoed the U.S. Supreme Court in previous decisions holding unconstitutional any "evasive schemes which are discriminatory or are designed to evade the court desegregation orders." It called school closings under the "massive resistance" laws "tragic." Its decision struck down the law under which the state could close a school to thwart integration. That was the keystone of "massive resistance," as hailed by Virginia's dominant political figure, Sen. Harry F. Byrd (D., Va.).

The state court decision, split 5-2, held invalid a "massive resistance" law which would automatically close a school in which classrooms are integrated and cut off state funds to that school.

The two rulings were not unexpected. State officials were prepared to call for a new, as yet undisclosed anti - integration program. But it would take weeks, perhaps months to draft something else to replace the set of "massive resist-

[illegible] next school integration might occur in Arlington County
Va., which lies in the metropolitan area of Washington, D. C. Arlington is under federal court order to admit four Negroes to the junior high school Feb. 2.

In effect, the court decisions wiped out the state's control over nine schools closed since the start of the 1958-59 school term, affecting 13,000 pupils in Norfolk, Charlottesville and Front Royal. It left it up to local school boards to decide whether to re-open the closed schools—all of which are under federal court orders to admit Negroes.

Gov. J. Lindsay Almond, Jr., planned to appoint a legislative commission to recommend new anti-integration legislation. In the meantime, state officials urged local school boards to stand firm against re-opening the schools on an integrated basis.

OFFICIALS DECLINE COMMENT

It was unlikely that any of the closed schools would be re-opened immediately.

Several southern states have laws providing for the closing of schools in the event integration is ordered. But officials generally declined immediate comment.

In Little Rock, Ark., the courts have ordered a re-opening of closed schools. In Georgia, which has a stout school closing law, Gov. Ernest Vandiver declined comment on what effect the Virginia action might have on his legislative proposal last week that a new individual school closing law is enacted.

In Richmond, Almond and state Atty. Gen. Albertis Harrison reserved comment.

Integration Delay Voided By U. S. Court

By WILLIAM B. MEAD

RICHMOND, Va. — (UPI) — A federal appeals court Tuesday ordered Prince Edward County in Virginia's rural "south side" to integrate its public schools next September, overturning a seven-year delay granted by the county by a district judge.

Prince Edward, a defendant in the Supreme Court's original 1954 desegregation decision, promptly served notice it would close its public schools next fall and switch to private education.

The U. S. 4th Circuit of Appeals overruled District Judge Sterling Hutcheson's order granting the county a delay in integration until 1965.

It said the fact that "violence may be within the realm of probability," as cited by Hutcheson, a native of Virginia's southside, was no reason to postpone race mixing in the county.

ORDER CLAMP DOWN

The court told the county which is approximately half Negro, it must integrate its white high school in September and take "immediate steps" to integrate its elementary schools as well.

The order specifically covered all Negroes in the county including the three who filed the original suit in 1954. The appeal court told Hutcheson to keep the case open on his docket and clamp down if there is any sign of evasion.

Attorneys for the county school board strongly indicated they would appeal the ruling to the Supreme Court.

It was the first integration order directed against the staunchly pro-segregation area of south side Virginia where Prince Edward and other localities have prepared to stop all public education before bowing to the federal courts.

RACE EQUAL IN NUMBER

The three - judge court, ruling unanimously, said it realized integration was much easier in such localities as Norfolk and Arlington, Va., than in a completely rural community such as Prince Edward County where the races are approximately equal in number.

"... Other communities in the state have taken steps to meet the question and solve it," the court said, "whereas in Prince Edward County the school authorities have taken no effective action whatsoever ..."

The court told Hutcheson to make sure the county paid no attention to any remaining state laws which might slow down integration in the county. This cast doubt on powers of the Virginia Pupil Placement Board, a state agency which has made statewide assignments on a segregated basis.

Prince Edward officials said they had expected Tuesday's decision and would close the schools and turn to private education. Students will be allowed $250 per year in state scholarships under the state's new local-option integration containment program.

INTEGRATION STAY ASKED IN VIRGINIA

WASHINGTON, June 26 (UPI)—The school board of Prince Edward County, Va., asked the Supreme Court today to delay a court school integration court order, pending an appeal from the lower court ruling.

The petition said an appeal would be filed at the earliest possible date.

The petition was presented as the nine Supreme Colrt justices were in conference preparing for what was scheduled to be the last session of the term on Monday.

Since adjournment would put the court in recess until next October, a stay would be necessary to keep integration from going into effect next fall. The court would not be able to act on an appeal until after school had started.

The petition charged that the Fourth United States Circuit Court of Appeals "ran roughshod" over a prior ruling by Federal District Judge Sterling Hutcheson, who had granted the board a seven-year delay.

The Fourth Circuit directed in May a start of desegregation next fall.

Prince Edward, located in Virginia's rural South, was one of the five original defendants in the Supreme Court's school desegregation ruling in 1954.

16 Negro Children Seek Arlington School Shifts

Applications from 16 Arlington Negro children to enter desegregated Stratford Junior High School and three other schools for white children were mailed to the School Board yesterday.

Attorney Otto L. Tucker said 10 children had applied for transfer from the Negro Langston Elementary School to the seventh grade at Stratford. Four Negro children entered Stratford in February. Four children asked to transfer from Langston to the first, second, fourth and fifth grades at Woodlawn School, he said.

Tucker said one child applied to the first grade at Patrick Henry School and another asked to transfer from Drew-Kemper Elementary School to Kenmore Junior High School.

Twenty-two other Negro children whose applications to schools for white pupils have been rejected twice by the School Board have asked Alexandria Federal Judge Albert V. Bryan to order their admission.

Twelve Negro children have applied for admission to four schools in Alexandria. Tucker said Alexandria School Superintendent T. C. Williams had returned the applications, saying transfer requests would be accepted only from July 23 through July 31.

Fairfax County school officials have received applications from 26 Negroes seeking to enter eight white schools.

Virginia Yields to Integration

21 Negro Children Taken Into 7 White Schools

By DOUGLAS B. CORNELL

RICHMOND, Va. (AP) — Virginia gingerly gave way to racial integration Monday and hesitantly took 21 Negro children into seven white schools.

The Negro pupils came and went unmolested at schools in Norfolk and Arlington County. In each community, a few white children refused to attend school with them, picked up their books and went home.

Special police details turned out to maintain order. But they didn't have to work at it. There were no commotions, serious incidents or even any cat-calls—only the usual loud chatter of bubbling teen-agers.

BOMB HOAX; 3 SENT HOME

White House press secretary James C. Hagerty said in Washington that President Eisenhower had been following the integration effort in Virginia quite closely and "thinks it is a fine thing that it has been orderly."

Arlington school officials reported after classes were over for the day that an anonymous telephone call, apparently from a woman, had come through about noon saying a bomb had been planted in Stratford Junior High and timed to go off at 1:30 p. m.

A quick search turned up nothing. In thebelief the call was a hoax, authorities ruled out evacuating the building.

Firecrackers flipped out a window were the nearest thing to a bombing. Three white boys were sent home for that. A white girl was sent home, too, for uncomplimentary remarks about the school principal.

MINIMUM OF ILL WILL

Between the white pupils and handful of Negroes who joined them there apparently was a minimum of ill will.

Yet it was with grimness and discontent that the Old Dominion watched the traditional ramparts of segregation start tumbling down in a state which once paced the Southland in massive resistance to the mixing of races in the schools.

Through the gaps 17 Negro youngsters filed into six junior and senior high schools in Norfolk, the state's largest city. Another four entered Stratford Junior High in Arlington County, a prosperous suburb of Washington.

So, for the first time in Virginia's history, Negroes and whites began attending public schools together, limited though the scale of integration might be at the outset.

SEGREGATION CRIES

Here in this capital of the Confederacy, the Legislature rang out with continued cries of segregationists.

"This," said Del. Sam E. Pope, "is one of the blackest days Virginia has faced since reconstruction."

"The rape of our constitutional rights is an accomplished fact," said Sen. Mills E. Godwin," also from the southside, the area most heavily populated with Negroes.

Segregationists in the Legislature still hunted hopefully, but with slim chances of success, for some new device to bring integration to a halt. One rallying point, a new school closure bill, was defeated in the Senate.

Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. and legislators alike voiced gratification that the transition to integration was peaceful at Norfolk and Arlington. That was just what school and community authorities had predicted—with crossed fingers.

Both at Norfolk and in Arlington, 200 miles to the north, extra police were on duty just in case. But both inside and outside the buildings no violence or even unpleasantness were reported.

ATTENDANCE LOW

The Negro newcomers offered no complaints at their treatment. Demonstrations against them were lacking, even though camaraderie was lacking too.

Yet bespectacled Lewis Cousins, the one Negro admitted to Maury High in Norfolk, said he "made a few friends, mostly in the halls."

Norfolk's six secondary schools had been closed since last September. They never opened them, after federal courts ordered the 17 Negroes admitted and Virginia brought into play a now dead law to close them automatically.

In the interval, most pupils went into other public or private schools or tutored classes.

The expected enrollment last fall would have been 9,950. Monday's belated enrollments totalled 5,443—about 1,000 less than school officials had expected. Whether this difference measures the extent of protest against integration was impossible to say.

The Norfolk schools were open only half a day, for enrolling the pupils and assigning them to classes. Classes begin Tuesday. A number of white children said it was good to be back, even with integration, although they still would prefer segregated schools.

POLICE BAR PARENTS

In every instance, the arrival and departure of the Negroes at the schools of Virginia's metropolis-seaport was without incident. Police watched unobtrusively, mainly from cruise cars.

In Arlington, precautions were far more elaborate but equally unneeded. A hundred police, ready for riots and equipped for them, were thrown around Stratford school.

Coleman Declines Talk on School Move

JACKSON, Miss. (AP) — Gov. J. P. Coleman declined comment Monday on the admission of Negro saudents into Virginia schools.

Coleman told The Associated Press. "I have a longstanding rule against commenting on the domestic affairs of another state."

Secretary of state Heber Ladner said, "It is a sad commentary when the states cannot govern their own educational programs, which was the intent of the founding fathers. To me, to have the United States supreme court force upon the sovereign states a concept so foreign to our American way of life is one of the most dangerous developments in this century."

Tty. Gen. Joe Patterson and Supt. of Education J. M. Tubb declined comment.

Segregation In Virginia Is Dealt Severe Blows By Two Court Rulings

School Laws Hit

Some Class Integration May Occur Before New Barriers Are Raised

By CHARLES E. MAHON

United Press International Staff

RICHMOND, Va., Jan. 19. Federal and state courts Monday struck down Virginia's massive resistance laws by which the state closed public schools faced with orders to mix the races in their classrooms.

The state court decision brought the immediate possibility that some classroom race mixing may take place before the legislature can attempt to erect new barriers.

The decisions, with far-reaching significance across the South, came simultaneously from a Federal constitutional court sitting in Norfolk and from the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals.

Federal Opinion Unanimous

In its unanimous ruling which can be appealed only to the United States Supreme Court itself, the three-judge Federal Court based its blow at massive resistance on the principle of equal protection of law under the United States Constitution. It said Virginia cannot close individual schools because of integration and "at the same time keep other public schools throughout the state open on a segregated basis."

It added Virginia also had accepted the responsibility of maintaining its public schools—a point equally emphasized in the friendly test case which the state had brought before the State Supreme Court.

The Federal panel also echoed the United States Supreme Court in previous decisions holding unconstitutional any "evasive schemes which are discriminatory or are designed to evade the court (desegregation) orders." Its decision struck down the law under which the state could close a school to thwart integration. That was the keystone of massive resistance, authored by Virginia's dominant political figure, Senator Harry F. Byrd (D., Va.).

State Decision Split

The 5-2 state court decision held invalid a law which would automatically close a school in which classrooms are integrated and cut off state funds.

The two rulings were not unexpected. State officials were prepared to call for a new, as yet undisclosed, anti-integration program. But it would take perhaps months to draft something to replace the laws enacted two years ago as the strongest anti-integration laws in the South.

In the meantime, it appeared likely some school integration might occur in Arlington County, Va., which lies in the metropolitan area of Washington. Arlington is under Federal Court order to admit four Negroes to the junior high school Feb. 2.

In effect, the court decisions wiped out the state's control over nine schools closed since the start of the 1958-59 school term, affecting 13,000 pupils in Norfolk, Charlottesville and Front Royal. It left it up to local school boards to decide whether to re-open the closed schools—all of which are under Federal Court orders to admit Negroes.

Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. planned to appoint a legislative commission to recommend new anti-integration legislation. In the meantime, state officials urged local school boards to stand firm against re-opening the schools on an integrated basis.

It was unlikely any of the closed schools would be reopened immediately.

Schools Told To Integrate In Virginia

U. S. Judges' Decrees Affect Norfolk, Arlington County

RICHMOND, Va., Jan. 23 (UPI) — Two high Federal courts late today struck down legal maneuvers of Arlington County and Norfolk to postpone public school integration.

The U. S. Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals upheld an order directing Arlington County, the big suburban area just outside Washington, to admit four Negro students to a white junior high school Feb. 2.

A few minutes later, a special three-judge Federal constitutional panel sitting in the same courtroom killed the Norfolk city council's plan to close its entire secondary school system to avoid integration.

The double-barreled decisions apparently doomed the last hopes of the two Virginia localities to circumvent integration. School boards in both places have pledged to open the schools, integrated if necessary, if given an opportunity.

The four Arlington Negro students, along with 26 others, were turned down last Summer by the county school board on the basis of a locally-administered assignment plan. Federal District Judge Albert Bryan of Alexandria, Va., ordered four of the students admitted however.

"We are in accord with this finding, for it is clear that the transfers were denied on the basis of race," the circuit court said today.

Norfolk's locally-adopted plan of "massive resistance" was killed in the same order which destroyed Virginia's school-closing law.

The three-judge constitutional court, the same one that knocked the heart out of the state "massive resistance" laws, prohibited Norfolk authorities from carrying out their plan to shut down Norfolk's entire secondary school system.

The order also permanently enjoined Gov. Lindsay Almond and other state and local officials from ever again closing a school to avoid integration.

The injunctive order against Norfolk was tacked on to what was expected to be merely a formal declaration of Monday's ruling.

The Appeals Court deferred ruling on Judge Bryan's refusal to order Arlington to admit 28 other Negroes to white schools. The court, in its brief opinion, said it had not had an opportunity in the two days since the case was argued to review the grounds on which the Arlington school board rejected the students.

Gov. Almond spent the day conferring with legislative leaders to complete plans for a special commission to draft new anti-integration measures. A special session of the General Assembly will follow.

AT END OF LINE, ALMOND STATES

Urges Transition to Private School Setups

By JOHN F. DAFFRON

RICHMOND, Va. (AP)—Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. said Wednesday Virginia was at the end of the legal line in attempting to operate a completely racially segregated public school system.

He conceded he knew of no other way to turn to halt the impending admission of Negroes to white schools in Norfolk, Arlington and Charlottesville.

He proposed in a full-dress speech to the opening of an emergency school session of the Virginia General Assembly a program of transition to private education in areas which won't accept integration.

Even as Almond was preparing to face the segregation-minded Legislature, a U.S. district judge, Albert V. Bryan, in Alexandria turned down a request of the Arlington County School Board to delay until next September an order directing the admission of four Negro children to Stratford Junior High School here Monday.

Almond called on the Legislature to provide for state tuition grants of up to $250 per pupil for those who decline to attend integrated schools. He coupled this with a call for repeal of the compulsory school attendance law.

He suggested that the legislators act on these stopgaps to prevent state-enforced integration and then recess the session while a study commission he will name works with him on a long-range program. This program—pointed toward more private school facilities—would include consideration of the state constitution's requirement to maintain a free public school system throughout the state.

'WILL NOT SURRENDER'

Almond pledged to continue the fight he has waged against mixing the races in Virginia's classrooms since 1953 when he was attorney general.

The state, he said, has not surrendered "and she does not surrender now."

Applause greeted Almond's promise to fight to minimize integration in the future. But there was uncertainty that his recommendation for immediate steps would satisfy the more ardent segregationists who are seeking to prevent any breakthrough in the classroom color barrier.

A group of legislators from the rural southern part of the state where the Negro population is heaviest were laboring over a resolution they felt might act as a deterrent to any integration. These legislators had hoped Almond would accept their proposal to hold the line under the state's police powers.

But Almond, a former judge and congressman as well as attorney general, directed part of his address to critics who had said he hadn't been willing to go far enough.

Pupil-Place Law Called 'Delusion'

Won't Work, Says Virginia Official

FAIRFAX, Va. — (UPI) — Virginia's top legal brain said Saturday that dependency on a pupil-assignment plan such as Alabama's to preserve segregation "would be pinning our hopes on a snare and delusion."

Attorney General Albertis S. Harrison said that the U.S. Supreme Court only upheld the Alabama plan on its face and not in application. He said the courts would never permit us use of criteria which excluded qualified Negro children from white schools.

"We might as well face it," he said. "There are Negroes living in every county and city in this state who are qualified for admission to any public school under any standards that would be approved by the courts, and no plan that is legally administered will exclude them."

Harrison's unexpectedly frank speech, delivered at a country club here, quelled speculation that Virginia, its anti-integration laws stricken, would turn to a pupil assignment plan for a solution.

The speech also gave indications that Harrison, who conferred with Gov. J. Lindsay Almond earlier Saturday on new anti-integration strategy, was resigned to integration of Virginia public schools.

"No plan will be approved by the federal courts under the present decisions that does not permit and result in the admission of pupils to school with regard to race or color," Harrison said.

Another Va. School Told To Integrate

RICHMOND, Va. (AP)— Another Virginia community was ordered by a federal court to admit Negro children to its white public schools.

Unless a stay is granted, nine Negro students will enter three white schools in Alexandria next Tuesday. This will raise to 30 the number of Negroes attending integrated classes in public schools since the state's segregation barrier was cracked Monday for the first time.

Judge Albert V. Bryan issued the Alexandria desegregation order Wednesday as integrated classes proceeded for the third day in Arlington and Norfolk with no signs of disorder.

Alexandria school authorities announced they would appeal Judge Bryan's desegreation ruling and ask for a stay. If that fails, the school board said it is ready to enroll the Negro pupils in white schools.

Attendance was up Wednesday in Norfolk, where 17 Negro children are attending six white schools and down slightly in Arlington, where four Negro pupils were admitted to Stratford Junior High School.

Twenty-five policemen were on duty in Arlington, a cutback of nearly three fourths since Monday's first integrated classes. Authorities said only eight or 10 officers were scheduled to be on hand today. Police in Arlington and Norfolk reported no trouble.

FOUR TURNED DOWN

19 Norfolk Negro Children Get School Transfer Tests

NORFOLK, Va. (AP) — School psychologists Thursday began testing 19 Negro children who have applied for transfer to all-white or predominantly white public schools here in September. Four other Negroes were informed their applications would not be considered.

School officials announced Wednesday the 23 Negroes applied for admission to six secondary schools to which 17 other Negroes were assigned last year, and to Norview and suburban Park elementary schools.

The school board apparently fixed June 1 as the deadline for applications by all pupils except those whose families move to Norfolk after that date. However, no date has been publicly designated.

The tests that began Thursday will continue through next week. The applicants and their parents will be interviewed in July by a school administration committee. The school board will then act on the applications.

The tests and interviews are required by the board's pupil assignment plan, which was upheld recently by the federal district court. Criteria on which assignments are based include the applicants' scholastic achievement, social adaptability, physical and moral fitness, place of residence and cultural background.

The four Negroes who were informed their applications would not be considered are rising seventh graders at Titustown Elementary School. They applied for transfer to Northside Junior High. They were notified the entire rising seventh grade will remain in the Titustown school where an eight-room addition is being built to relieve overcrowding. It will open in September.

Cautions Assembly Not To Destroy Public Schools

Gov. Almond Urges "Freedom Of Choice"

By CHARLES E. MAHON
United Press International

RICHMOND, Va. — Gov. J. Lindsay Almond asked a proposed "freedom of Choice' program to the General Assembly Monday as a way to "fight integration without totally destroying public education.

He said the plan, drafted as a replacement for court-stricken "massive resistance" laws under which nine schools were closed to avoid integration, bore "no semblance of surrender."

GOV. ALMOND appealed for unified support in adopting the plan which would let each locality and individual choose between accepting some integrated public schools or resort to private education with state financial help.

Thirty-four colored children have peacefully attended classes in previously-white Virginia schools since the "massive resistance' laws were ruled unconstitutional, but Gov. Almond said the local option plan did not mean the state's fight against integration was over.

"THE PROGRAM recommended by the commission is not one of defeatism or surrender,' he said. "It may be that we have witnessed Gettysburg, but if we unite and work together for the best interests of Virginia there will be no Appomattox.'

He said "ruthless federal pressure' may force Virginia to consider quitting public school business entirely, but he rejected demands by some all-out segregationists that such a move be made now.

"IN DEFERENCE to those who disagree and however caustic some may continue to be of my position," Almond said, "abandonment of public education everywhere in Virginia at this time would smack of defeatism and surrender.'

He went before the Legislature as it resumed a special session to begin debate on the report, drafted by a 40-member legislative commission.

THE BASIC recommendations include state level scholarships of at least $250 a year for private education; a broad pupil placement program carried out on a local level; re-enactment of a compulsory school attendance law repealed earlier this year, to become effective only at the option of localities.

SCHOOLS POLICY UP AT VIRGINIA POLLS

RICHMOND, Va., July 11 (AP)—Virginia Democrats will settle in a primary Tuesday contests involving about a third of the seats in the General Assembly. A few key races are being watched closely in an effort to measure any rise or fall in the slim control of the Legislature held by Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr.

The operation of public schools figures in most of the important contests, with the issue Governor Almond's recently enacted freedom of choice program. This recognizes that some classroom race-mixing must be accepted if public schools are to be retained, but does not force any child to attend an integrated school.

Ultra - segregationists seek some means of returning the state to a posture of unyielding resistance to integration. Thus far they have offered no new plans for rolling back the token integration that has already taken place.

There are contests for twelve Senate seats in nine districts and thirty-five house seats in fifteen districts. The Assembly has 100 House members and forty Senators. Republicans hold only three Senate seats and five in the House.

Charlottesville Integration Program Approved by NAACP

NEW YORK. — The agreement reached for desegregating the public schools of Charlottesville, Va., suggests a path to peace and mutual respect which both white and colored Virginians can pursue with benefits to the commonwealth," NAACP Executive Secretary Roy Wilkins said here today in a letter to Dr. Philip Wyatt, president of the Virginia State Conference of NAACP branches.

Congratulating the Virginia NAACP and its counsel, Oliver W. Hill, on the manner in which agreement was reached on the school desegregation plan submitted by officials of Charlottesville Wilkins recalled that "ever since the Supreme Court decision of May 17, 1954, the NAACP has advocated that the proper officials in the affected areas and Negro citizens mutually agree on a plan of desegregation suitable to the communities involved and the problems existing therein."

Under the Charlottesville plan, not only the 12 Negro students already approved for admission to previously all-white schools under a federal district court order but also other Negro students will be permitted to enroll in desegregated schools in September. The plan was approved by Federal District Judge John Paul on March 30 in conference with Hill and John S. Battle jr., attorney for the City of Charlottesville.

The NAACP view, Wilkins asserted, "has been (and remains) that law suits should be the last resort and should be employed only when localities and states present such resistance and defiance as to leave citizens who seek their constitutional rights no alternative."

Al lthat Negro citizens seek for their children, Mr. Wilkins said, is "that equality in educational opportunity" afforded by "a public school system that is not organized or administered on the basis of race. They seek this objective peaceably but firmly. They realize full ythat a great social transition is in being and that this change requires not only patience, but honesty and fairness as well."

Virginia-Maryland Briefs

U. S. Judge Says Areas May Abandon Schools

RICHMOND, April 7 (AP) A Federal Judge said today he thinks localities have a right to choose between running or abandoning public schools.

In a comment during argument here on Norfolk's appeal Judge Haynsworth said:

"Myself, I think a city has a right to make a choice of running these schools or not."

But Haynsworth added, a city cannot go into and out of the public school business" from time to time—it must be one way or the other.

Th United States 4th Circuit Court of Appeals heard arguments on Norfolk Council's appeal from a district court injunction restraining the city from cuting off funds to all grades above the sixth.

Kill Plan To End Va. Public Schools

RICHMOND, Va.—(UPI)—The House of Delegates Monday defeated by eight votes a proposal to take Virginia out of the public school business.

The resolution, defeated 53-45, called for sweeping changes in the state constitution. It was the rallying point for a staunch segregationist block in the General Assembly opposing Gov. J. Lindsay Almond's moderate anti-integration program.

The vote, which came after two hours of debate, left the "massive resistance" bloc without a program of its own. Almond's "Freedom of Choice" proposals moved toward final enactment in the Senate.

The segregationist proposal, introduced by Del. Stuart Wheatley of Danville, would have stricken the state constitutional provision requiring a public school system and substituted one giving each locality freedom to set up public schools or educate its children in any other way it chose.

The Virginia supreme court held last Jan. 19 in striking down the state's "massive resistance" laws that the state constitution required maintenance of a public school system, even if integrated.

Wheatley said his resolution was designed to remove the "straight jacket" imposed by the state court's ruling.

Under Wheatley's plan, the state would have retained control of certain educational factors. Almond forces attacked it on grounds it would still be open to attack in federal courts.

Governor turns back ondiehards

RICHMOND

The corpse of "Massive Resistance" gave a few convulsive jerks last weekend but there was no heartbeat — the pulse was stilled.

Signing the death warrant was one of the persons who helped bring it to life less than four years ago — J. Lindsay Almond, present Governor of Virginia, former attorney general.

With the same vigor he used to draft and steer bills to hamper the NAACP in Virginia and thwart the Supreme Court decision, Gov. Almond last week-end urged the last-ditch supporters of Richard "Southside Virginia" legislators to keep on fighting the war which was lost.

Called into a special session, the legislature heard Gov. Almond concede Wednesday that there would be school integration in Virginia.

He also told the legislators that he would veto any unrealistic legislation designed to keep the schools either segregated or closed.

He crushed the last, forlorn hope of the 'Southsiders' when he turned thumbs down on a proposed bill to segregate by sexes.

He did not need his veto, however, because his opponents (the 'Southsiders') conceded that he had 70 of the 100 votes in the House and a similar majority in the Senate.

* * *

THUS, THE House gave speedy approval to his bills to repeal the state's compulsory school attendance law and to set up a $3 million fund for private school tuition grants of $250 per pupil.

Even these measures will not halt "D-Day in Dixie" — Monday when 17 colored children enter schools in Norfolk and Arlington.

The Arlington authorities made a "last-ditch" appeal directly to Supreme Court Chief Justice Warran for a delay. They themselves did not express any confidence that it would be forthcoming.

The Chief Justice promised early decision of the appeal and directed the NAACP lawyers to file answers by Saturday noon.

ALMOND'S PLAN of repealing the compulsory school attendance law basically allows individual communities to decide whether to operate public, integrated schools or private segregated ones.

Two years ago when this type of local option plan was suggested to him, he rejected it. The state then had a recently-enacted statute on the books vesting all pupil assignment in a state board. The localities had no choice in the matter. Integrated schools would not receive state funds, the law specified, and therefore would close.

As a result, schools accommodating 10,000 pupils were closed in Norfolk and 30,00 more were closed out in other communities.

* * *

FOLLOWING VIRGINIA'S lead in this, as in other phases of massive resistance, other southern states enacted similar "school-closing" legislation.

Private school corporations sprang up all over the south to take over education in anticipation of future closings.

Southern officials trusted in Virginia's ability to show them how to maintain segregation. Virginia willingly and proudly accepted this leadership, as frequent editorials in state papers attested.

The ultimate fall of massive resistance did not come from federal court action. It was the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals which ruled that the hastily-enacted anti-integration laws were unconstitutional.

OBSERVERS POINTED out that with the state court ruling, plus the governor's unwillingness to pursue the foolish path further, plus the fact that 70 per cent of the legislators supported him in his stand, all tended to show that the concession of defeat had more than a state-wide significance.

They opined that Sen. Byrd, the guiding genius of the modern Confederacy, must also have conceded defeat. "Gov. Almond," they say, "never could have gotten the support of 70 per cent of the legislature without the behind-the-scenes approval of Sen. Byrd, who calls the signals in Virginia's game of politics."

* * *

In a 40-minute address, Almond sharply criticized diehard Dixiecrats who urged him to invoke the police powers of the state to prevent desegregation.

Almond said he could not use his police powers "on an arbitrary basis" to prevent mixing of the races in public schools.

"No fair-minded person would be so unreasonable as to seek to hold me responsible for failure to exercise power which the state is powerless to bestow," he said.

* * *

ALMOND pledged to continue resistance to school desegregation, but indicated that the resistance would be along the lines of containing, rather than preventing, integration.

He called on the joint assembly of the House and Senate to:

1. Repeal the compulsory school attendance law.
2. Enact a new tuition grant statute to ease the impact of impending school desegregation.
3. And then, to recess and await recommendations of a Legislative Study Commission for long-range action.

The Governor made it clear that no violence would be tolerated in the impending desegregation of public schools. He said:

"WHATEVER may ensue as a result of this crisis, law and order must prevail to the end that the good name and honor of Virginia be not defamed.

"With fairness and impartiality to all, I am determined to keep the peace and good order. This is a state function and responsibility. I know of nothing for which to thank the Federal Government during this struggle to preserve our rights except to keep out of our local problems which it has created.

"I recommend the strengthening of laws relating to this subject."

The speech marked the turning point in Virginia's resistance to school desegregation.

The "No, never" policy has been now changed to "Well maybe, a little bit."

In his speech Wednesday, Almond denied rumors that he called the emergency session as the result of pressure from pro-segregationists. The Governor called the session less than a week after saying he would not do so unless he had a workable plan to stave off integration.

He explained the sudden shift in plans by saying:

* * *

"IT HAS BEEN charged that the call of this session was issued as a result of pressure from pro-segregationists; that I have surrendered the reins to the State Government, and that I had repeatedly stated that I would not issue the call until I had 'an effective plan to meet the crisis which will face Virginia next week.'

"The facts are as follows: I issued this call under the force of the urgency of the crisis pyramided by recent judicial decisions.

"I have repeatedly stated that I did not possess the power and knew of none that could be evolved that would enable Virginia to overthrow or negate the overriding power of the Federal Government.

"I stated this to every member of the General Assembly with whom I had the honor to confer. I made the same statement to others vitally and deeply concerned.

Developments elsewhere in the state's school desegregation picture were as follows:

ARLINGTON

THE LONG, drawn - out fight to block desegregation in Arlington public schools came to a legal dead - end Thursday afternoon.

U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Judge Simon E. Sobeloff, sitting in Baltimore, Md., turned down a plea by school board attorneys to delay admission of four colored students to a junior high school.

In denying the plea, Judge Sobeloff told school board attorneys:

* * *

"GENTLEMEN, this isn't even close. You can't shut your eyes to what's gone before.

"These four (children) were picked from 30. Now you say there are disparagments in the schools.

"[illegible] longer they are kept [illegible] you will have this situation. [illegible] grounds on which [illegible] you a stay."

James H. Simmonds, Arlington school board attorneys appealed to Judge Sobeloff after a motion for delay had been denied by U.S. Federal Judge Albert V. Bryan on Wednesday.

The motion by the school board was to delay admission of four colored students to Arlington's Stratford Junior High School on Monday.

* * *

IN DENYING the plea, Judge Bryan said:

"The court does not feel that there has been a showing of a change of circumstances."

The jurist said he had carefully weighed all factors when he set the Feb. 2 day.

In opposing the motion for delay, Frank Reeves, one of the NAACP attorneys for the students, accused the school board of bad faith.

MR. REEVES said school attorneys had "used every device and strategy" to avoid compliance with the Supreme Court's 1954 school desegregation decision.

Following the hearing the NAACP attorney said two of the colored children had been assigned to one section of Stratford School and two to another section.

CHARLOTTESVILLE

JUDGE SOBELOFF granted a stay in starting integration in two schools in Charlottesville.

Both schools, Venable Elementary and Lane High were closed by "massive resistance" laws after a Federal court ordered the admission of colored students.

Negroes Back In Classes

Students Return After N. C. Strike For Improvement

SNOW HILL, N.C. (AP) — Greene County Negro students, having graphically underscored their pleas for improved school facilities, returned peacefully to classes Monday and ended a four-day boycott.

The 2,000 Negroes, making up 54 per cent of the county's school population, ended their protest after the school board promised it was studying their pleas.

'VERY ORDERLY'

"Everything was very orderly," said County School Supt. B. L. Davis, reporting the end of the strike which began last Tuesday when 38 Negro student bus drivers refused to carry passengers to school.

The County Board of Education told Negro leaders that it had taken up the matter of improved Negro educational facilities even before the strike began. The board promised to check possibilities of a bond issue to add a gymnasium, improved cafeteria, additional classrooms and a library to the consolidated Negro high school. The board said it was also considering possible improvements of the county's five Negro elementary schools.

NO INTEGRATION

The Negroes emphasized that they wanted better facilities, not integrated schools.

Supt. Davis said Monday that he knew of no special board meeting to discuss the situation, but said he assumed the matter would come up at the next regular meeting, March 2.

Integration In Virginia Faces Test

RICHMOND, Va. (AP)—Virginia Democrats chose their candidates today for the November general election of state lawmakers.

The outcome could signal whether Virginia's official approach to school integration becomes one of cold defiance or limited compliance.

Today's election involved 47 of the 140 General Assembly seats but a handful of key races were expected to provide a clue whether Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. would retain his slim control of the Legislature. Only in these was the school problem the overriding issue.

Almond publicly has taken a hands-off attitude toward the primary races. By implication he has urged the re-election of supporters of his freedom-of-choice school program.

Va. Case Ruling To Set Pattern

WASHINGTON — (UPI) — The Supreme Court turned its attention Monday to the validity of three of Virginia's anti-NAACP laws.

Outcome of the case will have an indirect bearing on similar laws in a number of other states. The court heard two hours of arguments on the Virginia test and later will hand down a written opinion.

Aimed at curbing activities of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People the three statutes were passed as part of a package by an extra session of the Virginia legislature in 1956.

A three-judge federal court in Richmond found them unconstitutional. State Attorney General Albertis S. Harrison jr. appealed to the Supreme Court.

The high court has also received NAACP appeals from rulings in similar cases originating in Arkansas and Alabama. It hasn't said yet what it is going to do about them.

Two of the Virginia statutes are registration laws. Under them the NAACP would have to file, among other things, the names and addresses of its members and contributors and complete financial statements.

The third law redefines "barratry," or the stirring up of lawsuits by some one not personally involved but who nevertheless pays some or all the expenses.

The NAACP says it is prevented by the new barratry act from helping Negroes financially in school desegregation suits. It said the registration laws would subject members to abusive threats and possible loss of employment.

The three-judge panel found the laws deny the NAACP the "equal protection of the laws" and the "due process of law" required by the constitution.

Harrison is asking the Supreme Court to set aside this ruling until state courts can interpret the statues. If the court won't do that he wants a reversal of the decision against him. He denies the acts infringe on any constitutional rights.

Shortly after Virginia lost in the court, the Supreme Court ruled in the Alabama case that NAACP membership records could not be ordered disclosed by a state court. The decision set aside a $100,000 fine levied against the organization for failure to produce them.

But later the Alabama Supreme Court reaffirmed the punishment on the ground that the NAACP continued to withhold other papers and records.

This case now is before the high court again. Meantime the NAACP is forbidden to operate in Alabama.

In Arkansas a special three-judge panel declined to pass on the constitutionality of anti-NAACP laws until state courts had construed them.

Virginia Told It Must Accept Integration

Perrow Unit Cites Ways to Minimize Mixing in Schools

By ALEX R. PRESTON
Star Staff Writer

RICHMOND, April 2.—A legislative study commission today told the General Assembly that Virginia must accept some degree of integration or abandon public schools entirely.

"We are now faced with decision," said the Commission on Education in its report to the Legislature.

"... The truth is that neither the General Assembly nor the Governor has the power to overrule or nullify the final decrees of the Federal courts in the school cases."

The 40-man commission took the wraps off its elaborate legislative plans which in large measure gives localities control over desegregation and provides that no child be compelled to attend an integrated school.

Proposals to Assembly

To accomplish this, it made these proposals to the special session of the General Assembly reconvening next Monday:

1. Making State and local funds for scholarships available to children who prefer to attend private, non-sectarian schools.

2. Re-enacting the compulsory school attendance law on a local-option basis.

3. Returning to local school boards the responsibility for assigning pupils to specific schools with a new appeals procedure spelled out.

4. Allowing voters to force the sale of surplus school property in localities that may abandon public education.

5. Changing local budget procedures whereby appropriations could be made on a month-to-month basis.

Also proposed is a bill to permit any locality to close its public schools whenever Federal military forces are present.

Overwhelming Sentiment

"The General Assembly of Virginia," the report states, "in keeping with the overwhelming sentiment of the people of this State, made every effort to preserve our system of separate schools. The efforts included the invocation of the police powers of the State, State sovereignty, interposition and State immunity from suit. . . .

"One by one, these laws have been struck down, some by the Federal courts and some by the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. None of these laws can be made effective against overwhelming Federal force."

The commission's report was approved by a vote of 31-to-9 Five of those signing the majority report did so with reservations.

The minority statement said the majority report "makes it legally possible for a locality to proceed with as much integration as that particular locality desires."

"We are not willing to strive simply for containment; we are not willing to accept a little or token integration. . . . ;

"The people of Virginia, and not the General Assembly, ultimately will have to decide how massively they wish to resist integration in our public schools. . . . We must not now meekly surrender."

But the majority report said: "Regardless of how unsound we may regard the 1954 decision of the Supreme Court of the United States . . . we are compelled to recognize the existence of that decision and the overwhelming power of the Federal Government by the use of force to carry out Federal court decrees."

Negroes to Be Admitted

So far, Federal courts have ordered Negroes admitted to white schools in Arlington, Alexandria and Norfolk and others are to be admitted in former white schools in Charlottesville in September.

"Under the recommendations no child will be forced to attend a racially mixed school," said the commission, which has made an eight-week study under the chairmanship of State Senator Mosby G. Perrow, jr., of Lynchburg.

The commission presented a pack of 15 bills and one resolution for the Legislature to take up at its session next Monday. The session is expected to continue for about two weeks.

Among the 31 signing the majority report State Senators Charles R. Fenwick of Arlington, John A. K. Donovan of Fairfax; Curry Carter of Staunton; E. O. McCue, jr., of Charlottesville, and Garland Gray, chairman of the former "Gray Commission" dealing with public school desegregation problems.

Other Signers

Also signing were Delegates Harrison Mann of Arlington, George Cochran of Staunton and ames Thomson of Alexandria (with reservations).

Mr. Thomson and Senator McCue were among the nine legislators who signed the minority report, as well as the majority report.

"The commission is of the opinion that it would be necessary to close all public schools throughout the State in order to prevent any integration," the report states.

It said it did not believe any citizens were willing to take such a drastic step "at this time."

The minority opposed the Commission's recommendation that Section 129 of the State Constitution be left unchanged. That is the section that requires the State to maintain a system of free public schools. The commission said that repealing this section would accomplish no more than could be accomplished through revisions to existing laws.

A bill making radical changes in budget procedures was included in the package of legislation sent to the Assembly.

VIRGINIA TO STUDY NEW SCHOOL PLAN

Legislature Meets Tuesday to Receive Panel's Proposal on Integration Issue

Special to The New York Times.

RICHMOND, Va., March 28—Virginia's Legislature reconvenes Tuesday to receive a long-range program for handling the school integration problem.

Already the stage appears to be set for more consideration of the viewpoint that split political friends into camps of moderate segregationists and straight-out segregationists at the beginning of the special session late in January. The session was called to seek legal means of continuing as much of Virginia's traditional segregated school system as possible after Federal and state courts ruled out the state's massive-resistance laws.

Early in the session Gov. J. Lindsay Almond Jr. won a political victory with the approval of his limited two-point program. This provided tuition grants toward payment for private schooling of pupils who refused to attend integrated schools or whose public schools were closed, and repealed the state's compulsory school attendance law.

This carried out the Governor's pledge that Virginia would not force a child to attend an integrated school.

It was also intended to ease a possible transition from public to private schooling in some localities.

The alternative program, supported by a group of the strongest segregationists in the 140-member Legislature, would have closed schools before integrating them.

Since then, during a recess of the special session, a forty-member legislative commission has spent hours behind closed doors in committee work, has held one twelve-hour public hearing, and on Thursday completed work on its program. It then adjourned until Monday afternoon without disclosing its plan.

Indications are, however, that the commission will recommend a local-option program, ask to continue some public schooling in every locality and encourage local private schooling wherever it is desired.

Such a plan represents a slight shift in thinking since the study started. Then legislators seemed to favor easing or repealing Virginia's constitutional requirement for pri- and grammar schools everywhere, integrated or not.

The local-option feature of the commission program, it is expected, would permit a locality in a referendum to choose private schooling to retain segregation. After such a vote the locality would limit its financial support of public schools to a constitutional minimum and would be permitted to dispose of its surplus public schools by sale, possibly on an installment basis, to private school groups.

Dissents Are Hinted

State Senator Mosby G. Perrow of Lynchburg, commission chairman, said this week that there might be some minority reports.

To support the legislators who prefer a return to some form of massive resistance, a group has formed centering in Southside Virginia, where the Negro population is largest. Called the Bill of Rights Crusade, it has promised a chartered bus "March on Richmond" to coincide with the Legislature's reopening.

Although most localities are awaiting a decision from the Legislature, a number are setting up or planning private educational corporations.

Virginia now has token integration under court order in Norfolk, Alexandria, Arlington County and Warren County.

Virginia Pastor Hits Neutrality on Schools

A Virginia minister whose congregation overruled his objection to holding private school classes in his church declared yesterday everybody is involved in the integration issue.

The Rev. Paul L. Stagg, pastor of First Baptist Church, Front Royal, Va., told a meeting of the District Baptist Convention Pastors' Conference that people cannot stay neutral on the question.

To remain an onlooker "is to become involved in the guilt of irresponsibility," he asserted.

Mr. Stagg explained he regarded the use of his church for a private school as a means of evading integration in the schools.

Local trustees of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Ky., reported about the meeting earlier this week at the seminary rescinding the firing of 12 professors last year.

The Rev. John Holt, pastor of Luther Rice Baptist Church, and the Rev. A. Lincoln Smith, pastor of Congress Heights Baptist Church, said the meeting Monday rescinded the dismissals and instead asked the professors to submit resignations. By resigning, the professors are eligible for rehiring, they explained. Actually, 11 of the 12 professors have new positions and the 12th is taking postgraduate work.

The professors were fired last summer over a dispute regarding the extent of faculty voice in the administration of the seminary.

The meeting yesterday was held in District Baptist Convention headquarters, 1628 Sixteenth street N.W. The Rev. Harry McKnight, pastors' conference president, presided.

Virginia's 'Organized Common Sense'

By Benjamin Muse

IN THE MIDST of the desegregation furor the Virginia Committee for Public Schools can best be described as representing the organized common sense of Virginia.

Muse

It is neither segregationist nor "integrationist." It is simply for public schools. But it recognizes the necessity for complying with the law, and it puts the desegregation matter in its proper perspective.

Many firm believers in segregation are active in its ranks. This point of view was well expressed the other day by the son of a distinguished former Governor of Virginia, John S. Battle Jr.

"I am and always have been unalterably opposed to mixing of the races in the public schools of Virginia," Battle said. "—But, in spite of this deep and abiding belief, I cannot agree to advocate any approach to the problem which is either foolish or unlawful. It would seem to me that the abandonment of our wonderful system of public schools would certainly be foolish—and under our present constitution, unlawful."

THAT AN ORGANIZED movement to save public schools should be necessary in Virginia in the middle of the 20th century might be hard for some to realize, in spite of the depressing developments in Prince Edward County. The danger has been tragically brought home to the people of Norfolk, Charlottesville and Front Royal, and it is apparent to all who followed closely the activities of the recent special session of the General Assembly.

An effort to "take the state out of the public school business" by constitutional amendment was defeated in the House of Delegates by a vote of only 53 to 46. The defeat of that attempt and the arresting of the whole trend of extremist folly was due in no small part to the Committe for Public Schools. The protests of its spokesmen and the sheer fact of the existence of an organization of more than 20,000 Virginians standing firmly behind public schools had a telling effect.

"Committee" is actually a misnomer for the organization. Its membership has now passed 24,000. Local committees are functioning in Alexandria, Arlington, Blacksburg, Charlottesville, Christiansburg, Fairfax-Falls Church, Lynchburg, Newport News, Norfolk, Richmond, Waynesboro and Rockingham and Warren Counties. Committees now being formed in Radford and Abingdon will bring the number of local units up to 15.

The new legislation removed, for the present at least, the danger of disastrous state-wide action and put an end to school-closing imposed from Richmond on unwilling localities. It decentralized the danger, leaving the fate of public schools largely in the hands of the communities themselves. But it left open many dangerous possibilities. Where fanatics get the upper hand, it is still possible to reduce the public school system to a pitiful minimum.

The paramount issue is not that of whether a few Negro children shall attend schools with white children, as they are doing in Maryland, West Virginia and many other states. That is not a catastrophic prospect even from the point of view of those who prefer segregation. The paramount issue is that of the preservation of public schools.

Much will depend during the coming year on the strength and further growth of the Committee for Public Schools. Those who believe in public schools and have not done so should lose no time in enrolling in it. (A post card addressed to the Virginia Committee for Public Schools, Broad-Grace Arcade, Richmond 19, will do it.)

No payment is required, but for those who have a little balance in their bank accounts, a few dollars will help. The organization is hard-pressed for funds. But the main thing is to see that your name is included in the impressive list of Virginians who insist that the public school system shall be kept intact.

North Virginia Officials Favor Perrow Report

Most Northern Virginia officials received the Perrow Commission's report favorably yesterday. But down-State segregationists branded it as a "surrender to integrationists."

State Senator Armistead Boothe of Alexandria said the commission has done an "excellent" job in its report on containing desegregation. "This is all we can do if we want to maintain a State school system and still stay in the Union."

Delegate Kathryn Stone of Arlington called it a "moderate plan." She said she would want to study some proposals carefully, particularly the recommendation that would allow localities to dispose of school property.

She said she was greateful no change was recommended in the constitutional requirement that the State maintain a public school system. She also said she was happy the commission suggested that compulsory attendance laws be re-enacted.

Reasonable Approach

State Delegate Omer L. Hirst of Fairfax County said the local option phase of the report is "a return to a more reasonable approach to this problem."

Mr. Hirst added that the "financial burden of the broadened scholarship program must be kept within manageable proportions so it does not impair the financial foundation of the free public school system."

State Senators Charles R. Fenwick of Arlington and John K. Donovan were members of the commission that drafted the report.

Delegate William Winston of Arlington said the report "presents an intelligent approach to the problem" and "returns to the localities many of the rights relating to the operation of the public schools." He said it "will not preserve total segregation, but neither did massive resistance."

Delegate James M. Thomson of Alexandria, also a member of the commission, signed the report with reservations. Mr. Thomson also signed a minority report that said: "We are not willing to strive simply for containment."

Marshall Beverley, opponent of Mr. Boothe in the Alexandria Democratic primary for the State Senate, gave a hesitant approval of the plan. "It gives us a choice, and I will still fight for segregation," he said.

Representative Abbitt, Democrat of Appomatox, said he was very much disappointed with the majority report.

"Its recommendations result in complete surrender to the integrationists. It affords little protection to the localities. If adopted, it will mean mass integration at the whim and fancy of the NAACP and the Federal courts. It does not afford freedom of choice," said Mr. Abbitt.

Mr. Abbitt asserted that the report requires the operation of public schools, even though reduced, in every locality, regardless of how much integration is forced upon it—"and to my mind that is not freedom of choice."

Lt. Gov. A. E. S. Stephens defended the report.

"All in all, I think it's the only approach they could take, but, of course, a great many details remain to be ironed out," he said.

Dalton Gratified

"Those who think this is capitulation need not be discouraged," he continued. "It's not capitulation. It's just realism, drawing up the lines for the next battle in a long, long war."
